in the Isle of Wight. Where the 14 of January following we tooke in the worshopfull H. William Hareborne her H. Maesties Ambassadour to the Turke, and his company, and sailed thence to Yarmouth in the foresayd Isle of Wight. The 19 we put from Wight. The 26 we did see Cauo de Sant Vincentie. The same day we were thwart of Cauo Santa Maria. The 27 we passed by Tariffa, and Gibraltar. The 28 in the morning we passed by Velez Malaga: and that night were thwart of Cauo de Gates. The 29 at night we had sight of Cauo de Palos. The 30 in the morning we did see the highland of Denia, in the kingdome of Valencia, and that night we had sight of the Island Formentera. The 31 in the morning appeared the Island of Cabrera. The first of February we put into a Port in Mallorca, called Porto de Sant Pedro: where they would haue euill intreated vs for comming into the Harbour: we thought we might haue bene as bold there as in other places of Christendome, but it proued farre otherwise. The first man we met on land was a simple Shepherd, of whom we demanded whether we might haue a sheepe or such like to refresh our selues, who tolde vs yea. And by such conference had with him, at the last he came aboord once or twice; and had the best cheare that we could make him: and our Ambassadour himselfe talked with him, and still he made vs faire promises, but nothing at all meant to performe the same, as the end shewed. In the meane time came in a shippe of Marseils, the Master whereof did know our Ambassadour very well, with whom our Ambassadour had conference, and with his Marchants also. They came from Alger in Barbarie, which is vnder the gouernement of the Great Turke. They did present our Ambassadour with an Ape; wherefore he made very much of them, and had them often aboord. By them I suppose; he was belayped of his purpose as touching his message, but yet still we had faire words of the Shepherd asoforsayd, and others. So that vpon their words, our Purser and another man went to a Towne which was thye or foure miles from the port, and there were well entertained, and had of the people very faire speeches, and such small things as could be gotten vpon the sudden, and so returned to the shippe that day. Then we were emboldened, and thought all had bene well, according to their talke. The next day, being the sixth day of February, two of our Gentlemen, with one of our Marchants, and the Purser, and one of the Ambassadors men went to the Towne asoforsayd, thinking to doe as the Purser and the other had done before, but it proued contrary: for at their comming thither they had faire wordes a while, and had bread and wine, and such necessaries for their money, vntill such time as they were beset with men, and the Maiorcanes neuer shewed in their countenance any such matter, but as the maner of all the people in the dominions of Spaine is, for the most part to be treacherous to vs, if they thinke they haue any aduantage. For vpon the sudden they layd handes on them, and put them in holde, as sure as might be in such a simple Towne. Then were they well guarded with men both day and night, and still deluded with faire wordes, & they sayd to our men it was for no hurt, but that the Viceroy of the Island would come aboord to see the shippe. But they presently sent the Purser to the Towne of Maiorca, where he was examined by the Viceroy very straightly, what their shippe and captaine were, and what voyage they intended, but he confessed nothing at all. In the meane time they in the Towne were likewise straightly examined by a Priest and other officers vpon their othes: who for their othes sake declared the whole estate of their voyage. The Ambassadors man was a French man, and therefore was sufferer to goe to the shippe on a message, but he could tell the Ambassadour none other newes, but that the Viceroy would come aboord the shippe, and that our men should come with him, but they had another meaning. For the Marseilian Marchants were stayed in like maner in the Towne, onely to make a better shew vnto vs. But in the meane time, being there three or foure dayes, there came men vnto vs euery day, more or lesse, but one day especially there came two men on horsebacke, whom we tooke to be officers, being lusty men, and very well horsed. These men desired to speake with our Captaine (for all things that passed there were done in the name of our Captaine Iohn Gray) for it was sayd by vs there, that he was Captaine of one of her Maesties shippes: wherefore all things passed in his name: and the Ambassadour not seeing in any thing but rather concealed, and yet did all, because of his tongue and good inditing in that language. For he himselfe went on land clothed in Veluet, and talked with these men, and with him ten or twelue lusty fellows well weaponed, each one hauing a Boardspeare or a Calliuer, the Captaine Iohn Gray being one of them, and our boat lying by very warily kept and ready. For then we began to suspect, because the place was more frequented with men then it was wont. The men on horsebacke were in doubt to come neere, because hee came so well weaponed. But they bade him welcome, and gaue him great salutations in wordes as their maner is: and demanded why he came so strong, for they sayd he needed not to feare any man in the Island. Answer was made, that it was the maner of English Captaines to goe with their guard in strange places. Then they tolde our Ambassadour (thinking him to be the Captaine) that they were sent from the Viceroy to know what they did lacke, for they promised him beefe or mutton, or any thing that was in the Island to be had, but their purpose was to haue gotten more of our men if they could, and they sayde that wee should haue our men againe the next day: with such pretty delusions they sed vs still. Then our Ambassadour did write a letter to the Viceroy in her Maiesties name, and in our Captaine Iohn Grayes name, and not in his owne, and sent it by them, desiring him to send his men, and not to trouble him in his voyage, for he had giuen him no such cause, nor any of his. So these men departed with great courtellie in words on both parts. And in all this time we did see men on horsebacke and on foot in the woods and trees more then they were accustomed to be, but we could perceiue nothing thereby. The next day, or the second, came either foure or five of the best of them as wee thought (the Viceroy excepted) and very many men besides in the fieldes, both on foot and on horse, but came not neere the water side. And those in like order desired to speake with the Captaine, and that when he came on land the trumpets might sound: but then the Ambassadour, whom they thought to be Captaine, would not goe, nor suffer the trumpets to be sounded, for that he thought it was a trappe to take himselfe, and more of his company. But did send one of the principall of the Marchants to talke with them. And the Captaine Iohn Gray went also with him, not being knownen of the Spaniards, for he went as a souldiour. Thus they receiued of those men the like wordes as they had of the other before mentioned, who sayd we should haue our men againe, for they meant vs no hurt. Then our Ambassadour did write another letter, and sent it by them to the Viceroy, in like order as he did before, but he receiued no answer of any of them. In all this time they had priuily gathered together the principall men of the Island, and had laboured day and night to bring downe ordinance, not making any shew of their trecherie towards vs. But the same night following, we saw very many lightes passe in the woods among the trees. And in the morning when the watch was broken vp, being Saturday the ninth of Februarie, at faire day light, one of our men looked forth, and saw standing on land the carriage of a piece: then was one commanded to goe into the toppes, and there he did descric two or three pieces, and also many men on the shoare, with diuers weapons that they brought. Then they suddenly tooke foure or five brasse pieces, and placed them on either side of the harbourough where we should go out, and hid them with stones and bushes that we should not see them. Now I thinke the harbourough not to be aboue the eight part of a mile ouer. Thus perceiuing their meaning which was most plaine; wee agreed to take vp our anker and goe out, and leaue our men there, hauing none other way to take. Then our Ambassadour intreated the Master of the Marcellian, his friend, to goe on land with his boat, and to know the trueth: who satisfied his request. And at his returne he tolde vs that it was very true, that they would lay holde of vs if they could. Then we weighed our ankers: but hauing little winde, we towed the shippe forward with the boat. The Viceroy himselfe was at the water side with more then five hundred men on both sides of the harbour as we thought. And when we came out withour shippe as far as their ordinance, our Ambassadour and the Captaine being in their armour, the Master commanding of the company, and trimming of the sailes, the Pilot standing on the poope, attending to his charge, with other very well furnished, and euery man in order about their businesse very ready, they on land on the contrary part hauing a very faire piece mounted on the North side openly in all our sights, as the shippe passed by, they trauerled that piece right with the maine mast or after-quarter of the shippe, and a Gunner standing by, with a lintstocke in his hand, aboue foureteeen or fiftene foot long, being (as we thought) ready to giue fire. Our whole noise of trumpets were sounding on the poope with drumme and flute, and a Minion of brasse on the summer decke, with two or three other pieces, alwayes by our Gunners trauerled mouth to mouth with theirs on land, still looking when they on land should shoot, for to answer them againe. The Pilot standing on the poope, seeing this readinesse, and the shippe going very softly, because of the calmenesse of the tide, he called to them on the South side, where the Viceroy was, and sayd vnto him: Haue you warres with vs? If you haue, it is more then we know; but by your prouision it seemeth so: if you haue, shoot in Gods name, and spare nor, but they held all fast and hot not. Then the Viceroy himselfe held by a paper, and sayd he had a letter for our Captaine, and desired vs to stay for it. Then we answered and sayd we would not, but willed him to send it by the Marcellians boat, and our men also. All this while, our trumpets, drum and flute sounded, and so we passed out in the face of them all. When they perceiued that they could lay no holde on vs, they presently sent to the Towne for our men, whom within lesse then three heures after they sent aboord with the sayd letter, wherein he desired our Captaine and his company not to take it in ill part, for he meant them no harme, but would haue seene our shippe. His letter did import these and such like faire speeches: for it altogether contained courteous salutations, saying that he might boldly come into any port within his Island, and that he and his would shew him what friendship they might: and that the injury that was offered was done at the request of the Shepheards and poore people of the countrey, for the more safegard of their flockes; and because it was not a thing usuall to haue any such shippe to come into that port, with many other de-ceitfull words in the sayd letter. Then our Ambassadour wrote vnto him another letter to an-swere that, and gaue him thanks for his men that he had sent him, and also for his good will, and sent him a present. This done, we shot off halfe a dozen pices, hoisted our sailes, and departed on our voyage. Then the Purser and the rest of our men that had beene in holde, tolde vs that they did see the Captaine, and other gentlemen of the Island, hauing their buskins and stockings teare from their legges, with labouring in the bushes day and night to make that sudden poutfion. The 12 of February we saw an Island of Africa side called Galara, where they vse to drag out of the Sea much Corall, and we saw likewise Sardinia, which is an Island subiect to Spaine.

The 13 in the morning we were hard by Sardinia. The 15 we did see an Island neere Sicilia, and an Island on Africa side called Cymbre. The same day likewise we saw an Island called Pantalara, and that night we were thwart the middle of Sicilia. The 16 at night we were as farre as Capo Passaro, which is the Southeast part of Sicilia. The 24 we were put into a port called Porto de Conte, in an Island called Cephalonia: it is an out Island in the dominions of Grecia, and now at this present gouerned by the Signory of Venice, as the rest of Grecia is vnder the Turke, for the most part. The 27 we came from thence, and that day arriued at Zan-te which is also in Grecia; for at this present wee entered the parts of Grecia. The second of March we came from Zante; and the same day were thwart of an Island called Prodono: and the 4 we were thwart of an Island called Sapientia. There standeth a faire Towne and a Castle on the maine ouer against it, called Modon. The same day by reason of contrary windes we put backe againe to Prodono, because we could not fetch Sapientia. The ninth we came from thence, and were as farre as Sapientia againe. The tenth we were as farre as Capo Matapan; and that day we entered the Archipelago, and passed thowtweene Cerigo and Ca-uo Malio. This Cerigo is an Island where one Menelaus did sometimes reigne, from whome was stolen by Paris faire Helena, and carried to Troy, as ancient Records doe declare. The same day we had sight of a little Island called Bellapola, and did likewise see both the Milos, being Islands in the Archipelago. The 11 in the morning we were hard by an Island called Fal-conara, and the Island of Antemila. The 12 in the morning we were betweene Fermenia and Zea, being both Islands. That night wee were betweene Negropontee and Andri, being likewise Islands. The 13 in the morning we were hard by Ppara and Sarafo, being Islands nine or tenne miles from Chio, and could not fetch Chio. So we put roome with a port in Metelin called Sigra, and about nine of the clocke at night we ankered there. The 15 we came from thence, the sixteenth we put into Porto Delfi. This port is 9 English miles to the Northward of the City of Chio, (and it may be twelue of their miles) this night we stayed in the sayd port, being in the Island of Chio. Then went our Marchant and one or two with him to the City of Chio.
And when the By, who is the gouernour of the Island (and is in their language a Duke) had communed with the Marchant, and those that were with him, and vnderstood of our arriuall within his dominion, the day following he armed his gallies, and came to welcome our Ambassadour, accompanied with the Ermine, that is, the Kings Customier, and also the French Consill, with diuers of the chiefe of the City, and offered him as much friendship as he could or would desire: for he did offer to attend vpon vs, and to be vs if need were to the Castles. The 21 we departed from thence, and that day passed by port Sigra againe. This Island of Metelin is part of Asia, and is neere to Narolia. The 22 we passed by a head land called Baberno, and is also in Asia.
And that day at night we passed by the Ile of Tenedo, part of Asia, and by another Island called Maure. And the same day we passed thowtweene the straights of Galipoli, and by the Castles, and also by the Towne of Galipoli it selfe, which standeth in Europa. And that night we were in sight of Marmora which is neere Narolia, and part of Asia. The 23 in the morning we were thwart of Aracilia, and that night we ankered in Silauria. The 24 in the morning the Marchant and the Pilot were set on land to goe to the City about the Ambassadors businessse, but there they could not land because we had the winde faire. That place of some is called Ponte grande, and is foure and twenty miles on this side of Constantinople, and because of the winde, they followed in the skiffe until they came to a place called Ponte picola, and there is a little bridge, it standeth eight Turkish miles from Constantinople, there the Marchant and the Pilot landed.
At this bridge is an house of the great Turkes with a faire Garden belonging vnto it, neere the which is a point called Ponta S. Srephano, and there the shippe ankered that day. The 26 day the ship came to the seven Towers, and the 27 we came neerer. The 29 there came three gallies to bring vs by further: and when the shippe came against the great Turkes palace, we shot off all our ordnance to the number of foure and thirty pieces. Then landed our Ambassadour, and then we discharged foure and twenty pieces, who was receiued with moze then fifty or threescore men on horsebacke. The ninth of April he presented the great Bassa with sixe clothes, foure eames of siluer double gilt, and one piece of fine holland, and to thzee other Bassas, that is to say, the second Bassa, which is a gelled man, and his name is Mahomet Bassa, to the third who married the great Turkes sister, and to the fourth whom they call Abraham Bassa, to euery one of these he gaue foure clothes. Now, befoze the great Bassa, and Abraham Bassa, at their returne from the Court (and as we thinke at other times, but at that time for a certaine) there came a man in manner of a foole, who gaue a great shout thzee or foure times, crying very hollowly, the place rebounded with the sound, and this man, say they, is a prophet of Mahomet, his armes and legges naked, on his feet he did weare wooden pattens of two soles, in his hand, a flagge, or streamer set on a short speare painted, he carried a mat and bottels, and other trumpery at his backe, and sometimes vnder his arme, on his head he had a cappe of white Camels haire, flat like an helmet, written about with letters, and about his head a tinnen rowle. Other seruicemen there were with the sayd Bassas, with red attire on their heads, much like French hoods, but the long flappe somewhat smaller towards the end, with scuffes or plates of mettall, like vnto the chape of an ancient arming sword, standing on their foreheads like other Janisaries. These Bassas entertained vs as followeth: First, they brought vs into a hall, there to stand on one side, and our Ambassadour and gentlemen on the other side, who sate them downe on a bench couered with carpets, the Ambassadour in the midst; on his left hand sate our gentlemen, and on his right hand the Turkes, next to the dooze where their master goeth in and out: the common sort of Turkes stayed in the Courtyard, not suffered to come neere vs. When our Ambassadour had sitted halfe an houre, the Bassas (who sate by themselves in an inner small roome) sent for him; to whom the Ambassadour and his gentlemen went: they all kissed his hand, and presently returned (the Ambassadour onely excepted, who stayed there, and a Turkes chaus with him) with the Ambassadour and his gentlemen went in also so many of our men as there were presents to carry in, but these neither kissed his hand nor taried. After this I went to visit the church of Santa Sophia, which was the chiefe church when it was the Christians, and now is the chiefe see and church of primacie of this Turke present: befoze I entered I was willed to put off my shoes, to the end I should not prophane their church, I being a Christian. The pillars on both sides of the church are very costly and rich, their pulpets seemely and handsome, two are common to preach in, the third reserved onely for their Dalschall. The ground is couered with Mats, and the walles hangd with Tapistry. They haue also Lamps in their churches, one in the middle of the church of exceeding greatnesse, and another in an other part of the church of cleane golde, or double gilded, full as bigge as a barrel. Round about the church there is a gallery builded vpon rich and stately pillars. That day I was in both the chappels, in one of the which lieth the Turkes father, and fine of his sonnes in tombes right costly, with their turbents very white and cleane, shifted (as they say) euery Friday, they be not on their heads, but stand on mouldes made for that purpose. At the endes, ouer, and about their tombes are belts, like girdles, beset with iewels. In the other chappell are foure other of his sonnes, and one daughter, in like order. In the first chappell is a thing foure foot high, couered with greene, beset with mother of pearle very richly. This is a relique of Mahomet, and standeth on the left side of the head of the great Turkes tombe. These chappels haue their floozes couered, and their walles hangd with Tapistrie of great price, I could value the couering and hangings of one of the chappels, at no lesse then five hundred poundes, besides their lamps hanging richly gilded. These chappels haue their roofes curiously wrought with rich stone, and gilded. And there lie the bookes of their Lawes for euery man to reade. The 11 day of April the shippe came to the Key of the Custome house. The 16 the Ambassadour and we his men went to the Captaine Bassa, who is Admirall of the seas, his name is Vchali, he would not receiue vs into his house, but into his gallie, to deliuer our present, which was as followeth: Foure pieces of cloth, and two siluer pots gilt & grauen. The poepe or sterne of his gallie was gilded both within and without, and vnder his feet, and where he sate was all couered with very rich Tapistry. Our Ambassadour and his gentlemen kissed his hand, and then the gentlemen were commanded out, and our Ambassadour sate downe by him on his left hand, and the chaus stood befoze him. Our men might walke in the gallie fore and after, some of vs taried, and some went out againe. The gallie had seuen pieces of brasse in her prow, small and great, she had thirty bankes or oares on either side, and at euery banke or oare seuen men to rowe. The 18 day the shippe went from the Key. And 21 the Admirall tooke his leaue of the great Turke, being bound to the Sea with sixe and thirty gallies, very fairely beautified with gilding and painting, and beset with flags and streamers, all the which gallies discharged their ordinance: and we for his farewell gaue him one and twenty pieces. Then he went to his house with his gallies, and the 22 he went to the Sea, and the Cattle that standeth in the water gaue him foureteene or sixteene pieces: and when he came against the Turkes Seraglio he shot off all his calliuers and his great pieces, and so hee went his way. The 24 our Ambassadour went to the Court, whose entertainment with the order thereof followeth. When wee came first on land there was way made for vs by two or thre Bassaes and diuers chaufes on horsebacke with their men on foot, to accompany our Ambassadour to the Court. Also they brought horses for him and his gentlemen for to ride, which were very richly furnished: and by the way there met with vs other chaufes to accompany vs to the Court. When we came there wee passed thorow two gates, at the second gate there stood very many men with horses attending on their masters. When we came within that gate we were within a very faire Court yard, in compasse twice so bigge as Pauls Church-yard. On the right hand of the sayd Court was a faire gallerie like an Alley, and within it were placed railles and such other prouision. On the left side was the like, halfe the Court ouer: it was diuided into two parts, the innermost fairer then the other. The other part of that side is the place where the Councell doe usually sit, and at the inner end of that is a faire place to sit in, much like vnto that place in Pauls Church-yard, where the Haioz and his brethren vse to sit, thither was our Ambassadour brought, and set in that place. Within that sayde place is another like open roome, where hee did cate. Assoone as wee came in, wee were placed in the innermost alley of the second roome, on the left side of the Court, which was spread with carpets on the ground fourescore or fourescore and tenne foot long, with an hundred and fiftie seuerall dishes set thereon, that is to say, Guntion boiled and rolled, Rice diuersly dished, Fritters of the finest fashion, and dishes daintily dight with pytty paype, with infinite others, I know not how to expresse them. We had also roasted Pennes with sundry sorts of fowles to me vnknewen. The gentlemen and we sate downe on the ground, for it is their maner so to feede. There were also Greekes and others set to furnish out the roome. Our drinke was made with Rose water and Sugar and spices brewed together. Those that did serue vs with it had a great bagge tied ouer their shoullders, with a broad belt like an arming belt full of plates of copper and gilt, with part of the sayd bagge vnder his arme, and the mouth in his hand: then he had a deuise to let it out when he would into cuppes, when we called for drinke. The Ambassadour when hee had eaten, passed by vs, with the chaufes aforesayd, and sate him downe in an inner roome. This place where he sate was against the gate where we came in, and hard by the Councell chamber end, somewhat on the left side of the Court, this was at the East end of the Court, for we came in at the West. All this time our presents stood by vs vntill we had dined, and dinner once ended, this was their order of taking vp the dishes. Certaine were called in, like those of the Blacke gard in the Court of England, the Turkes call them Moglans. These came in like rude and raucening Pastiffs, without order or fashion, and made cleane riddance: for he whose hungry eye one dish could not fill turned two, one into the other, and thus cuen on the sudden was made a cleane riddance of all. Then came certaine chaufes and brought our gentlemen to sit with the Ambassadour. Immediately came officers & appointed Janisers to beare fro vs our presents, who caried them on the right side of the Court, and set them hard by the doore of the Priuy chamber, as we call it: there all things stood for the space of an houre. Thus the Ambassadour and his gentlemen sate still, and to the Southward of them was a doore whereas the great Turke himselfe went in and out at, and on the South side of that doore sate on a bench all his chiefe lordes and gentlemen, and on the North side of the West gate stood his gard, in number as I gesse them a thousand men. These men haue on their heads round cappes of mettall like sculles, but sharpe in the toppes, in this they haue a bunch of Dridge feathers, as bigge as a brush, with the corner or edge forward: at the lower end of these feathers was there a smaller feather, like those that are commonly worn here. Some of his gard had smal stauies, & most of them were weaponed with bowes and arrowes. Here they waited, during our abode at the Court, to gard their Lord. After the Ambassadour with his gentlemen had sitted an houre and moze, there came three or foure chaufes, and brought them into the great Turkes presence. At the Priuy chamber doore two noble men tooke the Ambassadour by ech arme one, and put their fingers within his sleeves, and so brought him to the great Turke where he sumptuously sate alone. He kissed his hand and stood by vncill all the gentlemen were brought before him in like maner, one by one, and ledde backwards againe his face towards the Turke; for they might neither carry nor turne their backs, and in like maner returned the Ambassadour. The salutation that the Noble men did, was taking them by the hands. All this time they trode on cloth of golde, most of the Noble men that sate on the South side of the Priuy chamber sate like wise on cloth of golde. Many officers officers of Janifaries there were with stauces, who kept very good order, for no Turke whatsoeuer might goe any further then they willed him. At our Ambassadors entering they followed that bare his presents, to say, twelue fine broad clothes, two pieces of fine holland, tenne pieces of plate double gilt, one case of candlesticks, the case whereof was very large, and three foot high and more, two very great cannes of pots, and one lesser, one basin and ewer, two poppinlayes of silver, the one with two heads: they were to drinke in: two bottles with chaines, three faire masks in coats of redde cloth, three spaniels, two bloodhounds, one common hunting hound, two greyhounds, two little dogges in coats of silke: one clocke valued at five hundred pounds sterling: ouer it was a forrest with trees of silver, among the which were deere chased with dogs, and men on horsebacke following, men drawing of water, others carrying mine oare on barrowes: on the toppe of the clocke stood a castle, and on the castle a mill. All these were of silver. And the clocke was round beset with iewels. All the time that we stayed at the Councell chamber dooze they were telling of weighing of money to send into Persia for his Souldiours pay. There were carried out an hundred and three and thirty bags, and in euery bagge, as it was tolde vs, one thousand ducats, which amounteth to three hundred and thirty thousand *, and in sterling English money to fourescore and nineteene thousand pounds. The Captaine of the guard in the meane time went to the great Turke, and returned againe, then they of the Court made obeisance to him, bowing downe their heads, and their hands on their breasts, and he in like order resaluted them: he was in cloth of silver, he went and came with two or three with him and no more. Then wee went out at the first gate, and there we were commanded to stay untill the Captaine of the guard was passed by and all his guard with him, part before him and part behinde him, some on horsebacke and some on foot, but the most part on foot carrying on their shoulders the money before mentioned, and so we passed home. There was in the Court during our abode there, for the most part a foole resembling the first, but not naked as was the other at the Bassas: but he turned him continually, & cried Vough very hollowly. The third of May I saw the Turke go to the church: he had more then two hundred and fifty horses before and behinde him, but most before him. There were many empty horses that came in no order. Many of his Nobilitie were in cloth of golde, but himselve in white sartin. There did ride behinde him sixe or seuen pouthes, one or two whereof carried water for him to drinke as they sayd. There were many of his guard running before him and behinde him, and when he alighted, they cried Vough very hollowly, as the afore sayd foolles.

The Turke is presented with a rich present.

A letter of Mustapha Chaus to the Queenes most excellent Maiestie.

Serenissima, prudentissima, & sacra Regia Maiestas, domina mihi semper clementissima, meorum fidelium officiorum promptam paratissimamque commendationem. Generosus & virtuosus Gulielmus Hareborne legatus vestra sacra Maiestatis venit ad portam excelissimam potentissimi & inuictissimi, & semper Augustissimi Caesaris Sultan Murad Can, cui Deus omnipotens benedicat. Et quanto honore, quanta dignitate, quantaque humanitate aliorum confederatorum legati accipiuntur, praefatus quoque legatus vester tanta reuerentia, tantaque amplitudine acceptus & collocatus est in porta excelissima. Et posthac subditi & homines vestra sacra Maiestatis ad ditiones omnes Caesareae venire, & sua negocia tractare, & ad suam patriam redire sine impedimento, vt in literis excelissimi, potentissimi, & inuictissimi, & semper Augustissimi Caesaris ad vestram sacram Regiam Maiestatem datis facile patet, tranquillè & pacificè possunt. Ego autem imprimis diligentem operam & fidele studium & nunc eodem confirmando nauaui, & in futurum quoque vsque in vltimum vitae spiritum in negotijs potentissimi & inuictissimi Caesaris, & vestra sacra Regia Maiestatis egregiam nauabo operam. Quod Deus omnipotens ad emolumentum & vtilitatem vtriusque Reipublicae secundet. Amen. Sacram Regiam Maiestatem foelicissimè valere exopto. Datum Constantinopoli anno 1583, die octauo Maij.

A letter of the English Ambassadour to M. Haruie Millers, appointing him Consull for the English nation in Alexandria, Cairo, and other places of Egypt.

Having to appoint our Consull in Cayro, Alexandria, Egypt, and other parts adiacent, for the safe protection of body and goods of her Maiesties subiects; being well perswaded of your sufficient abilitie; in her Maiesties name I doe elect and make choise of you, good friend Haruie Millers, to execute the same worshopfull office; as shall be required for her Maiesties better service, the commodity of her subiects, and my contentation: hauing and inioying for merit of your trauell in the premisses the like remuneration incident to the rest of ours in such office in other parts of this Empire. Requiring you (all other affaires set aside) to repaire thither with expedition, and attend vpon this your charge, which the Almighty grant you well to accomplish. For the due execution whereof, we heere with send you the Grand Signiors Patent of priuilege with ours, and what els is needfull theretofore, in to ample maner, as any other Consull whosoever doeth or may enioy the same. In apd whereof, according to my bounden duty to her Maiesty our most gracious Mistresse, I will be ready alwayes to employ my selfe to the generall benefit of her Maiesties subiects, for your maintenance in all iust causes incident to the same. And thus elssoones requiring and commanding you as abovesayd, to perfonne my request, I bid you most heartily well to fare, and desire God to blesse you. From my mansion Rapamat nigh Pera this 25 of April 1583.

Commission giuen by M. William Hareborne the English Ambassadour, to Richard Forster, authorising him Consul of the English nation in the parts of Alepo, Damasco, Aman, Tripolis, Ierusalem, &c.

William Harborne, her Maiesties Ambassadour, Ligier with the Grand Signior, for the affaires of the Leuant doe in her Maiesties name confirme and appoint Richard Forster Gentleman, my Deputie and Consull in the parts of Alepo, Damasco, Aman, Tripolis, Ierusalem, and all other portes whatsoeuer in the prouinces of Syria, Palestina, and Iurie, to execute the office of Consull ouer all our Nation her Maiesties subiects, of what estate or qualitiy soeuer: giuing him hereby full power to defend, protect, and maintaine all such her Maiesties subiects as to him shall be obedient, in all honest and iust causes whatsoeuer: and in like case no lesse power to imprison, punish, and correct any and all such as he shall finde disobedient to him in the like causes, euen in such order as I my selfe might doe by vertue of her Maiesties Commission giuen me the 26 of Nouember 1582, the copie whereof I haue annexed to this present vnder her Maiesties Seale deliuered me to that use. Straighly charging and commanding all her Maiesties subiects in those parts, as they will auoid her Dishonour, displeasure and their owne harmes, to honour his authoritie, and haue due respect vnto the same, aiding and assisting him there with their persons and goods in any cause requisite to her Maiesties good service, and commoditie of her dominions. In witness whereof I haue confirmed and sealed these presents at Rapamat my mansionhouse by Pera ouer against Constantinople, the 20 of Iune 1583.

Duisin Forster, these few words are for your remembrance when it shall please the Almighty to send you safe arriual in Tripolis of Syria. When it shall please God to send you thither, you are to certifie our Nation at Tripolis of the certaine day of your landing, to the end they both may haue their house in a readinesse, and also meet you personally at your entrance to accompany you, being your selfe apparelled in the best maner. The next, second, or third day, after your comming, giue it out that you be crazed and not well disposed, by meanes of your trauell at Sea, during which time, you and those there are most wisely to determine in what maner you are to present your selfe to the Beglerbi, Cadi, and other officers: who euery of them are to be presented according to the order accustomed of others formerly in like office: which after the note of Iohn Blanke, late Vice-consull of Tripolis for the French, deliuered you heere with, is very much: and therefore, if theretofore you can saue any thing, I pray you doe it, as I doubt not but you will. They are to giue you there also another Tanizarie according as the French hath; whose outward proceedings you are to imitate and follow, in such sort as you bee not his inferiour, according as those of our Nation heretofore with him resident can informe you. Touching your demeanour after your placing, you are wisely to proceede considering both French and Venetian will haue an enuious eye on you: whome if they perceiue wise and well aduised, they will feare to offer you any iniurie. But if they shall perceiue any insufficiencie in you, they will not enuite any occasion to harme you. They are subtile, malicious, and dissembling people, wherefore you must alwayes haue their doings doings for suspected, and warily walke in all your actions : wherein if you call for Gods diuine assistance, as doth become euery faithfull good Chyistian, the same shall in such sort direct you as he shall be glorified, your selfe preserved, your doings blessed, and your enemies confounded. Which if contrarywise you omit and forget, your enemies malice shall be satisfied with your confusion, which God defend, and for his mercies sake keepe you. Touching any outlopers of our nation, which may happen to come thither to traffike, you are not to suffer, but to imprison the chiefe officers, and suffer the rest not to traffike at any time, and together enter in such bonds as you thinke meete, that both they shall not deale in the Grand Signiors dominions, and also not harme, during their voyage, any his subiects shippes, vessels, or whatsoeuer other, but quietly depart out of the same country without any harme doing. And touching those there for the company, you are to defend them according to your priuiledge & such commandements as you haue had hence, in the best order you may. In all and euery your actions, at any hand, beware of rashnesse and anger, after both which repentance followeth. Touching your dealings in their affaires of marchandise, you are not to deale otherwise then in secret and counsell. You are carefully to foresee the charge of the house, that the same may be in all honest measure to the companies profit and your owne health through moderation in diet, and at the best hand, and in due time to provide things needfull, to saue what may be : for he that buyeth euery thing when he needeth it, harmeth his owne house, and helpeth the retailer. So as it is, in mine opinion, wisdom to foresee the buying of all things in their native soile, in due time, and at the first hand euery yeere, as you are to send the company the particular accounts of the same expenses. Touching your selfe, you are to cause to be employed fifty or threescore ducats, videlicet, twenty in Sope, and the rest in Spices, whereof the most part to be Pepper, whereof we spend very much. The Spices are to be provided by our friend William Barrat, and the Sope buy you at your first arriual, for that this Shippe lading the same commodity will cause it to amount in price. From our mansion Rapamat, the fift of September 1583.

Ambassadour with the Grand Signior from Alger.

Right honorable, we haue receiued your honours letters dated in Constantinople the 5 of Nouember, and accordingly deliuered that inclosed to the King of this place, requiring of him, according as you did command vs in her Maiesties name, that he would vouchsafe to giue order to all his Captaines & Raies that none of them should meddle with our English shippes comming or going to or from these parts, for that they haue order not to passe by the Christian coast, but vpon the coast of Barbary, and shewing him of the charter giuen by the Grand Signior, requiring him in like case that for the better fulfilling of the amity, friendship and holy league betweene the Grand Signior and her Maiesty, he would giue vs six or six safeconducts for our ships, that meeting with any of his gallies or galliots, they might not meddle with them neither shoot at them: who made me and were he would neither giue me any safe conduct nor commission to his men of war not to meddle with them, for that he trusted to take some of them this yere, and made good account thereof. In like maner I spake to the chiefe of the Janifers and the Leuents, who made me answer, the best hope they had this yere was to take some of them, and although they haue the Grand Signiors commandement we care not therefore : for we will by policy, or one meanes or other prouoke them to shoot some ordinance, which if they do but one pierce, the peace is broken, and they be good prizes. And some of them say further, we care not for their safeconduct, for if they shew it vs, we will conuey it away, we are sure the dogs cannot be beleued against vs. The premises considered, your hono^r is with all speed to procure the Grand Signior his fauorable letters directed to Hazan, the Cady, Captaines, Janifers, & Leuents, & another like to Romadan Bassa, king of Tripolis, commanding them in no maner whatsoeuer to deale with our English ships bound into those parts or returning thence with their commodities, although they should shoot one at another : for when our ships shall meet them, for that, as your hono^r is aduertised, the gallies of Carthage, Florence, Sicilia and Malta haue made a league to take all our ships comming in or going out of the Grand Signiors dominions, therefore if they meet with any of these gallies of Alger or Tripolis, thinking they be of them, and not knowing them a far off, they may shoot at them, which if therefore they should make them prizes, were against Gods lawes, the Grand Signior his league, all reason and conscience, considering that all the world doth know that Merchants ships laden with marchandise do not seeke to fight with men of warre, but contrariwise to defend themselves from them, when they would do them harme. Wherefore if your hono^r do not get out two letters of the Grand Signior as aforesayd, & send them hither with all speed by some one of your gentlemen accompanied with a chaus of the Court, or some other of the Grand Signiors seruants, it is impossible that our English ships can escape freely from these or the Christians: for either they must of force go on the Christian coast, and so fall into their hands, or els on this coast, and fall into the kings of this towne, or Tripolis, their hands, which if they should, will neuer be recouered. And if your hono^r cannot obtaine this thing, I beseech your hono^r in the behalfe of all the English marchants (who sent me hither to follow such order as your hono^r should giue me) to certifie her Maiesty, to the end that they may be commanded to leaue off traffique, and not to lose their goods, and her poore subiects the Mariners. And thus humbly taking my leaue, I desist from troubling your hono^r. From Algier the tenth of February 1583.

A letter of M. Harborne to Mustapha, challenging him for his dishonest dealing in translating of three of the Grand Signior his commandements.

Omne Mustapha, nescimus quid sibi velit, cum nobis mandata ad finem vtillem concessa perperam reddas, quæ male scripta, plus damni, quam vtilitatis adferant: quemadmodum constat ex tribus receptis mandatis, in quibus summum aut principale deest aut aufertur. In posterum noli ita nobiscum agere. Ita enim ludibrio erimus omnibus in nostrum & tuum dedecus. Cum nos multarum actionum spem Turcicæ scripturarum in tua prudentia reponimus, ita prouidere debes, vt non eueniant huiusmodi mala. Quocirca deinceps cum mandatum aut scriptum aliquod accipias, verbum ad verbum conuertatur in Latinum sermonem, ne damnum inlequatur. Nosti multos habere nos inimicos conatibus nostris inuidentes, quorum malitiæ vestræ est prudentiæ aduersari. Hi nostri, Secretarius & minimus interpret ex nostra parte dicent in tribus illis receptis mandatis errata. Vt deinceps similes errores non eueniant precamur. Ista emendes, & cætera Srenissimæ regiæ Maiestatis negocia, vt decet vestræ conditionis hominem, melius cures. Nam vnicuique tuo officio strenuè est laborandum vt debito tramite omnia succedant: quod spero te facturum. Bene vale.

The Pasport in Italian granted to Thomas Shingleton Englishman, by the king of Algier. 1583.

Oi Assan Bascha Vicere & lochotenente e capitan della iurisdictione de Algier doniamo e concediamo libero saluo condutto a Thomas Shingleton mercadante, che possi con suo vassello e marinari de che natione se siano, e mercadantia di qual si voglia natione, andare & venire, e negoziare, e contrattare liberamente in questa citta de Algier & altri lochi de la nostra iurisdictione cosi di ponente comi di Levante: & così anchora commandiamo al capitan di mare di Algier & d' altri lochi de nostra iurisdictione, Rais de Vasselli & capitani de Levante, & altri capitani di vasselli tanto grossi como piccoli, si commanda a qual si voglia, che trouando il sopradetto Thomas Shingleton Inglese nelli mari di Genua, Francia, Napoli, Calabria, e Sardinia con suo vassello e mercantia, & homini de che nationi si siano, non gli debba molestar, ne pigliare, ne toccare cosa de nessuna maniera tanto di denare, como di qual si voglia altra robba, sotto la pena e disgratia di perder la vita & la robba: Et per quanto haueate a caro la gratia del Gran Signor nostro patrono Soltan Murates Ottomano, lo lasciate andare per suo camino senza dargli nessuno impedimento. Dato in Algieri in nostro reggio Palazzo, sigillato del nostro reggio sigillo, e fermato della gran ferma, & scritto del nostro reggio Secretario, il dì 23 de Ianaro, 1583.

The same in English.

WE Assan Bascha Viceroy and lieutenant, and captaine of the iurisdiction of Algier, giue and grant free safeconduct to Thomas Shingleton marchant, that with his ship and mariners, of what nation soeuer they be, & with his marchandize of what countrey soeuer, he may go and come, and trade & traffike freely in this city of Algier, and other places of our iurisdiction, as well of the West as of the East. And in like sort we further command the captaine of the sea of Algier, and other places of our iurisdiction, the Reiz of vessels & captaines of the Leuant, & other captaines of vessels as well great as small, who soeuer they be, we do command them, that finding the aforesayd Thomas Shingleton Englishman in the seas of Genua, France, Naples, Calabria, and and Sardinia, with his ship and merchandize, and men of what nation soeuer they be, that they molest the not, neither take nor touch any kind of thing of theirs, neither money nor any other kind of goods, vnder paine and peril of loosing of their liues and goods: and as you make account of the fauour of the Grand Signor our lord Sulran Murates Hortoman, so see you let him passe on his way without any manner of impetiment. Dated at Alger in our kingly palace, signed with our pynce-ly Signet, and sealed with our great scale, and written by our Secretarie of estate, the 23. of Februarie, 1583.

A letter written in Spanish by Sir Edward Osborne, to the king of Alger, the 20. of Iuly, 1584. in the behalfe of certaine English captiues there detained.

Vy alto y poderoso Rey,
Sea seruida voftra alteza. Como la muy alta y potentissima magestad del Gran Senor tiene hecho articulos de priuilegios con la Serenissima Magestad de nuestrá Reyna d'Inglaterra, para los vassallos della poder libremente yr y boluer, y tratar por mar y tierra en los dominios de su potentissima Magestad, Como a la clara paresee por los dichos articulos, de che embiamos el tractado al Senor Iuan Tipton nuestro commissario, para le mostrar a voftra Alteza. Contra el tenor de los quales articulos por dos galeras de su ciudad de Alger ha sido hechado al fondo en la mar vn de nuestros nauos que venia de Patras, que es en la Morea, cargado de corintes y otras mercaderias, que allá se compraron, y las mas de la gente del la matados y abogados en la mar, y el resto estan detenidos por esclauos: cosa muy contraria a los dichos articulos y priuilegios. Que es ocasion, que por esto supplicamos a voftra Alteza muy humilmente, que, pues que la potentissima magestad del Gran Sennor es seruida nos fauorescer por los dichos articulos, tambien sea seruida voftra Alteza assistirnos en ellos, otorgandonos por voftra autoridad su aiuda y fauor, segun que esperamos, para que puedan estar libres, y boluer para aca aquellos pobres hombres ansi hechos esclauos, como dicho es. Tansi mismo, que mande voftra Alteza dar orden a los capitanes, maestres y gente de las galeras, que nos dexen de aqui adelante hazer nuestro trafico con seys naos cada anno para a Turquia a los dominios del gran Sennor a paz y a salvo, por no contrariar a los dichos nuestros priuilegios, Lleuando cada vna de nuestras dichas naos por se conoscer vn salvo conuido de su alta & potentissima magestad, Y con esta voftra tan senallada merced y fauor que en esso recibieremos, quedaremos nosotros con grandissima obligation a voftra Alteza de seruirla por ello, segun que el dicho Sennor Iuan Tipton, a quien nos reportamos de todo lo demas, mejor informera voftra Alteza: Cuya serenissima persona y estado supplicamos y pidimos a Dios omnipotente prospere y acrecete con toda felicidad y honra. De la ciudad de Londres a los veynte dias de Iulio del mil y quinientos y ochenta y quatro annos.

Alfermitio de vueftra Alteza por y en nombre de todos los trasantes en Turquia, lo el Mayor de Londres, Edward Osborne.

The same in English.

Right high and mightie king,
May it please your highnesse to vnderstand, that the most high and most mightie maiestie of the Grand Signor hath confirmed certaine articles of priuileges with the most excellent maiestie of our Queene of England, that her subiects may freely go and come, and traffike by sea and land in the dominions of his most mightie maiestie, as appeareth more at large by y^e said articles, where of we haue sent the copy vnto M. Ioh. Tipton our Commisarie, to shew the same vnto your highnesse. Against the tenor of which articles, one of our ships which came from Patras which is in Morea, laden with cozanets and other merchandizes which were bought in those parts, was sunke by 2. gallies of your citie of Alger, and the greatest number of the men thereof were slain and drowned in the sea, the residue being detained as slaues: An acte very contrary to the meaning of the aforesaid articles and priuileges: which is the occasiō that by these presents we beseech your highnesse very humbly, that since it hath pleased the most mightie maiestie of the Grand Signor to fauour vs with the sayd priuileges, it would please your Highnesse in like maner to assist vs in the same, graunting vs by your authoritie, your ayde and fauour, according as our hope is, that these pooze men so detained in captiuitie, as is aforesaid, may be set at libertie, & returne into their countrey. And likewise that your highnesse would send to giue order to the captaines, matters and people of your gallies, that from hence forth they would suffer vs to vse our traffique with sixe ships perely into Turkie vnto the dominions of the Grand Signor in peace and safetie, that they do not withstand those our said privileges, every one of our foresaid ships carrying with them a passeport of his most high and most mightie maiestie to be knownen by. And for that your so singular fauour and curtesie which in so doing we shall receiue, we on our part with all bounden dutie vnto your highnesse, will seeke to honour you in that behalfe, according as the sayd master Iohn Tipton (to whom wee referre our selues touching all other circumstances) shall moze at large enforme your highnesse, whose most excellent person and estate, we pray and beseech almightie God to prosper and increase with all felicitie and honour. At the seruice of your highnesse; for and in the name of our whole company trading into Turkie, I Maior of London, Edward Osborne,

Notes concerning the trade of Alger.

The money of Alger.

The money that is coined in Alger is a piece of gold called Afiano, & Doublaes, and two Doublaes make an Afiano, but the Doubla is most vsed, for all things be sold by Doublaes, which Doubla is fiftie of their Aspers there.

The Asper there is not so good by halfe & moze, as that in Constantinople: for the Chekin of gold of the Turkes made at Constantinople is at Alger worth an 150. Aspers, and at Constantinople it is but 66. Aspers.

The pistolet and roials of plate are most currant there.

The said pistolet goeth for 130. Aspers there: & the piece of 4. roials goeth for 40. Aspers, but oftentimes is sold for moze, as men need them to carry by into Turkie.

Their Afianos and Doublaes are pieces of course gold, worth here but 40. s. the ounce, so the same is currant in no place of Turkie out of the kingdom of Alger, neither the Aspers, for that they be lesse then others be, for they come them in Alger.

The custome.

The custome to the king is inward 10. per centum, to the Turke, to be paid of the commoditie it selfe, or as it shall be rated.

There is another custome to the Ermine, of one & an halfe per centum, which is to the Iustice of the Chyistians: the goods for this custome are rated as they are for the kings custome.

Having paid custome inwards, you pay none outwards for any commoditie that you doe lade, moze then a reward to the gate keepers.

The waights.

The waight there is called a Cantare for fine wares, as mettals refined, and spices, &c. which is here 120. li. subtil.

Mettall not refined, as lead, iron, and such grosse wares, are sold by a great Cantare, which is halfe as big againe: so it is 180. li. subtil of ours here.

The measure.

The measure of cozne is by a measure called a Curtia, which is about 4. bushels of our measure, and cozne is plentiful there and good cheape, except when there hapneth a very dry yeere.

The surest lodging for a Chystian.

The surest lodging for a Chyistian there is in a Jewes house: for if he haue any hurt, the Jew and his goods shall make it good, so the Jew taketh great care of the Chyistian and his goods that lieth in his house, for feare of punishment.

An Englishman called Thomas Williams, which is John Tiptons man, lieth about trade of merchandize in the streete called The Soca of the Jewes.

Notes concerning the trade in Alexandria.

ther officer.

Alexandria in Egypt is a free port, and when a man commeth within the castles, presently the Ermyn sends aboord to haue one come and speake with him, to know what goods are aboord: and then hee will set guards aboord the ship to see all the goods discharged. And then from the Ermin you goe to the * Bye, onely for that he will inquire newes of you, and so from thence to the Consuls house where you lie. The Venetians haue a Consul themselves. But all other nations goe to the French nations Consul, who will giue you a chamber for your selues apart, if you will so haue it.

Other small customs you pay besides, which may be at two in the hundred:
and for Cons.
sullage you pay two in the hundred.

The customs inward of all commodities are ten in the hundred, & the custome is paid in wares also that you buy: for the same wares in barter you pay also ten in the hundred, at the lading of the wares. But if you sell for money, you pay no moze custome but the ten aforesaid, and one and a half in the hundred, which is for the custome of the goods you lade for the sayd money, for moze custome you pay not. But for all the money you bring thither, you pay nothing for the custome of the same. And if you sell your wares for money, and with the same money buy wares, you pay but two in the hundred for the custome thereof. And if you steale any custome, if it be taken, you pay double custome for that you steale.

The

The weight of Alexandria is called Pois Fortoreine, which is a kintal in that place, which maketh at Marfeils 109, li. of Marfeils waight, at 15 ounces the pound, which is 103, li. of 16. ounces to the li. There is another waight called Pois Gernin, which is 150, li. of Marfeils waight, by which are sold all things to eate: but spice is sold by the former waight.

From Alexandria to Cairo is three daies iourney, but you must take a Janissarie with you: & to go by thither by water it is 8. daies iourney. Roiats of Spaine are currant mony there, and are the best money you can cary. And 4. roiats are woorth 13. Medins, and 2. Medins, are 3. Aspers. Pisolets and crownes of France and Dollers will goe, but of all Roiats are best.

Rice is not permitted to goe out of the land, but is kept for a victuall. But with a present to the Bye and Ermine some may passe.

All sortes of spices be garbled after the bargain is made, and they be *Moore*s which you deale withall, which be good people and not ill disposed. And after you be searched & haue leaue to passe, you must presently depart out of the port, and if you doe not, they will search you againe. And you must depart in the day, for in the night the castles will not suffer you to depart. The ductie to the Consul is 2. in the hundred, for his aide, and meate and drinke and all. And the port of Alexandria is good when one is within it with good ankers and cables, Silver is better currant then gold in Alexandria, but both are good.

Commonly the Carauans come thither in October from Mecca to Cairo, and from thence to Alexandria, where the merchants be that buy the spices, and therefore the spices are brought most to Alexandria, where each Christian nation remaineth at the Consuls houses. Yet oftentimes the christians go by to Cairo to buy drugs & other commodities there, as they see cause. And the commodities there vendible are all sortes of herbes, but the most part blowes, and of clothes all colours except mingled colours and blacks. Pepper is usually sold for 24. ducats the quintal, Ginger for 14. ducats. You must take canvas to make bags to put your commoditie in from Alexandria, for there is none. There is also fine flaxe, and good stoe of Susse hides.

Cairo three
from Alexandria by land.

A letter of the English ambassador to M. Edward Barton.

M After Barton I send you 3. commandements in Turkish, with a copy thereof in English, to the ende our ships might not come in danger of breach of league, if they should hoot at the gallies of those of Algier, Tunis, and Tripolis in the West: which after you haue shewed the Bassas, receiue againe into your hands, and see them registred, and then deliuer one of them to our friend M. Tipron, & the like you are to do with the priuilege which you cary with you, and see them jointly registred in the Cadies booke, deliuering the copy of the said priuilege sealed by the Cadi, also to the sayd our friend M. Tipron, taking a note of his hand for the receipt thereof, and for deliuerie at all times to vs or our assignes. And require them in her maiesties and the grand Signois name, that they will haue our ships passing too and fro vnder licence and safeconduct for recommended in friendly maner. Touching your proceedings in Tripolis with Romadan, as I haue not receiued any aduise thereof, since your departure, so must I leaue you to God and my former directi. The ship patronised of Hassan Rayes, which you wrote to be ours, prooued to be a Catalonian. As for ours, by report of that Hassan and other Iewes in his ship, it was affirmed to be sold to the Malceses, which with the rest you are to receiue there. And hauing ended these affaires and registred our priuilege, and these three commandements, in Tripolis, Tunis, and Algier, I pray you make speedy returne, and for that which may be recovered, make ouer the same either to Richard Rowed for Patrasso in Morea, or otherwise hither to Iohn Bate in the surest maner you may, if the registring of that your priuilege and these commandements will not suffer you in person to returne with the same. From my Mansion Rapamat in Pera this 24. of June 1584.

The commandement obtained of the Grand Signior by her Maiesties ambassador M. Will. Harborne, for the quiet passing of her subiects to and fro his dominions, sent in An. 1584. to the Viceroyes of Algier, Tunis & Tripolis in Barbary.

To our Beglerbeg of Algier.

W E certifie thee by this our commandement, that the right honorable Will. Harborne ambassador to the Queenes maiestie of England hath signified vnto vs, that the ships of that countrey in their coming and returning to and from our Empire, on the one part of the Seas haue the Spaniards, Florentines, Sicilians and Malceses, on the other part our countreis committed to your charge: which abovesaid Christians will not quietly suffer their egress and regress, into, and out of our dominions, but doe take and make the men cap-

times, and forſeit the ſhippes and goods, as the laſt yeere the Malteſes did one, which they tooke at Gerbi, and to that end do continually lie in wait for them to their deſtruction, whereupon they are conſtrained to ſtand to their defence at any ſuch time as they might meet with them. Wherefore conſidering by this means they muſt ſtand vpon their guard, when they ſhall ſee any gallie aſſe off, whereby if meeting with any of your gallies and not knowing them, in their defence they do ſhoot at them, and yet after when they doe certainly know them, do not ſhoote any more, but require to paſſe peaceably on their voyage, which you would deny, ſaying, the peace is broke becauſe you haue ſhot at vs, and ſo make prize of them contrary to our priuileges, and againſt reaſon: for the preventing of which inconuenience the ſaid ambaffador hath required this our commandement. We therefore command thee, that vpon ſight hereof thou doe not permit any ſuch matter in any ſort whatſoeuer, but ſuffer the ſayd Engliſhmen to paſſe in peace according to the tenour of our commandement giuen, without any diſturbance or let by any means vpon the way, although that meeting with thy gallies, and not knowing them aſſe off, they taking them for enemies ſhould ſhoot at them, yet ſhall you not ſuffer them to hurt them theſe, but quietly to paſſe. Wherefore looke thou that they may haue right, according to our priuilege giuen them, & finding any that abſenteth himſelf, & will not obey this our commandement, preſently certifi vs to our poſt, that we may giue order for his puniſhment, and with reuerence giue faithfull credite to this our commandement, which hauing read, thou ſhalt againe returne it vnto them that preſent it. From our place in Conſtantinople, the 1. of June 1584.

A letter of the honorable M. Will. Harborne her maiesties ambaff. with the grand Signior to M. Tipton, appointing him Conſul of the Engliſh in Algier, Tunis, & Tripolis of Barbarie.

M After Tipton, I haue receiued among others, yours of the 10. of Nouember 1584. by Soliman Sorda, certifying the receipt of mine of the 24. of June 1584. with the 3. commandements, which not being regiſtered, let it now be done. Where you write the force of the priuilege to be broken by our ſhips in ſhooting, & therefore be lawfully taken, you are deceiued, for of thoſe taken in theſe, hath the grand Signior now deliuered vs free, Wil. Moore, and Rob. Rawlings, & further promiſed the reſt in like caſe, whereſoeuer they be, & that hereafter no violence ſhall be ſhewed, conſidering ours be merchants ſhips which go peaceably in their voyage, & were ignorant of the orders of Algier, neither knew aſſe off whether they were friends or the Chriſtians gallies in league againſt vs, of whom they moſt doubt, who not ſuffering our ſhips to come into theſe parts, will make prize of the goods & captiue the men, ſo as they are not to let them come nigh them: & ſince ours haue not done contrary to the articles of the ſame priuilege, wherein is no order for Algier preſcribed vs, as both by the originall now ſent vs, & alſo by the copy now ſent you from London you may perceiue, they according to right are as abſolutely to be ſet free, and their goods reſtozed, which if it be not there accompliſhed as the grand Signior hath now commanded & moſt faithfully promiſed, neither yet in caſe of their denial, thoſe offenders puniſhed here, and our iniuries redreſſed, we are to demand our Congie, & command our merchants her maiesties ſubiects, to end their traffike here, which in our countrey commodities is proued & found by the grand Signior to be ſo beneficial to his countries as we are aſſured ſo well thereof, as alſo for the honor which his anceſſors neuer had of frieſhip to ſo mighty a prince as is her maiesty, he wil not but maintaine the faith promiſed her, & the intercoure in due force. And where you ſay by the grand Signior his letters, in the behalf of the French, were no more accepted there, then of a mean man, nor tooke no place, that is not material to vs, our letters are after another ſort much more effectually. For our caſe & theirs be found far different, in that they be not onely now out of fauour with him, but alſo the commodities which they bring hither, as ſugar, paper, bracelets, ropes of baſt almonds, &c. all which may be here wel ſpared, & we contrarily ſo wel eſteemed, as he neuer denied vs any thing ſince our coming demanded, which neither their ambaffador, nor the Venecian could haue here, & therefore we reſt perſwaded, knowing the wiſdom of the Begleibeg, who is aduiſed by his frieſds from hence, of this our credite to his maſter, he wil ſo reſpect his commandements, as to accompliſh the tenor thereof according to our deſire. And where you ſay by the Janizers rule all there, I know right wel that things be not done as the grand Signior commanded, his lieutenant muſt anſwer it. And therefore I am fully perſwaded if he doe what he may they dare not reſiſt him, for if they ſhould, thoſe rebels ſhould not be unpuniſhed of the grand Signior. And though they ſpeake their pleaſures among themſelues there, yet they be not ſo brutiſh, but they wel conſider that their maſter the grand Signior may not be gainſaid or mocked of any. For vpon his word dependeth the life or death eue of the chiefſt, as I haue ſcene ſince my coming hither. So whatſoeuer theſe Janizaries ſay, they will be better aduiſed in their deedes then to withſtand their Viceroy, if he himſelfe wil vſe his lawfull power, which if hee doe not, hee cannot purge himſelfe here of their euill proceedings againſt the grand Signiors friends: for the ſeet may not rule the bodie, but contrary wiſe, the

the head, the feete, and all the rest of the members. And for that neither for feare, affection or otherwise you omit as a faithfull true subiect to her maiestie to do your dutie, I do by my warrant going herewith charge you, & in her maiesties name, to the uttermost to vie your good and faithfull endeavour, as becommeth a true subiect, & in all things that may concerne her maiesties good service, assisting the Chaus with the rest of our messengers in counsel, trauel, & what els shall be thought requisite for your good discharge of your dutie. And to y^e end you may boldly proceed herein as also for the good opinion Sir Edward Osborne & the company haue of you, and I no lesse perswaded of your wisdom, byright dealing, & good experience in those parts, do send you herewith the grand Signiors & our patents for exercising the office of Consul there, in Tripolis & Tunis: by vertue of which authoritie you may without feare proceed as the office doeth challenge in defence of our privilege, to redresse all iniuries offered our nation. Which if you cannot get reformed there of y^e Beglerbies upon your complaint, I thereof aduertised, shall doe it here, and to the uttermost maintaine you in al rightfull causes whatsoeuer, doubt you not. And hereafter according to your aduise, I wil and do giue our ships order not to fight with any gallies of Alger, but to hoist out their skiffe and and go aboard to shew them their safer conduct, & to present the captain with a garment, & you there in such like case are to take order that they do not forceably take any thing from them. Nothing doubting but the Viceroy (whose friendship in her maiesties behalfe I desire) will not onely perforce me the same your iust request, & according to right, restore to libertie our men since the privilege taken, but also cause those y^e tooke & sunke our ships to answere the value, which I haue let downe truly, and rather with the least in the Inuentorie translated into Turkish, whereof the inclosed is the copy in English, which I send to the end you may be the better informed of my demand by this our Chaus Mahomet, with whom in all things you are to conferre of matters expedient, for the honour of her maiesties country, & the commoditie, and libertie of poore captiues, which if the Viceroy do wel consider, according to his wisdom, as the grand Signior doeth thereof, he shall wel perceive it not onely a great honour to his master as aforesaid, to continue this amitie with her maiestie, but chiefly to the whole estate of his kingdom exceeding profitable, which by this means shall be abundantly serued with the chiefest commodities they want, with many other things of moze importance to the grand Signior his contentation, not herein to be mentioned. For I know the Viceroyes experienced wisdom can wel consider thereof, in such sort as he wil not deny to accomplish his masters commandement, & our earnest request in so smal a matter as this we require, whereof I expect no refusal: for thereby he shall increase his honour with the grand Signior, be in credite with her maiestie, be void of trouble which hereafter by future suite against him may happen, and his gallies free of such doubtful issue as doeth chance, fighting without ships. Which, as it is well known to all the world, haue so great hearts as neuer cowardly to yeeld to their enemies. And that therefore in that respect (after the proverbe, like esteeme of their like) they are the moze of such a valiant prince as is their Viceroy and his couragious souldiers to be in all friendship cherished and better esteemed. If the captaine Bassa had bene returned from Capha, I would in like manner haue procured his letters, which for that he is not, I doubt nothing but that the grand Signiors will suffice. Thus commending your selfe and these proceedings to the almighty his merciful direction, I bid you most heartily wel to fare. From my mansion Rapamaugh Pera, this 30. of March 1585.

The Inuentorie of our ships and goods sunke and taken by the gallies of Alger.

To Assan Aga, Eunuch & Treasurer to Hassan Bassa king of Alger, which Assan Aga was the sonne of Fran. Rowlie of Bristow merchant, taken in the Swallow.

R Received your letters of Will. Hamor gentleman my seruant very thankfully, as well for the seruent faith that by his report I heare you haue in our lord Iesus Christ, by whose onely merits and bloodshedding, you together with vs and all other good Christians so truly beleeuing, shalbe saued, as also for your faithfull obedience like a true subiect to her Maiestie, naturally loning your countrey & countreyemen, declared in your fauourable furtherance of the said Wil. Hamor, procuring their redemption. Of which your good & vertuous actions, as I reioice to vnderstand, so wil I impart the same to your singuler commendation, both to our mistresse her Maiestie, & her most honorable counsellers the nobilitie of England, to whom assure your selfe the report shalbe very welcome. And now this second time I am inforced by duetie to God & her maiesty, as also by the final regard your master had of the Grand Signors former commandements, to complaine vnto him, though not so vehemently as I had occasion by his most vnwoorthy answer. But I hope, & the rather by your means, he will not contrary this second commandement, threatening him, not obseruing the same, losse of office & life. The due execution whereof by your vertuous & careful industry procured, wil manifest to all the world, especially to her maiesty, & me her ambassadoz, your true christian mind & English heart, intenuely bent to Gods honor, & the libertie of the poore men, for which I trust you be ordained another Ioseph, to follow his example in true pietie, in such sort that not withstanding your body be subiect to Turkish thraldom, yet your vertuous mind free frō those vices, next vnder God addict to y good seruice of your liege Lady & soueraigne princes, her most excellent maiesty, wil continually seeke by all good means to manifest y same in this & the like faithfull seruice to your singuler commendation, wherby both my selfe & others in that place hauing found you in all good offices faithfullly affectionated, may in like case perfoyme the like towards you, when & where you may haue occasion to vse me: which as I for my part do assuredly promise, & wil no lesse faithfullly perfoyme; so accordingly I expect here in, and hereafter the like of you, whom most heartily saluted I commend to the diuine tuition and holy direction. From my house Rapamar, this 28. of June 1586.

Your louing and good friend her Maiesties Ambassador with the Grand Signor, Will. Harborne.

A petition

A petition exhibited to the Viceroy for reformation of sundry injuries offered our nation in Morea, as also for sundry demaundes needfull for the establishing of the traffike in those parts.

1 Ift that our people may be freed of such wonted molestation, as the Janissers of Patrosso haue alwayes from time to time offered them, not regarding the kings commandements to the contrary. That they be removed and called away from thence, and none other remaine in their place.

2 That where heretofore the kings commandements haue bene graunted to ours, that no person whatsoeuer shall forceably take from them any of their commodities, other wise then paying them before the deliuerie thereof, for the same in ready money, at such price as they themselves will, and sell ordinarily to others, as also that no officer whatsoeuer, of the kings or any other, shall force them to buy any commodities of that countrey, other wise then the needfull, at their owne will and pleasure, that the said commandements not heretofore obeyed may be renewed with such straight charge for the execution of the same, as is requisite for their due effect.

3 That whereas sundry exactions and oppressions be offered ours by such Byes, Sanjacbies, iustices and Cadies, Ianizaries, Capagies, and others, officers of the kings comming downe into those parts, who finding there resident no other nation but only ours, will vnder the name of presents forceable take from them what they please: We do require to obuent these harmes, it may be specified by a commandement from the king to which of such his officers, presents may be giuen, and their sundry valnes, whereby both they and ours may rest contented, leucrely prohibiting in the said commandement, that they take no more then that appointed them, and that no other officers but those onely specified in that commaundment, doe forcibly require of them any thing whatsoeuer.

4 That the Nadir and Custome of the port, hauing permitted our ship to lade, doe not after demand of the marchants any other then the outward custome due to the king for the same goods, And being so laden, may by them and the Cadie with other their inferiour officers be visited, requiring for the visiting no more then formerly they were accustomed to pay at their first comming. After which the said ship to depart at the Consuls pleasure, without any molestation of them, or any other officer whatsoeuer.

5 That Mahomet Chaus, sometime Nadir of Lepanto, and Azon Agon his substitute being with him may be severely punished to the example of others, for often and vniuersally molesting our nation, contrarie to the kings commandement, which they disdainefully contemned, as also that the said Mahomet restore and pay vnto ours thirtie for 300 sackes of currants nowe taken forcibly out of a barke, comming thither from the hither partes of Morea, to pay the king his custome, and that from hence forth, neither the said Mahomet, Azon Agon, nor any other officer or person whatsoeuer doe hinder or trouble any of ours going thither or to any other place about ther affaires.

6 That whereas certaine Jewes of Lepanto owing money to our marchants for commodities sold them, haue not hitherto satisfied them, notwithstanding ours had from the king a commandement for the recovery of the same debts; but fled and absented themselves out of the Towne at the comming of the same, another more forcible commaundement may be graunted ours, that for nonpayment, whatsoeuer may be found of theirs in goods, houses, vineyards, or any other thing, may be sold, and ours satisfied of their said debt, according to equitie and reason.

A commandement to Patrosso in Morea.

When this commandement shall come vnto you, know you, that the Consull of the English Nation in our port of Patrosso, hath giuen vs to vnderstand, that formerly we granted him a commandement that hauing paid once custome for the currants bought to lade in their ships, they shall not pay it againe: according to which they bringing it to the port of Patrosso, inforcing thereof Mahomet the Nadir of Lepanto, he contrary to the tenor thereof and former order, doth againe take another custome of him, and requiring him to know why he so did contrary to our commandement, he answered vs, he tooke it not for custome, but for a present. Forcouer the sayd Consull certified vs how that the said Nadir contrary to to ancient custome doth not take for the kings right as he ought currents, but will haue of the poore men money at his pleasure, and therewith buyeth currents at a very low price, which after he doth forcibly sell to vs at a much higher price, saying it is remainder of the goods of the king, and by this means doth hurt the poore men and do them wrong. Therefore I command you by this my commandement, that you looke to this matter betweene this Consull, the Nadir, and this people, and do therein equally according to right. And see that our commandement in this matter be observed in such sort, as they having once in the port paid full custome, do not pay it againe, neither that this Nadir do take any more money of them by the way of present, for that therein it is most certaine he doth them iniurie contrary to the Canon. And if with you shall be found to the value of one Asper taken heretofore wrongfully of them, see it presently restored to them, without any default. And from henceforth let it be that he doe neither him nor his people wrong, but that he deale with them in all things according to our Canon, that the Consull and his hereafter haue no occasion any more to complaine here in our Court, and that the Nadir proceed in gathering coyants of the people after the old order and not otherwise. This know you for certaine, and giue credit to this my commandement, which having read deliuer againe into the Consuls handes. From Constantinople the yeere of Mahomet 993.

A commandement for Chio.

Vobis, Beg & Cadi & Ermini, qui estis in Chio, significamus: quod serenissimæ Regineæ Maiestatis Angliæ orator, qui est in excelsa porta per literas significauit nobis, quod ex nauibus Anglicis una nauis venisset ad portum Chio, & illinc Constantinopolim recto cursu uoluisset venire, & contra priuilegium detinuitis, & non fuisistis venire. Hec prædictus orator significauit nobis: & petiuit a nobis in hoc negotio hoc mandatum, ut naues Anglicæ veniant & redeant in nostras ditiones Cæsareas, Priuilegium datum & concessum est ex parte Serenitatis Cæsareæ nostræ: & huius priuilegij copia data est sub insigni nostro: Et contra nostrum priuilegium Cæsareum quod ita agitur, quæ est causa? Quando cum hoc mandato nostro homines illorum ad vos uenerint ex prædicta Anglia, si nauis uenerit ad portum vestrum, & si res & merces ex naue exemerint, & vendiderint, & tricesimam secundam partem reddiderint, & res quæ manserint Constantinopolim auferre velint, patiantur: Et si aliquis contra priuilegium & articulos eius aliquid ageret, non sinatis, nec vos facite: & impediri non sinatis eos, ut rectè Constantinopolim venientes in suis negotiationibus sine molestia esse possint. Et quicumque contra hoc mandatum & priuilegium nostrum aliquid fecerit, nobis significate. Huic mandato nostro & insigni fidem adhibete. In principio mensis Decembris,

A commandement for Baliabadram.

Serenissimæ Regineæ Angliæ orator literis supplicatorijs in porta nostra fulgida significauit, quod Baliabadram venientes mercatores, naues & homines eorum, contra priuilegium impedirentur & molestantur. Inter nos enim & Reginam cum fœdus sit, ut mercatores, homines & naues eorum contra priuilegium impediatur aut molestantur, nullo vnquam pacto concedimus. Mandamus igitur, ut literæ nostræ Cæsareæ, quàm primum tibi exhibitz fuerint, has in persona propria cures, secundum quod conuenit, videasq; ex Anglia Baliabadram cum mercibus venientibus mercatoribus, & alias ob causas venientibus hominibus, in summa Angliensibus & nauibus eorum, & in nauibus existentibus mercibus & rebus contra fœdus & priuilegium, iniuria, vis aut damnum non inferatur: sed, ut conuenit, defendas, ut naues, mercatores, & homines, nostri velut proprii subditi, liberi ab omni vi & iniuria permaneant, & negotijs suis incumbant. Et quod illius loci Ianissarij illos impedirent, significatum est: ut illi illis nocumento sint nullo modo concedimus. Iuxta tenorem mandati huius illos commouefacias, ut nihil quicquam contra fœdus faciant, ita ut nunquam huiusmodi querela huc veniat, quia quicquid acciderit, a te expostulabimus. Negligentiam postponito, & insigni Cæsareo fidem adhibeto.

A commaundement for Egypt.

Scito, quod orator Regineæ Angliæ in porta mea existens libellum supplicem ad portam nostram mittens significauit, quod cum ex Ægypto Consul eorum abesset, Consul illic Gallicus existens, Vento nuncupatus, quamuis ante hæc tempora ne manus in Anglos mitteret mandatum nostrum fuerit datum, Angli sub vexillo & tutela nostra sunt iniquens, mandatum Cæsareum vili existimans, non cessauit perturbare Anglos. Quare scito quod Regineæ Angliæ priuilegium nostrum est datum. Iuxta illud priuilegium Anglis nulla ratione Consul Gallicus Consulatum agat, neue manus immittat, mandatum nostrum postulationi eius legatus. Quare mando, ut contra priuilegium nostrum Consul Gallicus Anglis iniuriam non inferat, neue Consulatum agat. Iudici Ægypti literæ nostræ sunt datæ: hanc ob causam mando tibi quoque, ut iuxta illud mandatum nostrum, contra priuilegium nostrum Anglis Gallum Consulatum agere nunquam patiare. Sic scito, & insigni meo fidem adhibeto.

A commaundement of the Grand Signior to the Cadie or Iudge of Alexandria.

THe Embassadour for the Queenes most excellent Maiestie of England certified vs howe that at the death of one of their marchants in Alexandria called Edward Chamberlaine, the French Consull Vento sealing up his fornegoe and chamber, tooke vnder his scale all his goods and marchandise into his power, and required our commaundement that all the goods might be restituted againe according to iustice vnto the Englishmen: wherefoze we commaund you that hauing receiued this our commaundement, you assemble those of the one part and of the other together, and if it be not passed fure perces, if you haue not looked to it heretofore, now carefully looke to it, & if it be according to their Arz or certificate presented vnto vs, that the fore said French Consull Vento hath wrongfully taken into his power the goods of the deceased English marchant vnder his scale, that then you cause him to restore all the said goods and marchandise sealed by him, and make good that which is thereof wanting vnto the English marchants: doe in this matter according to iustice, and credite this our scale.

A commaundement to the Bassa of Alexandria.

THe Embassadour for the Queenes most excellent Maiestie of England by supplication certified vs, how that notwithstanding our priuilege granted them to make Consuls in al partes of our dominions to gouerne their nation according to their owne custome & law, to defend them against all wrongs and iniuries whatsoeuer; yet that the French Consull affirming to thee that art Bassa, that they were vnder his banner, and that he should gouerne them, and ouersee their businesse, and hauing got a new priuilege, mentioning therein the English men to be vnder his banner, did by all meanes molest & trouble them, insomuch that their Consull oppressed with many iniuries fled away, and that thou which art Beglerbie didst maintaine the French Consull herein; wherupon the Embassadour required our commaundement, that they might haue iustice for these iniuries: wherefoze we commaund thee that hauing receiued this our commaundement, you examine diligently that his priuilege, and send the copie thereof hither, and if it be found that the French Consull Vento hath by subtiltie got the aforesaid priuilege written, that you then see him punished, and suffer not hereafter the French or Venetian Consuls to intermeddle with their businesse. Obey this our commaundement, and giue credite to the scale.

A commaundement to the Byes, and Cadies of Metelin and Rhodes, and to all the Cadies and Byes in the way to Constantinople.

TO the Saniakbies of Rhodes and Metelin, to the Saniakbies bordering on the sea-coast, and to the Cadies in Rhodes and Metelin, and to the Ermins in the other ports and coastes. This commaundement comming to you, know that the Embassadour of England required of vs our commaundement that their ships comming to Chio, & from thence to Constantinople, no man should hurt them or offer any violence, either in the way on the sea or on the land, or in the portes. I haue commaunded, that their ships comming to any of the said places or portes with marchandise, if they themselves will, they may sell their commodities, & as much, and as little as they will, and if it be in a place where custome was not wont to be taken, hauing taken the custome due by the olde Canon you suffer them not to bee iniured, either in the way, portes, or other places, but that they may come in quietnesse to Constantinople, and certifie vs of those that be disobedient to our commaundement, and giue credite to our scale. And hauing read this our commaundement, giue it to them againe.

A commaundement for Aleppo.

When my letters shal come vnto you, know that the Queene of England her Embassadour by supplication certified how that before this time we had giuen our commaundement that the summe of 70 ducats, & other marchandize belonging to one William Barret in Aleppo, now dead, saying he was a Venetian, should be giuen to the Venetians. And if they did find that he was not a Venetian, my will was that they should send all his goods and marchandize to our port into my treasure. But because that man was an Englishman, the Embassadour required that the sayde goods might not be diminished, but that they might be restored to one of their Englishmen. This businesse was signified vnto vs in the nine hundred ninety & fourth yere of Mahomet, and in the moneth of May the 10 day, This businesse pertained to the Englishmen, who have in their handes our privilege, according to which privilege being in their handes let this matter be done, Against this privilege do nothing, aske nothing of them, but restore to every one his goods. And I command that when my commandment shall come unto you, you doe according to it. And if it be according as the Ambassadour certifieth, and that they have the privilege, peruse the same, looke that nothing be committed against it and our league, and let none trouble them contrarie to it, restore them their goods according to iustice, and take heede diligently in this businesse: if another strange marchant be dead, and his goods and marchandize be taken, if he be neither Venetian, nor Englishman, let not his goods perish among you. Before this time one of our Chaufes called Cerkes Mahomer chaus was sent with our commandment to sende the monney and marchandize of a dead marchant to our port, and hitherto no letters or newes is come of this matter, for which you shall be punished. Wherefore beware, and if he that is dead be neither Venetian nor Englishman in veritie, doe not loose the goods of the said dead marchant under the name of a Venetian or Englishman, doe not to the discommoditie of my treasure, for after it will be hard to recourt it.

The voyage made to Tripolis in Barbarie, in the yeere 1583. with a ship called the Iesus, wherein the adventures and distresses of some Englishmen are truly reported, and other necessary circumstances obserued. Written by Thomas Sanders.

This voyage was set forth by the right worshipfull sir Edward Osborne knight, chiefe merchant of all the Turkish company, and one master Richard Staper, the ship being of the burden of one hundred tunnes, called the Iesus, she was builded at Farmne a river by Portsmouth. The owners were master Thomas Thomson, Nicholas Carnaby, and John Gilman. The master was one Aches Hellier of Black-wall, and his Mate was one Richard Morris of that place: their Pilot was one Anthonie Ierado a Frenchman, of the prouince of Marseils: the purser was one William Thomson our owners sonne: the merchants factors were Romane Sonnings a Frenchman, and Richard Skegs seruante unto the said master Staper. The owners were bound unto the merchants by charter partie thereupon, in one thousand markes, that the said ship by Gods permission should goe for Tripolis in Barbarie, that is to say, first from Portsmouth to Newhauen in Normandie, from thence to S. Lucar, other wise called Saint Lucas in Andeluzia, and from thence to Tripolie, which is in the East part of Africa, and so to returne unto London. But here ought every man to note and consider the workes of our God, that many times what man doth determine God doth disappoint. The said master hauing some occasion to goe to Farmne, tooke with him the Pilot and the Purser, and returning againe by means of a perrie of winde, the boat wherein they were, was drowned, with the said master, the purser, and all the company: onely the said Pilot by experience in swimming saued himselfe: these were the beginnings of our sorowes. After which the said masters mate would not proceed in that voyage, and the owner hearing of this misfortune, and the unwillingnesse of the masters mate, did send downe one Richard Deimond, and shipped him for master, who did chuse for his Mate one Andrew Dier, and so the said ship departed on her voyage accordingly: that is to say, about the 16 of October, in An. 1583, she made saile from Portsmouth, and the 18 day then next following she arrived at Newhauen, where our saide last master Deimond by a surfeit died. The factors then appointed the said Andrew Dier, being then masters mate, to be their master for that voyage, who did chuse to be his Mates the two quarter masters of the same ship, to wit, Peter Aufine, and Shillabey, and for Purser was shipped one Richard Burges. Afterward about the 8 day of November we made saile forthward, and by force of weather we were driuen backe againe into Portsmouth, where we renewed our victuals and other necessaries, and then the winde came faire. About the 29 day then next following we departed thence, and the first day of December by means of a contrarie winde, wee were driuen to Plimmouth. The 18 day then next following, we made forthward againe, & by force of weather we were driuen to Falmouth, where we remained untill the first day of January: at which time the winde coming faire, we departed thence, and about the 20 day of the said moneth we arrived safely at S. Lucar. And about the 9 day of March next following, we made saile from thence, and about the 18 day of the same moneth we came to Tripolis in Barbarie, where we were verie well intertaind by the king of that countrey, and also of the commons. The commodities of that place are sweete oiles: the king there is a merchant, and the rather (willing to preferre himselfe before his commons) requested our said factors to traffique with him, and promised them that if they would

would take his oiles at his owne price, they should pay no maner of custome, and they tooke of him certaine tunnes of oile : and afterwarde perceiuing that they might haue farre better cheape notwithstanding the custome free, they desired the king to licence them to take the oiles at the pleasure of his commons, for that his price did exceede theirs : whereunto the king would not agree, but was rather contented to abate his price, in so much that the factors bought all their oyles of the king custome free, and so laden the same aboord.

In the meane time there came to that place one Miles Dickenson in a ship of Bristow, who together with our said factors tooke a house to themselves there. Our French factor Romane Sonnings desired to buy a commodity in the market, and wanting money, desired the said Miles Dickenson to lend him an hundred Chikinoes untill he came to his lodging, which he did, and afterwarde the same Sonnings mette with Miles Dickenson in the streete, and deliuered him money bound up in a napkin: saying, master Dickenson there is the money that I borrowed of you, and so thanked him for the same: hee doubted nothing lesse then fals-hood, which is seldome knowne among marchants, and specially being together in one house, and is the more detestable betweene Christians, they being in Turkie among the heathen. The said Dickenson did not tell the money presently, untill he came to his lodging; and then finding nine Chikinoes lacking of his hundred, which was about threepenny, for that euery Chikino is woorth seven shillings of English money, he came to the sayde Romane Sonnings and deliuered him his handkerchiefe, and asked him how many Chikinoes hee had deliuered him: Sonnings answered, an hundred: Dickenson said no: and so they protested and swore on both partes. But in the end the sayd Romane Sonnings did swear deeply with detestable othes and curses, and prayed God that hee might see his workes on him, that other might take ensample thereby, and that he might be hanged like a dogge, and neuer come into England againe, if he did not deliuer unto the sayde Dickenson an hundred Chikinoes. And here behold a notable example of all blasphemers, cursers and swearers, how God rewarded him accordingly: for many times it cometh to passe, that God sheweth his miracles vpon such monstrous blasphemers, to the ensample of others, as now hereafter you shall heare what befell to this Romane Sonnings.

Another ship of Bristow came to Tripolis.

There was a man in the said towne a pledge, whose name was Patrone Norado, who the yere before had done this Sonnings some pleasure there. The foresaid Patrone Norado was indebted unto a Turke of that towne, in the summe of foure hundred and fiftie crownes, for certain goods sent by him into Chiffendome in a ship of his owne, and by his owne brother, and himselfe remained in Tripolis as pledge untill his said brothers returne: and, as the report went there, after his brothers arrivall into Chiffendome, he came among lewde companie, and lost his brothers said ship and goods at sea, and neuer returned unto him againe.

The said Patrone Norado being voyde of all hope, and finding now opportunitie, consulted with the said Sonnings for to swimme a sea boorde the Ilands, and the ship being then out of danger, should take him in (as after was confessed) and so to goe to Tolon in the prouince of Marsailis with this Patrone Norado, and there to take in his lading.

A conspiracy practised by the French Factor, to describe a Turke's marchant of 450 crowns

The shippe being readie the first day of May, and hauing her sayles all aboord, our sayde factors did take their leaue of the king, who very courteously biddeth them farewell, and when they came aboord, they commaunded the Master and the companie hastily to get out the ship: the Master answered that it was impossible, for that the winde was contrary and overblowne. And he required vs vpon forfeiture of our bandes, that we should doe our endeavour to get her forth. Then went wee to warpe out the shippe; and presently the king sent a boate aboord of vs, with three men in her, commaunding the said Sonnings to come a shore: at whose coming, the king demanded of him custome for the oyles: Sonnings answered him that his highnesse had promised to deliuer them custome free. But notwithstanding the king weighed not his said promise, and as an insidell that hath not the feare of God before his eyes, nor regarde of his worde, albeit hee was a king, hee caused the sayde Sonnings to pay the custome to the uttermost penie. And afterwarde willed him to make haste away, saying, that the Ianizaries would haue the oyle ashore againe.

These Ianizaries are souldiers there vnder the great Turke, and their power is about the Kings. And so the said Factor departed from the king, and came to the water side, and called for a boate to come aboord, and he bought with him the foresaid Patrone Norado. The companie inquisitive to know what man that was, Sonnings answered, that he was his countrepain, a passenger: I pray God said the companie, that we come not into trouble by this man. Then said Sonnings angerly, what haue you to do with any matters of mine? if any thing chance otherwise then well, I must answer for all.

The beginning of their troubles, and occasion of all their miserie.

Nowe the Turke unto whom this Patrone Norado was indebted, missing him (supposed him him to be aboord of our shippe) presently went vnto the King, and tolde him that hee thought that his pledge Patrone Norado was aboord of the English ship, whereupon the King presently sent a boat aboord of vs, with three men in her, commanding the said Sonnings to come a shoare, and not speaking any thing as touching the man, he saide that hee would come presently in his owne boate, but as soone as they were gone, he willed vs to warpe forth the ship, and saide that he would see the knaues hanged befoze he would goe a shoare. And when the king sawe that he came not a shoare, but still continued warping away the shippe, he straight commaunded the gunner of the bulwarke next vnto vs, to shoote three shootes without ball. Then we came all to the said Sonnings, and asked of him what the matter was that we were shot at, he said that it was the Ianizaries who would haue the oyle a shoare againe, and willed vs to make haste away, and after that he had discharged three shots without ball, he commaunded all the gunners in the towne to doe their indelour to sinke vs, but the Turkish gunners could not once strike vs, wherefoze the king sent presently to the Banio: (this Banio is the prison wheras all the captiues lay at night) and promised if that there were any that could either sinke vs, or else cause vs to come in againe, he should haue a hundred crownes, and his libertie. Which that came forth a Spaniard called Sebastian, which had bene an old seruitor in Flanders, and he said, that vpon the performance of that promise, hee would undertake either to sinke vs, or to cause vs to come in againe, and thereto he would gage his life, and at the first shoote he split our rudders head in peeces, and the second shoote he strake vs vnder the water, and the third shoote he shotte vs through our foremast with a Coluering shot, and thus he hauing rent both our rudder and masse, and shot vs vnder water, we were enforced to goe in againe.

This Sebastian for all his diligence herein, had neither his libertie, nor an hundred crownes, so promised by the said king, but after his seruice done was committed againe to prison, whereby may appeare the regard that the Turke or infidell hath of his worde, although he be able to performe it, yea more, though he be a king.

Then our merchants seeing no remedie, they together with five of our companie went a shoare, and then they ceased shooting: they shot vnto vs in the whole, nine and thirtie shootes, without the hurt of any man.

And when our marchants came a shoare, the King commaunded presently that they with the rest of our companie that were with them, should be chained soure & soure, to a hundred waight of yron, and when we came in with the ship, there came presently about an hundred Turks aboord of vs, and they searched vs, and stript our very clothes from our bakes, & brake open our chests, and made a spoyle of all that we had: and the Chyistian cattifes likewise that came a boord of vs made spoyle of our goods, and vsed vs as ill as the Turkes did. And our masters mate hauing a Geneva Bible in his hand, there came the kings chiefe gunner, and tooke it out from him, who shewed me of it, and I hauing the language, went presently to the kings treasurer, and tolde him of it, saying, that such it was the will of God that we should fall into their hands, yet that they should grant vs to vse our consciences to our owne discretion, as they suffered the Spaniards and other nations to vse theirs, and he granted vs: then I told him that the maister gunner had taken away a Bible from one of our men: the Treasurer went presently and commaunded him to deliuer by the Bible againe, which he did: & within a litle after he tooke it from the man againe, and I shewed the Treasurer of it, and presently he commaunded him to deliuer it againe: saying, thou villaine, wilt thou turne to Chyistianitie againe? for he was a Renegado, which is one that first was a Chyistian, and afterwards becommeth a Turke, and so he deliuered me the Bible the second time. And then I hauing it in my hand, the gunner came to me, and spake these wordes, saying, thou dogge, I wil haue the booke in despight of thee, and tooke it from me, saying: If thou tell the kings treasurer of it any more, by Mahomet I will be reuenged of thee. Notwithstanding I went the third time vnto the kings Treasurer, and tolde him of it, and he came with me, saying thus vnto the gunner: by the head of the great Turke, if thou take it from him againe, thou hast haue an hundred bastonadoes. And forthwith he deliuered me the booke, saying, he had not the value of a pin of the spoyle of the ship, which was the better for him, as hereafter you shall heare: for there was none, neither Chyistian nor Turke that tooke the value of a peniworth of our goods from vs, but perished both bodie and goods within seuentene moneths following, as hereafter shall plainly appeare.

Then came the Guardian Basha, which is the keeper of the kings captiues, to fetch vs all a shoare, and then I remembring the miserable estate of poore distressed captiues, in the time of their bondage to those infidels, went to mine owne chest, and tooke out thereof a sarre of oyle, and filled a basket full of white Ruske to carie a shoare with me, but befoze I came to the Banio, the Turkish hopes had taken away almost all my bread, and the keeper saide, deliuer me the sarre of oyle, oyle, and when thou comest to the Banio thou shalt haue it againe, but I neuer had it of him any more.

But when I came to the Banio, and sawe our Marchants and all the rest of our company in chaines, and we all ready to receiue the same reward, what heart in the world is there so hard, but would haue pitied our cause, hearing or seeing the lamentable greeting there was betwixt vs: all this happened the first of May, 1584.

And the second day of the same moneth, the King with all his counsell sate in iudgement vpon vs. The first that were had forth to be arraigned, were the Factors, and the Masters, and the King asked them wherefore they came not a shoare when he sent for them. And Romaine Sonnings answered, that though he were king on shoare, and might commaunde there, so was hee as touching those that were vnder him: and therefore said, if any offence be, the fault is wholly in my selfe, and in no other. Then forthwith the king gaue iudgement, that the saide Romaine Sonnings should be hanged ouer the North-east bulwarke, from whence he conueyed the forenamed Patrone Norado, and then he called for our Master Andrew Dier, and vied fewe wordes to him, and so condemned him to be hanged ouer the walles of the Westermost bulwarke.

Then fell our other Factor (named Richard Skegs) vpon his knees before the king, and said, I beseech your highnesse either to pardon our Master, or else suffer me to die for him, for he is ignorant of this cause. And then the people of that countrey fauouring the said Richard Skegs besought the king to pardon them both. So then the king spake these wordes: Beholde, for thy sake, I pardon the Master. Then presently the Turkes shouted, and cried, saying: Away with the Master from the presence of the king. And then he came into the Banio whereas we were, and tolde vs what had happened, and we all reioyced at the good hap of master Skegs, that hee was saved, and our Master for his sake.

But afterward our ioy was turned to double sorrow, for in the meane time the kings minde was altered: for that one of his counsell had aduised him, that vnlesse the Master died also, by the lawe they could not confiscate the ship nor goods, neither captiue any of the men: whereupon the king sent for our Master againe, and gaue him another iudgement after his pardon for one cause, which was that hee should be hanged. Here all true Christians may see what trust a Christian man may put in an infidels promise, who being a King, pardoned a man now, as you haue heard, and within an houre after hanged him for the same cause before a whole multitude: and also promised our Factors their oyles custome free, and at their going away made them pay the bittermost penie for the custome thereof.

And when that Romaine Sonnings saw no remedy but that he should die, he protested to turne Turke, hoping thereby to haue saved his life. Then saide the Turke, If thou wilt turne Turke, speake the words that thereunto belong: and he did so. Then saide they vnto him, Now thou shalt die in the faith of a Turke, and so hee did, as the Turkes reported that were at his execution. And the forenamed Patrone Norado, whereas before he had libertie and did nothing, he then was condemned slaue perpetuall, except there were payment made of the foresaid summe of money.

A Frenchman turned Turke, in hope of his life, and afterward was hanged.

Then the king condemned all vs, who were in number sixe and twentie, of the which, two were hanged (as you haue heard) and one died the first day wee came on shoare, by the visitation of Almighty God: and the other thre and twentie he condemned slaues perpetuall vnto the great Turke, and the ship and goods were confiscated to the vse of the great Turke: and then we all fell downe vpon our knees, giuing God thanks for this sorrowfull visitation, and giuing our selues wholly to the Almighty power of God, vnto whom all secrets are knowen, that he of his goodnesse would vouchsafe to looke vpon vs.

Here may all true Christian hearts see the wonderfull workes of God shewed vpon such infidels, blasphemers, whoremasters, and renegade Christians, and so you shall reade in the ende of this booke, of the like vpon the vnfaithfull king and all his childezen, and of as many as tooke any portion of the said goods.

But first to shewe our miserable bondage and slauerie, and vnto what small pittance and allowance wee were tied, for euery five men had allowance but five aspers of bread in a day, which is but two pence English: and our lodging was to lye on the bare boozds, with a very simple cape to couer vs, wee were also forceably and most violently shauen, head and beard, and within thre dayes after, I and sixe more of my fellowes, together with fourescore Italians and Spaniards were sent forth in a Galee to take a Greekish Carmosell, which came into Africa to steale Negroes, and went out of Tripolis vnto that place, which was two hundred and fourtie leagues thence, but wee were chained thre and thre to an oare, and wee rowed naked about the girdle, and the Borewaine of the Galley walked abast the masse, and his Mate afoze the masse, and eche of them a bulls pissell dyed in their handes, and when their diuelish choller rose, they would strike the the Christians for no cause: And they allowed vs but halfe a pound of bread a man in a day without any other kinde of sustenance, water excepted. And when we came to the place where as wee saw the Carmosell, we were not suffered to haue neither neede, hookin, knife, or any other weapon about vs, nor at any other time in the night, vpon paine of one hundred bastonadoes: wee were then also cruelly manackled in such sort, that we could not put our handes the length of one foote asunder the one from the other, and euery night they searched our chaines three times, to see if they were fast rinced: Wee continued fight with the Carmosell three houres, and then wee tooke it, and lost but two of our men in that fight, but there were slaine of the Greekes siue, and foureteene were cruelly hurt, and they that were sound, were presently made slaues, and chained to the oares: and within fifteene dayes after we returned againe into Tripolis, and then wee were put to all maner of slaerie. I was put to hewe stones, and other to cary stones, and some to draw the Cart with earth, and some to make moztar, and some to draw stones, (for at that time the Turkes builded a church:) And thus we were put to all kinde of slaerie that was to be done. And in the time of our being there, the Moores that are the husbandmen of the countrey, rebelled against the king, because he would haue constrained them to pay greater tribute then heretofore they had done, so that the Souldiours of Tripolis marched forth of the towne to haue ioyned battell against the Moores for their rebellion, and the King sent with them foure pieces of Ordnance, which were drawn by the captiues twentie miles into the Countrey after them, and at the sight thereof the Moores fled, and then the Captaines returned backe againe. Then I and certaine Christians more were sent twelue miles into the countrey with a Cart to lode timber, and we returned againe the same day.

Howe the king had 18. captiues, which three times a weeke went to fetch wood thirtie miles from the towne: and on a time he appointed me for one of the 18. and wee departed at eight of the clocke in the night, and vpon the way as wee rode vpon the camels, I demanded of one of our company, who did direct vs the way: he sayd, that there was a Moore in our company which was our guide: and I demanded of them how Tripolis and the wood bare one off the other: and hee said, East North east, and West South west. And at midnight or neere thereabouts, as I was riding vpon my camel, I fell asleepe, and the guide and all the rest rode away from me, not thinking but I had bene among them. When I awooke, and finding my selfe alone durst not call nor hallo, for feare least the wilde Moores should heare me, because they holde this opinion, that in killing a Christian they do God good seruice: and musing with my selfe what were best for me to do, if I should goe forth, and the wilde Moores should hap to meete with mee, they would kill mee: and on the other side, if I should returne backe to Tripolis without any wood or company, I should be most miserably vsed: therefore of two evils, rather I had to goe forth to the losing of my life, then to turne backe and trust to their mercie, fearing to bee vsed as before I had seene others: for vnderstanding by some of my company before, howe Tripolis and the saide wood did lie one off another, by the North starre I went forth at aduenture, and as God would haue it, I came right to the place where they were, euen about an houre before day: there altogether wee rested and gaue our camels prouender, and alsoone as the day appeared, we rode all into the wood: and I seeing no wood there, but a sticke here and a sticke there, about the bignesse of a mans arme growing in the sand, it caused mee to marueile how so many camels should be loden in that place. The wood was Iuniper, we needed no axe nor edge toole to cut it, but pluckt it by by strength of hands rootes and all, which a man might easily do, and so gathered it together, a litle at one place and so at another, and laded our camels, and came home about seuen of the clocke that night folowing: because I fell lame, and my camel was tired, I left my wood in the way.

The iudge-ment of God
vpon blasphemers.

There was in Tripolis that time a Venetian, whose name was Benedetto Venetiano, and seenteene captiues more of his company, which ranne away from Tripolis in a boate, and came in sight of an Island called Malta, which lieth fourtie leagues from Tripolis right North, and being within a mile of the shoare, & very faire weather, one of their company said, In dispetto de dio adesso venio a pilliar terra, which is as much to say: In the despite of God I shall now fetch the shoare, and presently there arose a mighty storme, with thunder and raine, and the wind at North, their boate being very small, so that they were inforced to beate by roome, and to sheare right afoze the winde ouer against the coast of Barbarie from whence they came, and rowing by and downe the coast, their victuals being spent, the 21. day after their departure they were inforced through the want of food to come ashore, thinking to haue stolne some sheepe: but the Moores of the countrey very craftily perceiuing their intent, gathered together a threescore horsemen, and hid themselves behinde a sandie hill, and when the Christians were come all a shoare, and past by halfe a mile into the countrey, the Moores rode betwixt them and their boate, and some of them pursued the Christians, and so they were all taken and brought to Tripolis, from whence they had had before escaped: and presently the king commanded that the foze-laide Benedetto with one more of his company should lose their eares, and the rest should be most cruelly beaten, which was presently done. This king had a sonne which was a ruler in an Illand called Gerbi, wherunto arrived an English shippe called the Greene Dragon, of the which was Master one M. Blonker, who having a very unhappy boy in that shippe, and understanding that whosoeuer would turne Turke should be well entertained of the kings sonne, this boy did runne a shoate, and voluntarily turned Turke. Shortly after the kings sonne came to Tripolis to visite his father, and seeing our company, hee greatly fancied Richard Burges our Purser, and James Smith: they were both yong men, therefore he was very desirous to haue them to turne Turkes, but they would not yeeld to his desire, saying: We are your fathers slaues, and as slaues wee will serue him. Then his father the king sent for them, and asked them if they would turne Turkes? And they saide: If it please your highnesse, Christians we were bozne, and so we will remaine, and beseeched the king that they might not bee informed thereunto. The king had there before in his house a sonne of a Queenes guard, whom the kings sonne had informed to turne Turke, his name was Iohn Nelson: him the king caused to be brought to these yong men, and then said vnto them: Will not you beare this your countreyman company, and be Turke as hee is? And they saide, that they would not yeeld thereunto during life. But it fell out, that within a moneth after, the kings sonne went home to Gerbi againe, being fixe score miles from Tripolis, and caried our two foze-laide yong men with him, which were Richard Burges, and James Smith: and after their departure from vs, they sent vs a letter, signifying that there was no violence shewed vnto them as yet, but within thre dayes after they were violently used, for that the kings sonne demanded of them againe, if that they would turne Turke? Then answered Richard Burges, a Christian I am, and so I will remaine. Then the kings sonne very angerly said vnto him: By Mahomet thou shalt presently be made Turke. Then called he for his men, and commanded them to make him Turke, and they did so, and circumeised him, and would haue had him speake the wordes that thereunto belonged, but he answered them stoutly that he would not: and although they had put on him the habice of a Turke, yet sayd he, A Christian I was bozne, and so I will remaine, though you force me to doe otherwise.

The Greene Dragon.

The Kings sonne, had a captiue that was sonne to one of the Queenes Masters guard, that was forced to turne Turke.

And then he called for the other, and commanded him to be made Turke perforce also: but he was very strong, for it was so much as eight of the kings sonnes men could doe to holde him, so in the ende they circumeised him, and made him Turke. Now to passe over a litle, and so to shewe the manner of our deliuerance out of that miserable captiuitie.

In May afoze said, shortly after our apprehension, I wrote a letter into England vnto my father dwelling in Bauistoke in Deuonshire, signifying vnto him the whole estate of our calamities: and I wrote also to Constantinople to the English Embassadour, both which letters were faithfully deliuered. But when my father had receiued my letter, and understood the trueth of our mishap, and the occasion thereof, and what had happened to the offenders, he certified the right honourable the earle of Bedford thereof, who in short space acquainted her highnesse with the whole cause thereof, and her Maiestie like a most mercifull princeesse tendering her Subiects, presently tooke order for our deliuerance. Whereupon the right worshipful sir Edward Osborne knight directed his letters with all speed to the English Embassadour in Constantinople, to procure our deliury: and he obtained the great Turkes Commission, and sent it forthwith to Tripolis, by one Master Edward Barton, together with a Justice of the great Turkes, and one souldiour, and another Turke, and a Greeke which was his interpretour, which could speake besides Greeke, Turkish, Italian, Spanish and English. And when they came to Tripolis, they were well entertained. And the first night they did lie in a Captaines house in the towne: all our company that were in Tripolis came that night for ioy to Master Barton and the other Commissioners to see them. Then master Barton said vnto vs, welcome my good countreymen, and louingly intertained vs, and at our departure from him, he gaue vs two shillings, and said, Serue God, for to morrow I hope you shall be as free as euer you were; We all gaue him thanks and so departed.

The first motion for those Englishmens deliuerie.

The next day in the morning very early, the King hauing intelligence of their coming, sent word to the keeper, that none of the Englishmen (meaning our company) should goe to worke. Then he sent for Master Barton and the other Commissioners, and demanded of the saide Master Barton his message: the Justice answered, that the great Turke his Soueraigne had sent them vnto him, signifying that he was informed that a certaine English shippe, called the Iesus, was by him the saide king confiscated, about twelue moneths since, and now my saide Soueraigne hath here sent his especiall commission by vs vnto you, for the deliuerance of the saide shippe and goods, and also the free libertie and deliuerance of the same shippe, whom you haue taken and kept in captiuitie. And further the same Justice saide, I am authorized by my

said soueraigne the great Turke to see it done : And therefore I commaund you by vertue of this commission, presently to make restitution of the pmisses or the value thereof: and so did the Justices deliuer unto the King the great Turkes commission to the effect aforesaide, which commission the king with all obedience receiued : and after the perusing of the same, he forthwith commaunded all the English captiues to be brought before him, and then willed the keeper to strike off all our pions, which done, the king said, You Englishmen, for that you did offend the lawes of this place, by the same lawes therefore some of your company were condemned to die as you knowe, and you to bee perpetuall captiues during your liues : notwithstanding, seeing it hath pleased my soueraigne lord the great Turke to pardon your said offences, and to giue you your freedome and libertie, behold, here I make deliuey of you to this English Gentleman : so hee deliuered vs all that were there, being thirteene in number, to Master Barton, who required also those two yong men which the Kings sonne had taken with him. Then the king answered that it was against their lawe to deliuer them, for that they were turned Turkes: and touching the ship and goods, the king said, that he had solde her, but would make restitution of the value, and as much of the goods as came vnto his hands, and so the king arose and went to dinner, and commaunded a Jew to goe with Master Barton and the other commissioners, to shew them their lodging, which was a house provided and appointed them by the said king. And because I had the Italian & Spanish tongues, by which their most trafique in that countrey is, Master Barton made me his Cater to buy his victuals for him and his company, and deliuered me money needfull for the same. Thus were wee set at libertie the 28. day of April, 1585.

ments that happened to the King and his people.

The king lost 150. Camels, taken by the wilde Moores.

Nowe to returne to the kings plagues and punishments, which Almighty God at his will and pleasure sendeth vpon men in the sight of the worlde, and likewise of the plagues that be fell his chylzen and others aforesaide. First when wee were made bondmen, being the second day of May 1584. the king had 300. captiues, and before the moneth was expired, there died of them of the plague 150. And whereas there were 26. men of our company, of whom two were hanged, and one died the same day that wee were made bondslaves : that present moneth there died nine more of our company of the plague, and other two were forced to turne Turkes as before is rehearsed : and on the fourth day of June next following the king lost 150. camels, which were taken from him by the wilde Moores: and on the 28. day of the saide moneth of June, one Geoffrey Maltese, a renegado of Malta, ranne away to his countrey, and stole a Brigandine which the king had builded for to take the Christians withall, and caried with him twelue Christians more which were the kings captiues. Afterward about the tenth day of July next following, the king rood forth vpon the greaest and fairest mare that might be seene, as white as any swanne : hee had not ridden fourtie paces from his house, but on a sudden the same mare fell downe vnder him stark dead, and I with fire more were commaunded to hurie her, skinne, shoes and all, which we did. And about thzee moneths after our deliuerie, Master Barton, with all the residue of his company, departed from Tripolie to Zante, in a vessell, called a Settea, of one Marcus Segoorus, who dwelt in Zante, and after our arriuall at Zante wee remained fiftene dayes there aboord our vessell, before wee coulde haue Plarego (that is, leaue to come a shoare) because the plague was in that place, from whence wee came : and about thzee dayes after we came a shoare, thither came another Settea of Marseils bound for Constantinople. Then did Master Barton, and his company, with two more of our company, shippe themselves as passengers in the same Settea, and went to Constantinople. But the other nine of vs that remained in Zante, about thzee moneths after, shipt our selues in a shippe of the said Marcus Segoorus, which came to Zante, and was bound for England. In which thzee moneths, the souldiers of Tripolie killed the said king. And then the Kings sonne, according to the custome there, went to Constantinople, to surrender vp all his fathers treasure, goods, captiues, and concubines, vnto the great Turke, and tooke with him our saide Purser Richard Burges, and James Smith, and also the other two Englishmen, which he the said kings sonne had inforced to become Turkes, as is aforesaid. And they the said Englishmen finding now some opportunitie, concluded with the Christian captiues which were going with them vnto Constantinople, being in number about one hundred and fiftie, to kill the kings sonne, and all the Turkes which were aboord of the Galley, and pryncipally the saide Englishmen conueyed vnto the saide Christian captiues, weapons for that purpose. And when they came into the maine Sea, towards Constantinople (vpon the faithfull promise of the saide Christian captiues) these foure Englishmen lept suddenly into the Crosia, that is, into the middest of the Galley, where the caron lieth, and with their swordes drawne, did fight against all the foresaid Turkes, and for want of helpe of the saide Christian captiues, who falsly bzake their promises, the said Master Blunkers boy was killed, and the saide James Smith, and our Purser Richard Burges, and the other Englishman, were taken and bound into chaines, to be hanged at their arrivall in Constantinople: and as the Lordes will was, about two dayes after, passing through the gulfe of Venice, at an Island called Cephalonia, they met with two of the duke of Venice his Gallies, which tooke that Galley, and killed the kings sonne, and his mother, and all the Turkes that were there, in number 150. and they saved the Christian captiues, and would haue killed the two Englishmen because they were circumcised, and become Turkes, had not the other Christian captiues excused them, saying, that they were inforced to be Turkes, by the kings sonne, and shewed the Venetians also, how they did enterpryse at sea to fight against all the Turkes, and that their two fellows were slaine in that fight. Then the Venetians saved them, and they, with all the residue of the said captiues, had their libertie, which were in number 150. of theseaboyes, and the saide Gallie, and all the Turkes treasure was confiscated to the vse of the state of Venice. And from thence our two Englishmen traueiled homeward by land, and in this meane time we had one more of our company, which died in Zante, and afterward the other eight shipped themselves at Zante, in a shippe of the said Marcus Segorus, which was bound for England: and before we departed thence, there arrived the Assenion, and the George Bonauenture of London in Cephalonia, in a harbour there, called Arrogostoria, whose Marchants agreed with the Marchants of our shippe, and so laded al the marchandise of our shippe into the said ships of London, who tooke vs eight in as passengers, and so we came home, and within two moneths after our arrivall at London, our said Purser Richard Burges, and his fellow came home also: for the which we are bound to praise Almighty God, during our liues, and as buetie bindeth vs, to pray for the preservation of our most gracious Queene, for the great care her Maiestie had ouer vs, her pooze Subiects, in seeking and procuring of our deliuerance aforesaide: and also for her honourable priuie Counsell, and I especiall for the prosperitie and good estate of the house of the late deceased, the right honourable the Earle of Bedford, whose honour I must confesse, most diligently at the suite of my father now departed, traueiled herein: for the which I rest continually bounden to him, whose soule I doubt not, but is already in the heauens in ioy, with the Almighty, vnto which place he vouchsafe to bring vs all, that for our sinnes suffered most vile and shameful death vpon the Crosse, there to liue perpetually worl without ende, Amen.

Two Gallies of Venice tooke the king of Tripolie his galley, and killed the kings sonne, and all the Turkes in it, and released all the Christians being in number 150.

ELizabeth, by the grace of the most high God, and onely maker of heauen and earth, of England, France and Ireland Queene, and of the Christian faith, against all the Idolaters and false professors of the Name of CHRIST dwelling among the Christians, most inuincible and puissant defender: to the most valiant and inuincible Prince, Sultan Murad Can, the most mightie ruler of the kingdome of Musulman, and of the East Empire the onely and highest Monarch about all, health, and many happy and fortunate yeres, with great abundance of the best things.

Most noble and puissant Emperour, about two yeres now passed, wee wrote vnto your Imperiall Maiestie, that our welbeloued seruant, William Hareborne, a man of great reputation and honour, might be receiued vnder your high authoritie, for our Ambassadour in Constantinople, and other places, vnder the obedience of your Empire of Musulman: And also that the Englishmen, being our Subjects, might exercise entercourse and marchandize in all those Provinces, no lesse freely then the French, Polonians, Venerians, Germanes, and other your confederates, which traueile through diuers of the East parts: endeouering that by mutuall trafique, the East may be ioyned and knit to the West.

Which priuileges, when as your most puissant Maiestie, by your letters and vnder your dispensation most liberally and fauourably granted to our Subjects of England, wee could no lesse doe, but in that respect giue you as great thanks, as our heart could conceiue, trusting that it wil come to passe, that this order of trafique, so well ordeined, will bring with it selfe most great profits and commodities to both sides, as well to the parties subiect to your Empire, as to the Provinces of our kingdome. Which thing that it may be done in plaine and effectuall maner, where as some of our Subjects of late at Tripolis in Barbarie, and at Argier, were by the inhabitants of those places (being perhaps ignorant of your pleasure) euill intreated and grieuously bered, wee doe friendly and louingly desire your Imperiall Maiestie, that you will vnderstand their causes by our Ambassadour, and after ward giue commaundment to the Lieutenants and Presidents of those Provinces, that our people may henceforth freely, without any violence, or iniurie, traueile, and do their businesse in those places.

And we againe with all endeuour, shall studie to performe all those things, which we shall in any wise vnderstand to be acceptable to your Imperiall Maiestie, which God, the onely maker of the world, most best and most great, long keepe in health, and flourishing. Given in our palace at London, the fift day of the moneth of September, in the yere of IESVS CHRIST our Sauiour, 1584. And of our raigne, the 26.

The Turkes letter to the King of Tripolis in Barbarie, commanding the restitution of an English ship, called the Iesus, with the men, and goods, sent from Constantinople, by Mahomet Beg, a Iustice of the Great Turkes, and an English Gentleman, called Master Edward Barton. Anno 1584.

Honourable, and worthy Bassa Romadan Beglerbeg, most wise and prudent Iudge of the West Tripolis, wee with the ende of all thy enterprises hapvie, and prosperous. By these our highnesse letters, wee certifie thee, that the right honourable, William Hareborne, Ambassadour in our most famous Portch, for the most excellent Queenes Maiestie of England, in person, and by letters hath certified our highnesse, that a certaine shippe, with all her furniture, and artillerie, worth two thousand buckets, arriuing in the port of Tripolis, and discharged of her lading and marchandize, paide our custome according to order, and againe, the marchants laded their shippe with oyle, which by constraint they were enforced to buy of you, & hauing answered in like maner the custome for the same, determined to depart: a Frenchman assistant to the Marchant, vnknown to the Englishmen, caried away with him another Frenchman indebted to a certaine Moore in foure hundred buckets, and by force caused the Englishmen, and shippe to depart: who neither suspecting fraude, nor deceite, hoised sailes. In the meane time, this man, whose debter the Frenchman had stolen away, went to the Bassa with the supplication, by whose meanes, and force of the Castle, the Englishmen were constrained to returne into the port, where the Frenchman, author of the euill, with the Master of the ship an Englishman, lishman, innocent of the crime were hanged, and sixe and twentie Englishmen cast into prison, of whom through famine, thirst, and stinke of the prison, eleuen died, and the rest like to die. Further, it was signified to our Maiestie also, that the marchandise and other goods, with the shippe, were worth 7600. duckets: which things if they be so, this is our commandement, which was granted and giuen by our Maiestie, that the English shippe, and all the marchandize, and whatsoeuer else taken away bee wholly restored, and that the Englishmen be let goe free, and suffered to returne into their Countrey. Wherefore when this our commandement shall come vnto thee, wee straightly commaund, that the foresaid businesse be diligently looked vnto, and discharged. And if it be so, that a Frenchman, and no Englishman hath done this craft, and wickednesse vnknewen to the Englishmen, and as authour of the wickednesse is punished, and that the Englishmen committed nothing against the peace and league, or their articles: also if they payd custome according to order, it is against law, custome of Countreys, and their priuilege, to hinder or hurt them. Neither is it meete, their shippe, marchandise, and all their goods taken, should be withholden. Wee will therefore, that the English shippe, marchandize, and all other their goods, without exception, be restored to the Englishmen: also that the men bee let goe free, and if they will, let none hinder them, to returne peaceably into their Countrey: do not commit, that they another time complaine of this matter, and how this businesse is dispatched, certifie vs at our most famous poynte.

A letter of Master William Hareborne, the English Ambassadour, Ligier in Constantinople, to the Bassa Romadan, the Beglerbeg of Tripolis in Barbarie, for the restoring of an English shippe called the Ielus, with the goods, and men, detained as slues, Anno 1585.

Olio magnifico Signor,

Noi ha stato significato per diuerse lettere di quanto ha passato circa di vn' ane nostra chiamata Ielus, sopra il quale in aginto di Ricciardo Skegs, vno de gli nostri mercanti di essa gia morto, veniu vn certo Francese per sopra cargo, chiamato Romano Sonings, il quale per non esser ben portato secondo che douena, volendo importar seco vn altro Francese debitore a certi vostri senza pagarcelne, per giusticia era appiccato col patron Inglese Andre Dier, che come semplice credendo al detto Francese, senza auerdone de la sua ria malitia, non retornaua, quando da vostra magnifica Signoria gli era mandato. La morte del detto tristo Francese approuiamo como cosa benefatta. Ma al contrario, doue lei ha confiscato la detta naue e mercantia en essa, & fatto scian li marinari, como cosa molto contraria a li priuilegi dal Gran Signor quattro anni passati concessi, & da noi confirmati di parte de la Serenissima Magesta d' Inghilterra nostra patrona, e molto contraria a la liga del detto Gran Signor, il quale essendo dal sopra detto apieno informato, noi ha conceduto il suo regale mandamento di restitutione, la qual mandiamo a vostra magnifica Signoria col presente portator Edoardo Barton, nostro Secretario, & Mahumed Beg, droguemano di sua porta excelsa, con altre lettere del excellentissimo Vizir, & inuicissimo capitan di mar: chiedendo, tanto di parte del Gran Signor, quanto di sua Serenissima Magesta di V. S. M. che gli huomini, ogli, naue col fornimento, danari, & tutti altri beni qualunque, da lei & per vestro ordine da gli nostri tolti siano resi a questo mio Secretario liberamente senza empacho alcuno, como il Gran Signor da sua gratia noi ha conceduto, specialmente per esser detti ogli comprati per ordine di sua Serenissima Magesta, per promissione della Corte sua. Il qual non facendo, protestiamo per questa nostra al incontra di esso tutti futuri danni che puono succedere per questa cagione, como authore di quelli, contrario a la Santa liga giurata de li duoi Rei. patroni nostri, como per li priuilegi, che lei mostrerà il nostro, consta: per obseruatione de gli quali noi stiamo di fermo en questa excelsa Porta. Et cosi responderete nel altro mondo al solo Iddio, & quā al Gran Signor questo massimo peccato commesso da lei al incontra di tanti poueracchi, che per questa crudelta sono in parte morti, in parte retenuti da esso in duro cattiuero. Al contrario, piacendo lei emtar questo incommodo & restarcene en gratia del Signor Iddio, & li nostri patroni, amicheuolmente, (como contien a par vostro di mostrar si prudente governatore, & fidel seruitor al patrono) adempirete questa nostra giustissima domanda, per poter resularui a grand honore & comodo per la tratta di marchantia, che faranno a laduenire li nostri in quella vostra prouincia. Li quali generalmente, tanto quelli, como tutti altri che nel mar riscontrarete, siano, secondo che manda il Grand Signor, de vostra Signoria magnifica amicheuolmente recolti & recenuti: Et noi non mancheremo al debito di ottimo amico en qualunque occurrenza vostra, piacendo lei amicitia nostra, como desideramo. Signor Iddio lei conceda (adimpiendo questa nostra giusta, rechieſta, per cauare noi di più futura ſaticca in queſto negocio, & lei di diſgratia) ogni vera felicità, & ſupremo honore. Data in palazzonostro che ſu da Rapamat appreſſo Pera di 15. di Genero 1585.

The ſame in English.

Right honourable Lord, it hath bene ſignified vnto vs by diuers letters, what hath fallen out, concerning a certaine ſhippe of ours, called the Ieſus, into which, for the helpe of Richard Skeges, one of our Marchants in the ſame, nowe deceased, there was admitted a certaine Frenchman called Romaine Sonnings, which for his ill behauiour, according to his deſerts, ſerking to carry away with him another Frenchman, which was indebted to certaine of your people, without paying his creditours, was hanged by ſentence of iuſtice, together with Andrew Dier, the Maſter of the ſaid ſhip, who ſimply and without fraude, giuing credite to the ſaid Frenchman, without any knowledge of his euil fact, did not returne when hee was commaunded, by your honourable Lordſhip. The death of the ſaid ſeilde Frenchman we approue as a thing well done, but contrarywiſe, whereas your Lordſhip hath conſiſcated the ſaid ſhip with the goods therein, and hath made ſlaues of the Mariners, as a thing altogether contrary to the priuileges of the Grand Signior, granted foure yeeres ſince, and confirmed by vs on the behalfe of the moſt excellent the Queenes Maieſtie of England our Myſtreſſe, and altogether contrary to the league of the ſaide Grand Signior, who being fully informed of the aforeſaid cauſe, hath granted vnto vs his royall commandement of reſtitution, which we ſend vnto your honourable Lordſhip, by the preſent bearer Edward Barton our Secretarie, and Mahomet Beg, one of the Juſtices of his ſtately Court, with other letters of the moſt excellent Admirall, and moſt valiant Captaine of the Sea, requiring your honourable Lordſhip, as well on the behalfe of the Grand Signior, as of the Queenes moſt excellent Maieſtie my Myſtreſſe, that the men, oyles, ſhippe, furniture, money, and all other goods whatſoformer, by your Lordſhip, and your order taken from our men, be reſtored vnto this my Secretary freely, without delay, as the Grand Signior of his goodneſſe hath graunted vnto vs, eſpecially in regard that the ſame oyles were bought by the commaundement of our Queenes moſt excellent Maieſtie, for the prouiſion of her Court. Which if you perſorme not, wee proteſt by theſe our letters againſt you, that you are the cauſe of all the inconueniences which may enſue vpon this occaſion, as the author thereof, contrary to the holy league ſwozne by both our Princes, as by the priuileges, which this our ſeruant will ſhewe you, may appeare. For the ſeeing of which league perſormed, wee remaine here as Ligier in this ſtately Court. And by this meanes you ſhall anſwere in another world vnto God alone, and in this world vnto the Grand Signior, for this hairours ſinne committed by you againſt ſo many poore ſoules, which by this your cruelty are in part dead, and in part detained by you in moſt miſerable captiuitie. Contrarywiſe, if it ſhall pleaſe you to auoyd this miſchiefe, and to remaine in the fauour of Almighty God, and of our Princes, you ſhall friendly fulfill this our juſt demaund (as it becometh you to ſhew your ſelfe a prudent Gouvernour, and faithfull ſeruant vnto your Lord) and the ſame may turne to your great honour, and proſper, by the trade of marchandize, which our men in time to come, may uſe in that gouernment of yours: which generally, as well thoſe poore men, as all others, which you ſhall meete at the ſea, ought to be according to the commandement of the Grand Signior, friendly entertained and receiued of your honourable Lordſhip, and we will not faile in the duties of a ſpeciall friend; whenſoener you ſhall haue occaſion to vſe vs, as we deſire. Almighty God grant vnto your Lordſhip (in the fulfilling of this our juſt requeſt, whereby wee may be deliuered from further trouble in this matter, and your ſelfe from further diſpleaſure) all true felicitie, and increaſe of honour.

The 11. being prouided of a Ianizarie we departed from Ragusa in the company of halfe a do-zen Merchants of that towne: and within 6. miles we entred into the countrey of Seruia. So

- Chiernisa, traueiling in barren and craggie mountaines for the space of foure dayes, wee came by a small Towne of the Turkes called Chiernisa, being the 14. of the moneth; and there wee parted from the Marchants.
- Di, Fochia. The 16. we dined in a Cauarsara in a Towne called Focsea, being then greatly infected with the plague.
- Novibazar. The 17. we lay by a Towne called Tasizea.
- The 20. we came to Novibazar.
- Di, Nissa. The 21. we parted from thence, traualling still in a countrey very ill inhabited, & lying in fields.
- The 22. we passed within sight of Nicea.
- The 23. we passed in sight of another towne called Circui: and about those places wee began to leaue the mountaines, and to enter into a very faire and fertile countrey, but as cuill inhabited as the other, or worse.
- Sophia. The 27. we came to Sophia, where wee stayed three dayes, being our Ianizaries home: and by good chance we lay in a Marchants house of Ragusa, that came in company with vs from Novibazar; and also wee had in company, euer since wee came from Focsea, a Turke which was a very good fellow, and he kept company with vs till we came very neere Constantinople.
- Philippopoli. The first of September we came to Philippopoli, which seemeth to be an ancient towne, and standeth vpon the riuer of Stanuch.
- Andrinopolis. The 4. we came to Andrinopoli, a very great and ancient towne, which standeth in a very large and champion countrey, and there the great Turkes mother doth lye, being a place, where the Emperours of the Turkes were wont to lye very much.
- The 5. we lay in one of the great Cauarzaras, that were built by Mahomet Bassha with so many goodly commodities.
- The 6. we lay in another of them.
- Siliueri. The 8. we came to Siliueri, which by report was the last towne that remained Christian.
- Constantinople. The 9. of September wee arrived at the great and most stately Citie of Constantinople, which for the situation and proude seate thereof, for the beautifull and commodious hauens, and for the great and sumptuous buildings of their Temples, which they call Moschea, is to be preferred before all the Cities of Europe. And there the Emperour of the Turkes then liuing, whose name was Amurat, kept his Court and residence, in a maruelous goodly place, with diuers gardens and houses of pleasure, which is at the least two English miles in compasse, and the three parts thereof ioyne vpon the sea: and on the North-east part of the Citie on the other side of the water ouer against the Citie is the Towne of Pera, where the most part of the Christians do lye. And there also wee did lye. And on the North part of the saide Towne is the Arsenal, where the Gallies are built and doe remaine: And on the South side is all the Ordnance, artillerie, and houses of munition. Note that by the way as wee came from Ragusa to Constantinople, wee left on our right hand the Countreys of Albania, and Macedonia, and on the left hande the countreys of Bosnia, Bulgaria, and the riuer of Danubius.
- The 14. of September was the Turkes Beyram, that is, one of their chiefest feastes.
- The 15. we went to the blacke Sea called Pontus Euxinus, and there vpon a rocke we sawe a piller of white Marble that was set vp by Pompeius: and from thence wee passed to the other side of the water, vpon the shoer of Asia and there we dined.
- The 25. we departed from Constantinople.
- The 29. we came to an ancient Towne called Cherchisea, that is to say, fourtie Churches, which in the olde time was a very great City, now full of scattered buildings.
- Prouaz. The 4. of October wee came to Prouaz, one dayes iourney distant from Varna vpon the Blacke Sea.
- Varna. The 9. we came to Saxi vpon the riuer of Danubius.
- The 10. we passed the saide riuer which in that place is about a mile ouer, and then we entred into the countrey of Bogdania: they are Christians but subiects to the Turke.
- Di, Moldania. The 12. we came to Palsin vpon the riuer Prut.
- Palsin vpon the riuer of Prut, Yas. The 14. wee came to Yas the principall Towne of Bogdania, where Peter the Vayuoda prince of that Countrey keepeth his residence, of whom wee receiued great courtesie, and of the gentlemen of his Court: And he caused vs to be safe conducted through his saide Countrey, and conveyed without cost.
- The 17. we came to Stepanirze.
- Sorochen. The 19. we came to Zorochen, which is the last towne of Bogdania vpon the riuer of Niester, that parteth the saide countrey from Podolia.
- Nyester a riuer. The 20. we passed the riuer of Nyester and came to Camyeneitz in the countrey of Podolia, subiect subject to the king of Poland: this is one of the strongest Townes by nature and situation that can be seene.

Skala.

The 21. we came to Skala.

The 22. to Slothone, or Sloczow.

The 24. to Leopold which is in Russia alba, and so is the most part of the countrey betwixt Camyenerz and it. And it is a towne very well built, well governed, full of trafique and plenty: and there we stayed five dayes.

Leopold, or Lecunpur.

The 30. we baited at Grodecz, and that night at Vilna.

Grodecz, Vilna.

The 31. we dined at Mostiska, and that night at Rodmena.

The first of Nouember in the morning before day wee passed without the Towne of Iaroslau, where they say is one of the greatest faires in all Poland, and chiefly of hoyses, and that night to Rosdnoska.

Iaroslau.

The second to dinner at Lanczut, at night to Retsbou.

Lanczut.

The thirde to Sendkizow, at night to Farnow, and that night wee mette with the Palatine Laski.

The fourth to Vonuez, and that night to Brytska:

The fifth to Kuhena.

The 6. to Cracouia the principall Citie of all Poland: at which time the King was gone to Lithuania: for he doeth make his residence one yeere in Poland, and the other in Lithuania. Cracouia standeth on the riuer of Vistula.

Cracouia.

The 9. we departed from Cracouia, and that night wee came to a villiage hard by a Towne called Ilkusch, where the leade Mines are.

Leade Mines.

The 10. wee passed by a Towne called Slawkow: where there are also leade Mines, and baited that day at Bendzin, which is the last towne of Poland towards Silesia; and there is a toll.

Bendzin.

Note that all the Countreys of Poland, Russia alba, Podolia, Bogdania, and diuers other Countreys adioyning vnto them, doe consume no other salt but such as is digged in Sortsyn mountaine neere to Cracouia which is as hard as any stone; it is very good, and goeth further then any other sale. That night we lay at Bitom, which is the first Towne of Silesia.

Salt digged

taines in Poland.
Bitom.
Oppelen.

The 12. we passed by a great towne called Strelicz, and that night we lay at Oppelen vpon the riuer of Odera.

The 13. we passed by Schurgasse, and that night wee lay without the towne of Brigg: for wee coulde not bee suffered to come in by reason of the plague which was in those partes in diuers Townes.

Schurgasse.
Brigg.

The 14. wee passed by Olaw, and that night wee came to the Citie of Breslaw, which is a faire towne, great, well built and well seated vpon the riuer of Odera.

Breslaw.

The 16. we baited at Neumargt.

The 17. wee passed by Lignize and by Hayn, and that night to Buntzel.

The 18. wee passed by Naumburg through Gorlicz vpon the riuer of Neiss, and that night lay without Reichenbach.

The 19. we passed by Baudzen and Cannitz, and that night to Rensperg.

The 20. we passed by Hayn, by Strelen, where we shoulde haue passed the riuer of Elbe, but the boate was not there, so that night we lay at a towne called Mulberg.

The 21. we passed the said riuer, wee went by Belgern, by Torga, by Dumitch; and at night to Breisch.

The 22. wee passed the Elbe againe at Wittenberg, which is a very strong towne, with a good Vniuersitie: and that day we passed by Coswig.

The 23. wee passed through Zerbst in the morning, and that night to Magdeburg, a very strong Towne, and well gouerned as wee did heare. The most part of the Countrey, after wee were come one dayes iourney on this side Breslawe to this place, belongeth to the Duke of Saxon.

Magdeburg.

The 24. wee passed by a castle of the Marques of Brandenburg called Wolmerstat, and that night we lay at Garleben.

The 25. wee lay at Soltwedel.

The 26. at Berg.

The 27. we baited at Lunenburg, that night we lay at Winsen.

Lunenburg.

The 28. we came to Hamborg, and there stayed one weeke.

Hamborg.

The 5. of December wee departed from Hamborg, and passed the Elbe by boate being much frozen, and from the riuer went on foote to Boxhoeede, being a long Dutch mile off, and there we lay; and from thence passed ouer land to Emden.

Thence hauing passed through Friseland and Holland, the 25. being Christmas day in the morning we came to Delft: where wee found the right honourable the Earle of Leicester with a goodly company of Lords, knights, gentlemen, and souldiers.

The 28. at night to Roterodam.

The 29. to the Briel, and there stayed eight dayes for passage.

The fifth of January we tooke shipping.

The 7. we landed at Grauesend, and so that night at London with the helpe of almighty God.

The Turkes passeport or safeconduct for Captaine Austell, and Iacomo Manuchio.

Now thou which art Voyuoda of Bogdania, & Valachia, & other our officers abiding and dwelling on the way by which men commonly passe into Bogdania, and Valachia, that the Embassadoz of England hauing two English gentlemen desirous to depart for England, the one named Henry Austell, and the other Iacomo de Manuchio, requested our highnesse letters of Safeconduct to passe through our dominions with one seruant to attende on them. Therefore wee straightly charge you and all other our seruants by whom they shall passe, that hauing receiued this our commandement, you haue diligent care and regard that they may haue provided for them in this their iourney (for their money) all such necessary provision as shall be necessary for themselves and their horses, in such sort as they may haue no cause hereafter to complaine of you. And if by chaunce they come vnto any place, where they shall stand in feare either of their persons or goods, that then you carefully cause them to bee guarded with your men, and to be conducted through all suspected places, with sufficient company; But haue great regard that they conuey not out of our countrey any of our seruiceable horses. Obey our commandement, and giue credite to this our Seale.

Obertus Comes Leicesteriz, baro de Denbigh, ordinum Garterij & Sancti Michaelis eques auratus, Serenissimæ Reginæ Angliæ a Secretioribus consilijs, & magister equorum, dux & capitaneus generalis exercitus eiusdem Regiæ maiestatis in Belgio, & gubernator generalis Hollandiæ, Zelandiæ, & prouinciarum vnitarum & associatarum, omnibus ad quos præsentis literæ peruenierint, salutem. Cum lator præsentium Thomas Forster nobilis Anglus necessarijs de causis hinc Constantinopolim profecturus sit, & inde ad nos quanta potest celeritate reuersurus: petimus ab omnibus & singulis Regibus, principibus, nobilibus, magistratibus, & alijs, mandent & permitrant dicto Thomæ cum duobus famulis liberum transicum per eorum diuiones & territoria sine detentione aut impedimento iniusto, & prouideri sibi de necessarijs iustum precium reddenti, ac aliter conuenienter & humaniter tractari, vt occasiones eius eundi & redeundi requirent: Sicut nos Maiestates, Serenitates, Celsitudines, & dominationes vestræ paratos inuenietis, vt vestratibus in similibus casibus gratum similiter faciamus.

A description of the yeerely voyage or pilgrimage of the Mahumitans, Turkes and Moores vnto Mecca in Arabia.

Of the Citie of Alexandria.

Alexandria the most ancient citie in Africa situated by the seafide containeth seuen miles in circuite, and is entironed with two walles one neere to the other with high towers, but the walles within be farre higher then those without, with a great ditch round about the same: yet is not this Citie very strong by reason of the great antiquitie, being almost halfe destroyed and ruinated. The greatnesse of this Citie is such, that if it were of double habitation, as it is compassed with a double wall, it might be truly said, that there were two Alexandrias one builded vpon another, because vnder the foundations of the saide Citie are great habitations, and incredible huge pillars. True it is, that this part vnderneath remaineth at this day day inhabitable, because of the corrupt aire, as also for that by time, which consumeth all things, it is greatly ruined. It might well be said, that the founder hercof, as he was worthy in all his enterprizes, so like wise in building hercof he did a worke worthy of himselfe, naming it after his owne name. This Citie hath one defect, for it is subject to an euill ayre, which onely proceedeth of that hollownesse underneath, out of the which issueth infinite moisture: and that this is true the ayre without doth evidently testifie, which is more subtile and holestone then that beneath. The waters hereof be salt, by reason that the soile of it selfe is likewise so. And therefore the inhabitants, at such time as the river Nilus floweth, are accustomed to open a great ditch, the head whereof extendeth into the said river, and from thence they conueigh the same within halfe a mile of Alexandria, and so consequently by meanes of conduct-pipes the water cometh vnto the cellernes of Alexandria, which being full serue the citie from one inundation to another. Within the citie is a Pyramide mentioned of in Histories, but not of great importance. Without the citie is La colonna di Pompeio, or the pillar of Pompey, being of such height and thickness, that it is supposed there is not the like in the whole world besides. Within the citie there is nothing of importance save a little castle which is guarded with 60 Janizaries. Alexandria hath three portes, one towards Rossetto, another to the land ward, & the third to the sea ward, which is called Babelbar, without which appeareth a broad Island called Ghesira in the Moores tongue, which is not wholly an Island, because a little point or corner thereof toucheth the firme lande, and therefore may be called Peninsula, that is to say, almost an Island. Whereupon are builded many houses of the Jewes, in respect of the aire. This Peninsula is situate betweene two very good portes, one of them being much more safe then the other, called The old port, into the which only the vessels of Barbarie, and the fire Gallies of the Grand Signior deputed for the guard of Alexandria doe enter. And this port hath vpon the right hand at the mouth or enterance thereof a castle of small importance, and guarded but with fiftene men or thereabouts. On the other side of this Island is the other called The new port, which name is not iustly giuen vnto it, for that in all mens iudgement in times past there hath not bene water there, because in the midst of this port, where the water is very deepe, there are discouered and found great sepulchres and other buildings, out of the which are daily digged with engines Iaspur and Porphyrie stones of great value, of the which great store are sent to Constantinople for the ornament of the Mesquitas or Turkish Temples, and of other buildings of the Grand Signior. Into this port enter all such vessels as traffique to this place. This port hath on eith side a castle, whereof that vpon the Peninsula is called Faraone, vpon the toppe whereof euery night there is a light set in a great lanterne for direction of the ships, and for the guard thereof are appointed 200 Janizaries: the other on the other side is but a little castle kept by 18 men. It is certaine, that this haven of Alexandria is one of the chiefest hauens in the world: for hither come to traffique people of euery Nation, and all sorts of vessels which goe round about the citie. It is more inhabited by strangers, merchants, and Christians, then by men of the countrey which are but a few in number. Within the citie are five Fontechi, that is to say, one of the Frenchmen, where the Consul is resident, & this is the fairest and most commodious of all the rest. Of the other foure, two belong to the Venetians, one to the Raguseans, and the fourth to the Genoueses. And all strangers which come to traffique there, except the Venetians, are vnder the French Consull. It is also to be vnderstood, that all the Christians dwell within their Fontechi, and euery euening at the going downe of the sunne, they which are appointed for that office goe about and shut all the gates of the saide Fontechi outward, and the Christians shut the same within: and so likewise they doe on the Friday (which is the Moores and the Turkes Sabbath) till their deuotions be expired. And by this meanes all parties are secure and void of feare: for in so doing the Christians may sleepe quietly and not feare robbing, and the Moores neede not doubt whiles they sleepe or pray, that the Christians should make any tumult, as in times past hath happened.

Fontecho signifieth an house of traffique, as the Stylvard.

Of the coast of Alexandria.

On the side towards Barbarie along the sea-coast for a great space there is founde neither hold, nor any thing worthy of mention: but on the other side towards Syria 13 miles from Alexandria standeth a little castle called Bichier kept by fiftie Turkes, which castle is very olde and weake, and hath a port which in times past was good, but at this present is utterly decayed and full of sand, so that the vessels which come thither dare not come neere the hoare, but ride far off into the sea. For tie miles further is Rossetto, which is a little towne without walles, and is situate vpon the banke of Nilus three miles from the sea, at which place many times they build ships and other vessels, for gouernement whereof is appointed a Saniacbey, without any other guard:

Bichier.

guaro: it is a place of traffique, and the inhabitants are very rich, but naughty varlets and craptours. Further downe along the sea-side and the riuer banke is another litle castle like vnto the abouesayde, and because the Moores beleue, that Mecca will in short tyme be conquered by the Christians, they holde opinion, that the same being lost shall be renued in this place of Rossetto, namely, that all their prayers, bowes, and pilgrimages shall be transported to Rossetto, as the religious order of Saint Iohn of the Rhodes is translated thence to Malta. Further forwarde thirtie miles standes another castle of small importance called Brulles, kept continually by fourtie Turkes, which hath a good and secure port, in forme like to a very great lake or ponde, wherein is taken great quantitie of fish, which they salt, and the marchants of Candie and Cyprus come thither to lade the same, and it is greatly esteemed, especially of the Candiors, who hauing great abundance of wine aduenture abroad to seeke meate fite for the taste of the sayd wine. Distant from Brulles fve and thirtie miles there is another castle like vnto the abouesayd kept by an Aga with fourtie men or thereabout. Howe within the laude by the riuers side is Damiatra an auncient citie enuironed with walles containing fve miles in circuit, and but of small strength. For the gouernement of this place is a Sanjaco with all his housholde and no other companie. This citie is very large, delightfull, and pleasant, abounding with gardens and faire fountaines. Ofter foztie miles further is Larnia, a castle of very small importance, and kept as other with foztie Turkes vnder an Aga. In this place is no port, but a roade very dangerous, and without other habitation. Passing this place we enter Iudæa. But because our intent is to reason simply of the voyage to Mecca, we will procede no further this way, but returning to our first way, let it suffice to say, that from Alexandria to Cairo are two hundred miles, in which way I finde nothing woorthie of memorie.

Of the mightie Citie of Cairo.

Cairo containeth in circuit eightene miles, being so inhabited and replenished with people, that almost it cannot receiue more; and therefore they haue begunne to builde newe houses without the citie and about the walles. In Cairo are people of all Nations, as Christians, Armenians, Abexins, Turkes, Moores, Jewes, Indians, Medians, Persians, Arabians, and other sortes of people, which resort thither by reason of the great traffique. This citie is gouerned by a Bashā, which ministreth iustice, together with the Cadie throughout the whole kingdome. Also there are two and twentie Saniackes, whose office is onely to oversee and guard the kingdome for euery good respect. There are also seuen thousand Turkes in pay, to wit, thre thousand Janizaries, and foure thousand horsemen: The rest of the people in Cairo are for the most part marchants which goe and come, and the remnant are Moores and other base people. About two miles from Cairo there is another litle Cairo called The olde Cairo, which containeth in circuit litle more then tenne miles, and the better halfe is not inhabited, but destroyed, whereof I neede not make any other mention. The new Cairo answereth euery yeere in tribute to the grand Signior, 600000 ducates of golde, neat and free of all charges growing on the same, which money is sent to Constantinople, about the fine of September, by the way of Aleppo, alwayes by lande, vnder the custodie of thre hundred horsemen, and two hundred Janizaries footmen. The citie of Cairo is adorned with many faire Mesquias rich, great, and of goodly and gorgeous building, among which are fve principall. The first is called Morastano; that is to say, The hospitall, which hath of rent fve hundred ducats of golde euery day left vnto it by a king of Damasco from auncient times; which king hauing conquered Cairo, for the space of fve dayes continually put the people thereof to the sword, and in the end repenting him of so great manslaughter, caused this cruelty to cease, and to obtaine remission for his sinne committed, caused this hospitall to be built, enriching it as is abouesaid. The second famous monument of Cairo is called Neffisa, of one Neffisa buried there, who was a Dame of honour, and moued by lust, yeldded her body voluntarily without rewarde, to any that required the same, and sayde the bestowed this almes for the loue of her Prophet Mahomet, and therefore at this day they adore her, reuerence her, and finally haue canonized her for a Saint, affirming that shee did many miracles. The third is called Zawia della Innachari, who was one of the foure Doctoz in the law. The fourth is called Imamsciafi, where is buried Sciafi the second Doctoz of this law. Of the other two Doctoz one is buried in Damasco, the other in Aleppo. The fift & last famous monument is Giamalazar, that is, the house of Lazarus: and this is the generall Vniuersity of the whole kingdome of Egypt. In this place Anno 1566 in the moneth of January by misfortune of fire were burned nine thousand bookes of great value, as well for that they were written by hand, as also wrought so richly with golde, that they were worth 300 and 400 ducats a peece, one with another. And because it could neuer be knowne yet how this fire beganne, they haue and doe holde the same for a most sinister augurie, and an euident and manifest signe of their better ruine. The houses of Cairo without are very faire, & within the greater number richly adorned with hangings wrought with golde. Euery person which resorteth to this place for traffiques sake, is bound to pay halfe a ducatk, except the gentlemen Venetians, Sioces, and Rhaguseans; because they are tributary to the Grand Signior, Cairo is distant from the riuer Nilus a mile and more, being situate on a plaine, saue that on the one side it hath a faire little hill, on the toppe whereof stands a faire castle, but not strong, for that it may be battered on euery side, but very rich & large, compassed about with faire gardens into the which they conueigh water for their necessitie out of Nilus, with certaine wheel^s & other like engines. This magnificent citie is adorned with very fruitfull gardens both pleasant and commodious; with great plenty of pondes to water the same. Notwithstanding the greaueasures of Cairo are in the moneth of August, when by meanes of the great raine in Ethiopia the riuer Nilus overfloweth and watereth all the countrey, and then they open the mouth of a great ditch, which extendeth into the riuer, and passeth through the midst of the citie, and entering there are innumerable barkes rowing too and fro laden with gallant girles and beautifull dames, which with singing, eating, drinking and feasting, take their solace. The women of this countrey are most beautifull, and goe in rich attire bedecked with gold, pretious stones, and iewels of great value, but chiefly perfumed with odours, and are very libidinous, and the men likewise, but foule and hard favoured. The soile is very fertile and abundant, the flesh fat which they sell without bones, their candles they make of the marrowe of cattell, because the Moores eate the tallow. They vse also certaine litle furnaces made of purpale, vnder the which they make fire, putting into the furnace foure or five hundred egg^s, and the said fire they nourish by litle and litle, untill the chickens be hatched, which after they be hatched, and become somewhat bigger, they sell them by measure in such sort, as we sell and measure nuts and chestnuts and such like.

The description of Cairo.

Of certaine notable monuments without the citie of Cairo.

Without the Citie, five miles higher into the land, are to be seene neere vnto the riuer diuerse Pyramides, among which are three marueilous great, and very artificially wrought. Out of one of these are dayly digged the bodies of auncient men, not rotten but all whole, the cause whereof is the qualitie of the Egyptian soile, which will not consume the flesh of man, but rather dry and harden the same, and so alwayes conserueth it. And these dead bodies are the Spumie which the Physicians and Apothecaries doe against our willes make vs to swallow. Also by digging in these Pyramides oftentimes are found certaine Idoles or Images of golde, silver, and other mettall, but vnder the other pyramides the bodies are not taken vp so whole as in this, but there are found legges and armes comparable to the limmes of giants. Neere to these pyramides appeareth out of the sand a great head of stone somewhat like marble, which is discouered so farre as the necke toyneeth with the shoulbers, being all whole, sauing that it wanteth a little tippe of the nose. The necke of this head containeth in circuit about five and thirtie foot, so that it may be accordyng to the necke considered, what greatnesse the head is of. The riuer Nilus is a mile broad, wherein are very many great Crocodiles from Cairo vppward, but lower then Cairo passeth no such creature: and this, they say, is by reason of an enchantment made long since which hindereth their passage for conning any lower then Cairo. Forcouer of these creatures there are sometimes found some of an incredible bignesse, that is to say, of fourtie foot about. The males haue their members like to a man, and the females like to a woman. These monsters oftentimes issue out of the water to feede, and finding any small beasts, as sheepe, lambes, goates, or other like, doe great harme. And whiles they are forth of the water, if they happen at vnwares vpon any man, woman or childe, whom they can overcome, they spare not their liues. In the yeere of our Lorde one thousand five hundred and fiftie it happened, that certaine pooze Christians traouelling by Cairo towardes the countrey of Prete Ianni to rescue certaine slaues, were guided by a Chaus, and iourneyed along the banke of the said riuer. The Chaus remained lingering alone behinde to make his prayers (as their custome is) at a place called Tania, whom being busie in his double deuotion one of these Crocodiles reazed by the shoulbers, and dyed him vnder water, so that he was neuer after seene. And for this cause they haue made in sundry places certaine hedges as bankes within the water, so that betwixt the hedge and banke of the riuer there remaineth so much water, that the women washing may take waacr without danger at their pleasure. This countrey is so fruitfull, that it causeth the women as also other creatures to bring forth one, two, and oftentimes three at a birth. Five miles southward of Cairo is a place called Matarea, where the balme is refined: and therefore some will say, that the trees which beare the balme growe in the said place, where-in they are deceived: for the sayde trees growe thre dayes iourney from Mecca, in a place called Bedrihone, which yeeldeth balme in great plenty, but saluage, wilde, and without vertue, and therefore the Moores carrying the same within like chests from Bedrihone to Matarea, where the trees being replanted (be it by vertue of the soyle, or the water, aire, or any other thing whatsoeuer) it sufficeth that here they beare the true balme and licour so much in these dayes esteemed of. At this place of Matarea there are certaine little houses, with most goodly gardens, and a chappell of antiquity, where the very Moores themselves affirme, that the mother of the blessed Christ fleeing from the fury of wicked Herode there saued her selfe with the child, wherein that saying of the Prophet was fulfilled, Ex Aegypto vocaui filium meum. The which Chappell in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred and foure, the Magnifico Darel Barbaro first Consull of that place went to visit, and caused it to be renewed and reedified, so that in these dayes there resort thither many Christians, who oftentimes bring with them Archie, to say masse there. Also about an Harquebus-shoote from Matarea is a spire of great heighe like to that at Rome, and more beautifull to beholde. Neere vnto the olde Cairo are yet twelue storehouses of great antiquitie, but now very much decayed, and these till late dayes serued to keepe corne for behoofe of the kingdome, concerning which many are of opinion, that the founder hereof was Ioseph the sonne of Iacob, for consideration of the isuen deare peeres. Also passing higher by by the banke of Nilus, there is to be seene a fayre Citie surrowed with water, the which at such time as Nilus floweth lyeth under water, but when the water returneth to the marke, there plainly appeare princely palaces, and stately pillars, being of some called Thebes, where they say that Pharaos was resident. Howe-

over three dayes iourney higher by are two great images of speckled marble, all whole, and somewhat sunke into the earth, being things wonderfull to consider of, for the nose of either is two spannes and an halfe long, and the face from one eare to the other containeth tenne spannes, the bodies being correspondent to their heads, and grayen in excellent proportion, so that they are shapen of marvellous hugeness, and these they call The wise, and The daughter of Pharaos.

Of the patriarke of Greece.

IN Cairo are two Patriarkes, one of the Greekes, and another of the Iacobites. The Greeke Patriarke called Gioechi, being about the age of one hundred and thirtie yeeres, was a very good and holy man. They say, that when Soldan Gauri of Egypt reigned, there was done this miracle following: this good patriarke being enuied at by the Iewes of the countrey, for none other cause, but for his good workes, and holy life, it happened (as sayd) that being in disputation with certain of the Hebrewes in presence of the Sultan, and reasoning of their lawe and faith, it was sayd vnto him by one of these Discreants: sith thou beleeuest in the faith of Christ, take and drinke this potion which I will giue thee; and if the Christ be true Messias and true God, he will (sayd he) deliuer thee from daunger. To whom the auncient patriarke answered, that he was content: whereupon that cursed Iewe brought him a cuppe of the most benemous and deadly poyson that could be found, which the holy Patriarke hauing perceiued, said: In the name of the father, of the sonne, and of the holy Ghost: and hauing so sayde he dranke it quite vp; which done, he tooke a droppe of pure water, putting it into that very cup, and gaue it vnto the Iewe, saying vnto him. I in the name of my Christ haue dranke thy poyson, and therefore in the name of thy expected Messias drinke this water of mine within thine owne cuppe. Whereupon the Iewe tooke the cup out of the hand of the Patriarke, and hauing dranke the water, within halfe an houre burst a sunder. And the Patriarke had none other hurt, saue that he became somewhat pale in sight, and so remained euer after. And this miracle (which meriteth to be called no lesse) was done to the great commendation of the holy Patriarke in the presence of a thousand persons, and namely of the Soldan of Egypt: who seeing the despight of the Iewes, vnto their owne cost and confusion compelled them to make the conduct, which with so many engines conueth into the castle from Nilus aboue mentioned. And this triumphant Patriarke not long since was alike, and in perfect health, which God continue long time.

Of the preparation of the Carouan to goe to Mecca.

AS touching the Carouan which goeth to Mecca, it is to be understoode, that the Mahometans obserue a kinde of lent continuing one whole moone, and being a moueable ceremony, which sometimes fallerth high, sometimes lowe in the yeere called in their tongue Ramazan, and their feast is called Bairam. During this time of lent all they which intende to goe vnto Mecca resort vnto Cairo, because that twentie dayes after the feast the Carouan is ready to depart on the voyage: and thither resort a great multitude of people from Asia, Grecia, and Barbaria to goe on this voyage, some moued by deuotion, and some for traffiques sake, and some to passe away the time. Nowe within fewe dayes after the feast they which goe on the voyage depart out of the cite two leagues vnto a place called Birca, where they expect the Captaine of the Carouan. This place hath a great pond caused by the inundation of Nilus, and so made, that the camels and other beastes may drinke therein: whercof, namely, of Hules, Camels, and Dromedaries there are at least fortie thousand, and the persons which followe the Carouan euery yeere are about fiftie thousand, fewe more or lesse, according to the times. Whereouer euery three yeeres they renewe the Captaine of the Carouan, called in the Arabian tongue Amarilla Haggi, that is, the Captaine of the Pilgrimes, to whom the Grand Signior giueth euery voyage eightene purses, conceyning each of them fixe hundred twentie and fixe outcates of golde, and these be for the behoofe of the Carouan, and also to doe almes vnto the needfull pilgrimes. This Captaine, besides other seruingmen which follow him, hath also foure Chausi to serue him. Likewise he hath with him for the securitie of the Carouan foure hundred souldiers, to wit, two hundred Spachi or horsemen mounted on Dromedaries, and two hundred Janizaries riding vpon Camels. The Chausi and the Spachi are at the charge of the Captaine, but the Janizaries not so, for their prouision is made them from Cairo. The Spachi weare caps or bonnets like to the caps of Sergeants, but the Janizaries after another sort, with a lappe falling downe behinde like a French-hoode, and hauing before a great piece of wrought siluer on their heads. The charge of these is to cause the Carouan to march in good array when neede requireth; these are not at the commandment of any but of the Captaine of the Carouan. Whereouer the Captaine hath for his guide eight pilots, the office of whom is alwayes stable and firme from heire to heire, and these goe before guiding the Carouan, and shewing the way, as being well experienced in the place, and in the night they gouerne them as the mariners, by the starre. These also vse to sende before foure or fixe men carrying piaces of dry wood which giue light, because they should not goe out of the way; and if at any time through their ill hap they wander astray out of the way, they are cast downe and beaten with so many bastonadoes vpon the soles of their feete, as serue them for a perpetuall remembrance. The Captaine of the Carouan hath his Lieutenant accompanied continually with fiftene Spachi, and he hath the charge to set the Carouan in order, and to cause them to depart on their iourney when neede requireth: and during the voyage their office is some whiles to goe before with the forewarde, sometimes to come behinde with the reuerward, sometimes to march on the one side, and sometimes on the other, to spy, that the coast be cleare. The Carouan carrieth with it fixe piaces of ordinance drawn by 12 camels, which serue to terrifie the Arabians, as also to make triumph at Mecca, and other places. The marchantes which followe the Carouan, some carry for marchandise cloth of silke, some Cozall, some tunc, others wheat, rife, and all sorts of graine. Some sell by the way, some at Mecca, so that euery one bringeth something to gaine by, because all marchandise that goeth by land payeth no custome, but that which goeth by sea is bound to pay tennie in the hundred.

The beginning of the voyage.

The feast before the Carouan setteth forth, the Captaine with all his retinue and officers resort vnto the castle of Cairo before the Basha, which giueth vnto euery man a garment, and that of the Captaine is wrought with golde, and the others are serued accozing to their degree. Whereouer he deliuereth vnto him þ Chisua Fahnabi, which signifieth in the Arabian tongue, The garment of the Prophet: this vesture is of silke, wrought in the midst with letters of gold, which signifie: La illa ill' alla Mahumet Resullala: that is to say, There are no gods but God; and his ambassadour Mahumet. This garment is made of purpose to couer from top to botome a litle house in Mecca standing in the midst of the Mesquita, the which house (they say) was builded by Abraham or by his sonne Ismael. After this he deliuereth to him a gate made of purpose for the foresaid house of Abraham wrought all with fine golde, and being of excellent workmanship, and itis a thing of great value, Besides, he deliuereth vnto him a couering of greene velvet made in manner of a pyramis, about nine palmes high, and artificially wrought with most fine golde, and this is to couer the tombe of their prophet within Medina, which tombe is built in manner of a pyramis: and besides that couering there are brought many others of golde and like, for the ornament of the sayde tombe, Which things being consigned, the Basha departeth not from his place; but the Captaine of the Carouan taketh his leaue with all his officers and souldiers, and departeth accompanied with all the people of Cairo orderly in manner of a procession, with singing, shouting and a thousand other ceremonies too long to recite. From the castle they goe to a gate of the citie called Bab-Nassera, without the which standes a Mosquita, and therein they lay by the layd vestures very well kept and guarded. And of this ceremony they make so great account, that the world commeth to see this sight, yea the women great with childe, and others with children in their armes, neither is it lawfull for any man to forbid his wife the going to this feast, for that in so doing the wife may separate her selfe from her husband, and may lie with any other man, in regard of so great a trespassse. Now this procession proceeding from the castle towards the Mosquita, the Camels which bryng the vestures are all adozned with cloth of golde, with many little belles, and passing along the streete you may see the multitude casting vpon the said vestures thousands of beautifull flowers of diuers colours, & sweete water, others bringing towels & fine cloth touch the same, which euer after they keepe as reliques with great reuerence. Afterward hauing left the vesture in the Mosquita, as is aforesaid, they retorne againe into the citie, where they remaine the space of 20 dayes, and then the captaine departeth with his company, and taking the vestures out of the Mosquita, carrieth the same to the foresaid place of Birca, where the Captaine hauing pitched his tent with the standard of the grand Signior ouer the gate, & the other principall tents standing about his, stayeth there some tenne dayes and no more: in which time all those resort thither that meane to follow the Carouan in this voyage to Mecca. Where you shall see certaine women which intend to goe on this voyage accompanied with their parents and friends mounted vpon Camels, adozned with so many ryples, tassels, and knets, that in beholding the same a man cannot refraine from laughter. The last night before their departure they make great feasting and triumph within the Carouan, with castles and other infinite deuises of fireworke, the Janizaries alwayes standing round about the tent of the Captaine with such shouting and tope, that on euery side the earth resoundeth, and this night they discharge all their ordinance, foure or five times, and after at the bzeake of the day vpon the sound of a trumpet they march forward on their way.

What times the Carouan trauelleth, and when it resteth.

It is to be noted, that from Cairo to Mecca they make 40 dayes iourney or thereabout, & the same great dayes iourneies. For the custome of the Carouan is to trauell much and rest little, and ordinarily they iourney in this manner: They trauell from two a clocke in the morning vntill the sunne rising, then hauing rested till noone, they set forward, and so continue till night, & then also rest againe, as is abouesaid, till two of the clocke: and this order they obserue vntill the end of the voyage, neuer changing the same, except in some places, wherof we will hereafter speake, where for respect of water they rest sometimes a day and an halfe, and this they obserue to refresh themselves, other wise both man and beast would die,

In what order the Carouan trauelleth.

The maner and order which the Carouan obserueth in marching is this. It goeth diuided into three parts, to wit, the forward, the maine battell, and the reeward. In the forward go the 8 Pilots before with a Chaus, which hath foure knaues, & ech knaue carrieth a sinew of a bul, to the end that if occasion requireth, þ bastonado may be giuen to such as deserue the same. These knaues cast offendours downe, turning by the soles of their feete made fast to a staffe, giuing them a perpetuall remembrance for them & the beholders. This Chaus is as the Captaine of the forward, which commandeth lights to be carried before when they trauell in the night. Also there go in this forward 6 Santones with red turbants vpon their heads, & these eat and ride at the cost of the Captaine of the Carouan. These Santones when the Carouan arriueth at any good lodging, suddenly after they haue scrided the place, cry with an horrible voyce saying, good cheare, good cheare, we are neere to the wished lodging. For which good newes the chiefe of the company bestow their beneuolence vpon them. In this forward goeth very neere the third part of the people of the Carouan, behind whom go alwayes 25 Spachi armed with swords, bowes & arrowes to defend them from enemies. Next unto the foreward, within a quarter of a mile, followeth the maine battell, and befoze the same are drawn the sayd five pieces of ordnance, with their gunners, and fiftene Spachi Archers. And next unto these cometh the chiefe physician, who is an olde man of authoritie, hauing with him many medicines, oynments, salues, and other like refreshings for the sicke, hauing also camels with him for the sicke to ride on, which haue no hoyle nor beast. Next unto him goeth one Camell alone, the fairest that can be found: for with great industrie is sought the greatest and fairest which may be found within the dominions of the Grand Signior. This camell also is decked with cloth of golde and silke, and carrieth a litle chest made of pure Legmame made in likenesse of the arke of the olde Testament: but, as is abovesayd, made of pure Legmame, without golde or any other thing of cost. Within this chest is the Alcoran all writen with great letters of golde, bound betwene two tables of masse golde, and the chest during their voyage is covered with silke, but at their entering into Mecca it is all covered with cloth of golde, adorned with iewels, and the like at the enterance into Medina. The Camell abovesayd which carrieth the chest, is compassed about with many Arabian singers and musicians, alwayes singing and playing vpon instruments. After this followe fiftene other most faire Camels, euery one carrying one of the abovesayd vestures, being covered from toppe to toe with silke. Behind these goe twentie other Camels which carrie the money, apparell, and provision of the Amirel Cheggi capitaine of the Carouan. After followeth the royall Standard of the grand Signior, accompanied continually with the musicians of the capitaine, and five and twentie Spachi archers, with a Chaus befoze them, and about these marvellous things goe all the people and Camels which follow the Carouan. Behind these, lesse then a mile, followeth the rereward, whereof the greater part are pilgrims: the occasion whereof is, for that the merchants seeke alwayes to be in the foreward for the securitie of their goods, but the pilgrims which haue litle to loose care not though they come behind. Behind these alwayes goe five and twentie other Spachi well armed with another Chaus their capitaine, and fortye Arabians all Archers for guard of the rereward. And because the Carouan goeth alwayes along the red sea banke, which in going forth they haue on their right hand, therfore the two hundred Janissaries parted into thre companies goe vpon their left hand well armed and mounted vpon Camels bound one to another, for vpon that side is all the danger of thienes, and on the other no danger at all, the capitaine of the Carouan alwayes going about his people, sometimes on the one side, and sometimes on the other, neuer keeping any firme place, being continually accompanied with a Chaus and 25. Spachi, armed and mounted vpon Domedaries, and 8. musicians with viols in their handes, which cease not sounding till the capitaine take his rest, vpon whom they attend, all such time as he entreteth his pavillion, and then licencing all his attendants and followers to depart, they goe each man to their lodging.

Of things notable which are seene in this voyage by the way.

Because in the way there are not many things found woorthie memorie, for that the Carouan seldome resteth in places of habitation, of which in the way there are but fewe, yea rather the Carouan resteth altogether in the field: therfore in this our voyage wee will eueryly make mention of certaine Castles found in the way, which bee these, namely, Agerut, Nachel, Acba, Biritem, Muel, and Ezlem. Of which five, the two first are kept of Moores, and the other three of Turkes, and for guard they haue eight men or tenne at the most in euery Castle, with foure or five Smerigli, which serue to keepe the water from the Arabians, so that the Carouan coming thither, may haue wherewithall to refresh it selfe. Agerut is distant from Suez a port of the red Sea eight miles, where are alwayes resident five and twentie gallies of the Grand Signior for the keeping of that Sea. Nachel is distant from the Sea a dayes iourney. The walles of Acba are founded vpon the red Sea banke. Biritem and Muel likewise are dished with the waues of the Sea. Ezlem is distant from thence about a dayes iourney. These five Castles abovesayd are not of force altogether to defend themselves agaynst an hundred men. The Carouan departing from Birca vntill Agerut findeth no water by the way to drinke, neither from Agerut till Nachel, nor from Nachel till Acba, but betwene Acba and Biritem are found two waters, one called Agium el Cassap, and the other Magaraxiaibi, that is to say, the riuer of Iethro the father in lawe of Moses, for this is the place mentioned in the second chapter of Exodus, whither it is sayd that Moses fledde from the anger of Pharao, who would haue killed him, because hee had slaine the Egyptian, which fought with the Hebrew, in which place stood the cite of Midian; and there are yet the ponds, neere vnto the which Moses sate downe. And from that place forward they finde more store of water by the way, and in more places, though not so good. It is also to bee noted, that in this voiage it is needfull and an vsuall thing, that the captaine put his hand to his purse in these places, and bestow presents, garments, and turbants vpon certaine of the chiefe of the Arabians, to the ende they may giue him and his Carouan free passage: who also promise, that their followers likewise shall doe no damage to the Carouan, and bind themselves to accomplish the same, promising also by worde of mouth, that if the Carouan bee robbed, they will make restitution of such things as are stollen: but notwithstanding, the Carouan is by them oftentimes dammified, and those which are robbed haue no other restitution at the Arabians handes then the shewing of them a paire of heeles, flying into such places as it is impossible to finde them. Nowe the Carouan continuing her accustomed iourneys, and hauing passed the abovesayd castles, and others not woorthie mention, at length cometh to a place called Ichbir, which is the beginning and confine of the state and realme of Serifo the king of Mecca: where, at their approaching issueth out to meete them the gouernour of the land, with all his people to receiue the Carouan, with such shouting and triumph, as is impossible to expresse, where they staine one whole day. This place aboundeth with fresh and cleare waters, which with streames fall downe from the high mountaines. Moreover, in this place are great store of dates, and flesh great store and good cheape, and especially laced muttons which willingly fall downe, and here the wearie pilgrimes haue commoditie to refresh themselves, saying, that this wicked fact purgeth them from a multitude of sinnes, and besides increaseth deuotion to prosecute the voiage. Touching the building in these places, it is to bee iudged by the houses halfe ruinated, that it hath bene a magnificent cite: but because it was in times past inhabited more with thieues then true men, it was therefore altogether destroyed by Soldan Gauri king of Egypt, who going on pilgrimage vnto Mecca, and passing by this place, there was by the inhabitants hereof some iniurie done vnto his Carouan, which hee vnderstanding of, dissembled till his returned from Mecca, and then caused it to bee burned and destroyed in pitifull sort for reuenge of the iniurie done vnto the Carouan. The Carouan hauing rested and being refreshed as is abovesayd, the next day departeth on the way, and the first place they arrive at woorthie mention is called Bedrihonem, in which place (as is aforesayd) growe those little shrubbes whereout Balme issueth. And before the Carouan arriueth at this place, a mile from the cite is a large and great field enuironed about with most high and huge mountaines. And in this field, according to the Alcoran, their prophet Mahomet had a most fierce and cruell battell given by the Christians of the countrey and other people which set themselves agaynst them, and withstood his opinion, so that hee was overcome and vanquished of the Christians, and almost halfe of his people slaine in the battell. Whereupon, the prophet seeing himselfe in such extremitie, fell to his prayers, and they say, that God hauing compassion vpon his deare friend and prophet, heard him, and sent him infinite thousands of angels, wherewith returning to the battell, they conquered and overcame the conquerour. And therefore in memorie of this victorie, the Carouan lodgeth every yeere one night in this place, making great bonfires with great mirth. And they say that as yet there is heard vpon the mountaines a little drumme, which while the Carouan passeth, neuer ceaseth sounding. And they say further, that the sayd drumme is sounded by the angels in signe of that great victorie graunted of God to their prophet. Also the Mahumetan writings affirme, that after the ende of the sayd battell, the prophet commaunded certaine of his people to goe and burie all the Mahumerans which were dead in the fields, who going, knew not the one from the other, because as yet they had not circumcision, so they returned vnto him, answering, that they had bene to doe his commaundement, but they knew not the Musulmans from the Christians. To whom the prophet answered, saying: Turne againe, and all those which you shall finde with their faces downward, leaue them, because all they are misbeleeuers; and the other which you shall finde with their faces turned vpward, them burie, for they are the true Musulmani, and so his commaundement was done.

The next morning by Sunne rising, the Carouan arriueth at Bedrihonem, in which place every man washeth himselfe from toppe to toe, as well men as women, and leauing off their apparell, hauing each one a cloth about their priuities, called in their tongue Phorah, and another white one vpon their shoulders, all which can goe to Mecca in this habite, do so, and are thought to merite more then the other, but they which cannot doe so make a vowe to sacrifice a Ramme at the mountaine of pardons: and after they bee washed, it is not lawfull for any man or woman man to kill either flea or louse with their handes, neither yet to take them with their nailes, vntill they haue accomplished their vowed orations in the mountaine of pardons aboue sayd: and therefore they carry with them certaine stickes made of purpose in maner of a file, called in their language Arca, Cassah Guch, with which they grate their shoulders. And so the Carouan marching, commeth within two miles of Mecca where they rest that night. In the morning at the breake of day, with all pompe possible they set forward toward Mecca, and drawing neere thereunto, the Serifo issueth forth of the citie with his guard, accompanied with an infinite number of people, shouting, and making great triumph. And being come out of the citie a boweshoote into a faire field, where a great multitude of tents are pitched, and in the midst the pavillion of the capitaine, who meeting with the Serifo, after salutations on each side, they light from their horses and enter into the pavillion, where the king of Mecca deprieth himselfe of all authoritie and power, and committeth the same to the aboue-named capitaine, giuing him full licence and authoritie to command, gouerne, and minister iustice during his aboad in Mecca with his company, and on the other side the capitaine to requite this liberalitie vsed toward him by the Serifo, giueth him a garment of cloth of gold of great value, with certaine Jewels and other like things. After this, sitting downe together vpon carpets and hides they eat together, and rising from thence with certaine of the chiefeest, and taking with them the garment and gate aboue sayd, they goe directly to the Mosquita, attended on but with a fewe, and being entered, they cause the olde to be pulled downe, and put the newe couerture vpon the house of Abraham, and the olde vesture is the eunuchs which serue in the sayde Mosquita, who after sell it vnto the pilgrims at foure or fivescore shillings the pike: and happy doth that man thinke himselfe, which can get neuer so litle a piece thereof, to conserue ener after as a most holy relique: and they say, that putting the same vnder the head of a man at the houre of his death, thorough vertue thereof all his finnes are forgiven. Also they take away the old doore, setting in the place the new doore, and the old by custome they giue vnto the Serifo. After hauing made their prayers with certaine ordinarie and woonted ceremonies, the Serifo remaineth in the citie, and the capitaine of the pilgrimage returneth vnto his pavillion.

Of the Serifo the king of Mecca.

The Serifo is descended of the prophet Mahomet by Fatma daughter of that good prophet, and Ali his husband to her, and soune in lawe to Mahomet, who had no issue male, saue this sonne of the Serifo, to the eldest sonne whereof the realme commeth by succession. This realme hath of reuenues royall, euery yeere halfe a million of golde, or litle more: and all such as are of the prophets kindred, or descended of that blood (which are almost innumerable) are called Emyri, that is to say, lordes. These all goe clothed in greene, or at the least haue their turbant greene, to bee knowne from the other. Neither is it permitted that any of those Christians which dwell or traffique in their Countrey goe clothed in greene, neither may they haue any thing of greene about them: for they say it is not lawfull for misbeleeuers to weare that colour, wherewith that great friend and prophet of god Mahomet was woont to be apparelled.

Of the citie of Mecca.

The Citie of Mecca in the Arabian tongue is called Macca, that is to say, an habitation. This citie is inuironed about with exceeding high and barren mountaines, and in the plaine betweene the sayde mountaines and the citie are many pleasant gardens, where groweth great abudaunce of figges, grapes, apples, and melons. There is also great abudaunce of good water and fleshe, but not of bread. This citie hath no walles about it, and containeth in circuite fiew miles. The houses are very handsome and commodious, and are built like to the houses in Italie. The palace of the Serifo is sumptuous and gorgeously adorned. The women of the place are courteous, iocund, and lovely, faire, with alluring eyes, being hote and libidinous, and the most of them naughtie packes. The men of this place are giuen to that abhominable, cursed, and opprobrious vice, whereof both men and women make but small account by reason of the pond Zun Zun, wherein hauing washed themselves, their opinion is, that although like the dog they returne to their vomite, yet they are cleansed from all sinne whatsoever, of which sin we will hereafter more largely discourse. In the midst of the city is the great Mosquira, with the house of Abraham standing in the very middle thereof, which Mosquira was built in the time when their prophet liued. It is foure square, and so great, that it containeth two miles in circuit, that is to say, halfe a mile each side. Also it is made in maner of a cloister, for that in the midst thereof separate from the rest, is the abouesayd house of Abraham, also the galleries round about are in maner of 4. streetes, and the partitions which diuide the one street from the other are pillars, whereof some are of marble, and others of lime and stone. This famous and sumptuous Mosquira hath 99. gates, and 5. steeples, from whence the Talismani call the people to the Mosquira. And the pilgrimes which are not prouided of tents, resort hither, and for moze deuotion the men and women lie together aloft and beneath, one vpon another, so that their house of praise becommeth worse sometimes then a den of theiues.

Of the house of Abraham.

The house of Abraham is also foure square, and made of speckled stone, 20. paces high, and 40 in circuit. And vpon one side of this house within the wall, there is a stone of a span long, and halfe a span broad, which stone (as they say) befoze this house was builded, fell downe from heauen, at the fall whereof was heard a voyce, that wheresoeuer this stone fell, there should be built the house of God, wherein God will heare sinners. Forcouer, they say that when this stone fell from heauen, it was not blacke as now, but as white as the whitest snow, and by reason it hath bene so oft kissed by sinners, it is therewith become blacke: for all the pilgrimes are bound to kisse this stone, other wise they carry their sinnes home with them again. The entrance into this house is very small, made in maner of a window, and as high from the ground as a man can reach so that it is painful to enter. This house hath without 31. pillars of bzasse, set vpon cubike or square stones being red and greene, the which pillars sustaine not ought els saue a threed of copper, which reacheth from one to another, wherunto are fastened many burning lampes. These pillars of bzasse were caused to be made by Sulran Soliman grandfather to Sultan Amurath now Emperour. After this, hauing entred with the difficultie abovesayd, there stand at the entrance two pillars of marble, to wit, on each side one. In the midst there are three of Aloes-wood not very thicke, and couered with tiles of India of 1000. colours which serue to vnderproppethe Terrazza. It is so darke, that they can hardly see within for want of light, not without an euill smell. Without the gate five paces is the abouesayd pond Zun Zun, which is that blessed pond that the angell of the lord shewed vnto Agar whiles she went seeking water for her sonne Ismael to drinke.

Of the ceremonies of the pilgrimes.

In the beginning we haue sayd how the Mahumetans haue two feasts in the yeere. The one they call Pascha di Ramazaco, that is to say, The feast of fasting, and this feast of fasting is holden thirtie dayes after the feast, wherein the Carouan traueileth to Mecca. The other is called the feast of the Ramme, wherein all they which are of abilitie are bound to sacrifice a Ramme, and this they call Bine Bairam, that is to say, The great feast. And as the Carouan departeth from Cairo thirtie dayes after the little feast, so likewise they come hither five or sixe dayes befoze the great feast, to the ende the pilgrimes may haue time befoze the feast to finish their rites and ceremonies, which are these. Departing from the Carouan, and being guided by such as are experienced in the way, they goe vnto the citie twentie or thirtie in a company as they thinke good, walking through a streete which ascendeth by litle and litle till they come vnto a certaine gate, whereupon is witten on each side in marble stone, Babel Salema, which in the Arabian tongue significth, the gate of health. And from this place is descried the great Mosquira, which enuironeth the house of Abraham, which being descried, they reuerently salute twise, saying, Salem Alech Iara sul Alla, that is to say, Peace to thee, ambassadour of God. This salutation being ended, proceeding on the way, they finde an arche vpon their right hand, whereon they ascend five steps, vpon the which is a great voyd place made of stone: after, descending other five steps, and proceeding the space of a flight-shoot, they finde another arche like vnto the first, and this way from the one arche to the other they go and come 7. times, saying alwaies some of their prayers, which (they say) the afflicted Agar sayd, whiles she sought and found not water for her sonne Ismael to drinke. This ceremonie being ended, the pilgrimes enter into the Mosquira, and drawing neere vnto the house of Abraham, they goe round about it other seven times, alwayes saying: This is the house of God, and of his seruant Abraham; This done, they goe to kisse that blacke stone abouesayd. After they go vnto the pond Zun Zun, and in their apparell apparell as they be, they wash themselves from head to foote, saying, Tobah Allah, Tobah Allah, that is to say, Pardon lord, Pardon lord, drinkeing also of that water, which is both muddie, filthy, and of an ill saour, and in this wise washed and watered, euery one returneth to his place of abode, and these ceremonies euery one is bound to doe once at the least. But those which haue a mind to ouergoe their fellowes, and to go into paradise before the rest, doe the same once a day while the Carouan remaineth there.

The Carouan hauing abode within the citie of Mecca siue dayes, the night before the euening of their feast, the captaine with all his company setteth forward towards the mountaine of pardons, which they call in the Arabian tongue, Iabel Arafara. This mountaine is distant from Mecca 15. miles, and in the mid way thereto is a place called Mina, that is to say, The haueu, and a litle from thence are 4. great pillars, of which hereafter we will speake. Now first touching the mountaine of pardons, which is rather to be called a litle hill, then a mountain, for that it is low, litle, delightful and pleasant, containing in circuit two miles, and enuironed round about with the goodliest plaine that euer with mans eie could be seen, and the plaine likewise compassed with exceeding high mountains, in such sort, that this is one of the goodliest situations in the world: and it seemeth verily, that nature hath therein shewed all her cunning, in making this place vnder the mountaine of pardons so broad and pleasant. Upon the side towards Mecca there are many pipes of water cleare, faire, and fresh, and aboue all most wholesome, falling down into certaine vessels made of purpose, where the people refresh and wash themselves, and water their cattel. And when Adam and Euah were cast out of paradise by the angel of the Lord, the Mahumetans say, they came to inhabite this litle mountaine of pardons. Also they say, that they had lost one another, and were seperated for the space of 40. yeeres, and in the end met at this place with great joy & gladnesse, and builded a litle house vpon the top of this mountaine, the which at this day they call Beyt Adam, that is to say, the house of Adam.

The mountain of pardons.

Of the three Carouans:

The same day that the Carouan of Cairo cometh to this place, hither cometh 2. Carouans also, one of Damasco, the other of Arabia, and in like maner all the inhabitants for ten dayes journey round about, so that at one time there is to be seen aboue 200000. persons, and more the 300000. cattell. Now all this company meeting together in this place the night before the feast, the three hostes cast themselves into a triangle, setting the mountaine in the midst of them: and all that night there is nothing to be heard nor scene, but gunshot and fireworkes of sundry sortes, with such singing, sounding, shouting, halowing, runnoys, feasting, and triumphing, as is wonderfull. After this, the day of the feast being come, they are all at rest and silence, and that day they attend on no other thing, then to sacrifice oblations and prayers vnto God, and in the euening all they which haue horses mount thereon, and approach as nigh vnto the mountaine as they can, and those which haue no horses make the best shift they can on foote, giuing euery one vnto the captaine of Cairo the chiefe place, the second to the captaine of Damasco, and the third to the captaine of Arabia, & being all approached as is abovesayd, there cometh a square squire, one of the Santones, mounted on a camell well furnished, who at the other side of the mountain ascendeth siue steps into a pulpit made for that purpose, and all being silent, turning his face towards the people, he maketh a short sermon of the tenour following.

The summe of the Santones sermon.

The summe of this double doctors sermon is thus much in brieft. He sheweth them how many and how great benefites God hath giuen to the Mahumetan people by the hand of his beloued friend and prophet Mahomer, hauing deliuered them from the seruitude of sinne & from idolatry, in which before time they were drowned, and how he gaue vnto them the house of Abraham wherin they should be heard, and like wise the mountaine of pardons, by meanes whereof they might obtaine grace and remission of their sinnes: adding, that the mercifull God, who is a liberrall giuer of all good things, commaunded his secretarie Abraham to build him an house in Mecca, where his successors might make their prayers vnto him and bee heard, at which time all the mountains in the world came together thither with sufficiencie of stones for building hereof, except that litle and low hill, which for pouertie could not go to discharge this debt, for the which it became sorrowfull, weeping beyond all measure for the space of thirtie yeeres, at the ende whereof the eternall God hauing pittie and compassion vpon this pooze Mountaine, saide vnto it: Weepe no more (my daughter) for thy bitter plaints haue ascended vp into mine eares, therefore comfort thy selfe: for I will cause all those that shall goe to visite the house of my friend Abraham, that they shall not be absolued from their sinnes, vnlesse they first come to doe thee reuerence, and to keepe in this place their holiest feast. And this I haue commanded vnto my people by the mouth of my friend and prophet Mahumer. This said, he exhorteth them vnto the loue of God, and to prayer and almes. The sermon being done at the Sunne-setting they make 3. prayers, namely, the first for the Scifo, the second for the Grand Signior with his hoste, and the third for all the people: to which prayers all with one voyce cry saying; Amni Ia Alla, Amni Ia Alla, that is to say, Be it so Lord, be it so Lord. Thus hauing had the Santones blessing and saluted the Mountaine of pardons, they returne the way they came vnto Mina, whereof wee haue made mention. In returning at the end of the plaine are the abovesaid 4. pillars, to wit, two on eche side of the way, through the midst whereof they say it is needfull that euery one passe, saying, that who so passeth without looſeth all that merit which in his pilgrimage he had gotten. Also from the mountaine of pardons vntil they be passed the said pillars none dare looke backward, for feare least the sinnes which he hath left in the mountains returne to him againe. Being past these pillars euery one lighteth downe, seeking in this sandy field 50, or 60. little stones, which being gathered, and bound in an handkerchiffe they carry to the abovesaid place of Mina, where they stay 5. dayes, because at that time there is a faire free and franke of al custome. And in this place are other 3. pillars, not together, but set in diuers places, where (as their prophet saith) were the three apparitions which the diuel made vnto Abraham, and to Ismael his sonne; for amongst them they make no mention of Isaac, as if he had neuer bene borne. So they say, that the blessed God hauing commanded Abraham his faithfull seruant to sacrifice his first begotten Ismael, the old Abraham went to do according to Gods wil, and met with the infernal enemy in the shape of a man, and being of him demanded whither he went, he answered, that he went to sacrifice his sonne Ismael, as God had commanded him. Against whom the diuel exclaiming saide: Oh dotting old man, sith God in thine old age hath maruelously giuen thee this son (in whom all nations shalbe blessed) wherefore giuing credite vnto vaine dreames, wilt thou kill him whom so much thou hast desired, and so intirely loued. But Abraham shaking him off proceeded on his way, whereupon the diuel seeing his words could not preuaile with the father attempted the sonne, saying: Ismael, haue regard vnto thy selfe betimes in this thing which is so dangerous. Wherefore? answered y^e childe. Because (saith the diuel) thy dotting father seeketh to take away thy life. For what occasion, saide Ismael? Because (saith the enemy) he saith, that God hath commanded him. Which Ismael hearing hee tooke vp stones and threw at him, saying, Auzu billahi minal scia itanil ragini, which is to say, I defend me with God from the diuel the offender, as who would say, wee ought to obey the commandement of God and resist the diuel with al our force. But to returne to our purpose, the pilgrims during their aboad there goe to visite these three pillars, throwing away the little stones which befoze they gathered, whilst they repeat the same words which they say, that Ismael said to the diuel, when hee withstood him. From hence halfe a mile is a mountaine, whither Abraham went to sacrifice his sonne, as is abovesaid. In this mountaine is a great den whither the pilgrims resort to make their prayers, and there is a great stone naturally separated in the midst; and they say, that Ismael, while his father Abraham was busie about the sacrifice, tooke the knife in hand to proue how it would cut, and making triall diuided the stone into two parts. The five dayes being expired, the captaine ariseth with all the Carouan, and returneth againe to Mecca, where they remaine other five dayes. And while these rest, we will treat of the city and port of Grida vpon the Red Sea.

Of Grida.

Grida a port neere Mecca.

Therefore wee say that from Mecca to Grida they make two small dayes iourney: and because in those places it is ill traueiling in the day-time by reason of the great heat of the Sunne, therefore they depart in the euening from Mecca, and in the morning befoze Sunne-rising they are arriued halfe way, where there are certaine habitations well furnished, and good Innes to lodge in, but especially women ynough which voluntarily bestowe their almes vpon the pooze pilgrims: likewise departing the next euening, the morning after, they come vnto Grida. This citie is founded vpon the Red Sea banke, enuironed with wals & towers to the land-ward, but through continuance of time almost consumed and wasted: on the side to seaward it stands vn-walled. Grida hath thye gates, one on eche side, and the thirde in the midst towarde the land, which is called, The port of Mecca, nere vnto which are 6, or 7. Turks vpon the old towers for guard thereof with foure faulcons vpon one of the coznerns of the city to the land-ward. Also to sea-ward where the wall ioyneth with the water, there is lately made a fort like vnto a bulwarke, where they haue planted 25 pieces of the best ordnance that might be had, which are very well kept and guarded. Moze outward towards the sea vpon the farthest olde tower are other fine good pieces with 30 men to guard them. On the other side of the city at the end of the wall there is lately builded a bulwarke strong and well guarded by a Saniacho with 150 Turks well provided with ordnance and all other necessities and munition, and all these fortifyinges are for none other cause then for feare and suspicion of the Portugals. And if the port were good all this were in vaine: but the port cannot be worse nor moze dangerous; being all full of rocks and sands, in such wise, that the ships cannot come neere, but perforce ride at the least two miles off. At this port arrive euery yeere forty or fifty great shippes laden with spices and other rich marchandize which peeld in custome 150000 ducats, the halfe wherof goeth vnto the Grand Signior, and the other halfe to the Serifo. And because there is none other thing worthy mention in Grida we will returne to our Carouan which hath almost rested enough.

The Portugals greatly feared in the Red sea.

Forty or fifty rich ships are time yerely at Grida.

Of their going to Medina.

The Carouan departeth for Medina returning the same way they came vnto Bedrihonem, where they leaue their ordnance and other cariages, whereof they haue no need, with the pilgrims which haue seene Medina aforesaid, and desire not to see it againe, but stay in that place, expecting the carouan, and resting vntill the carouan go from Bedrihonem to Medina, where they alwayes finde goodly habitations, with abundance of sweet waters, and dares enough, and being within foureteene miles of Medina they come vnto a great plaine called by them Iabel el Salema, that is to say, the mountaine of health, from which they begin to descry the city and tombe of Mahomet, at which sight they light from their horses in token of reuerence. And being ascended by the sayd mountaine with shouting which pierceth the skies they say, Sala tuua Salema Alacchah Iarah sul Allah. Sala tuua Salema Alacchah Ianabi Allah, Sala tuua Salema Alaccha Iahabi Allah: which wordes in the Arabian tongue signifie: Prayer and health be vnto thee, oh prophet of God: prayer and health be vpon thee, oh beloued of God. And hauing pronounced this salutation, they proceed on their iourney, so that they lodge that night within thre miles of Medina: and the next morning the captaine of the pilgrimage ariseth, & proceeding towards the city, and drawing neere, there cometh the gouernour vnder the Serifo, accompanied with his people to receiue the Carouan, hauing pitched their tents in the midst of a goodly field where they lodge.

Of Medina.

Medina is a little city of great antiquity, containing in circuit not about two miles, hauing therein but one castle, which is olde and weake, guarded by an Aga with fifty pieces of artillery, but not very good. The houses therof are faire and well situated, built of lime and stone, and in the midst of the city stands a fouresquare Mosquita, not so great as that of Mecca, but moze goodly, rich, and sumptuous in building. Within the same in a corner thereof is a tombe built vpon foure pillars with a vault, as if it were vnder a pauement, which bindeth all the foure pillars together. The tombe is so high, that it farre exceedeth in height the Mosquita, being covered with lead, and the top all inamelled with golde, with an halfe moone vpon the top: and within the pauement it is all very artificially wrought with golde. Below there are round about very great staires of yron ascending vntill the midst of the pillars, and in the very midst thereof is buried the body of Mahomet, and not in a chest of yron cleauing to the adamant, as many affirme that know not the truth thereof. Mozeouer, ouer the body they haue built a tombe of speckled stone all byace and an halfe high, and ouer the same another of Legmanie fouresquare in maner of a pyramis. After this, round about the sepulture there hangeth a curtaine of silke, which letteth the sight of those without, that they cannot see the sepulture. Beyond this in the same Mosquita are other two sepulchres covered with greene cloth, and in the one of them is buried Fatma the daughter of Mahomet, and Alli is buried in the other, who was the husband of the sayd Fatma. The attendants vpon these sepulchres are fifty eunuches white and tawny, neither is it granted to any of them to enter within the tombe, lauing to thre white eunuches the oldest and best of credit; vnto whom it is lawfull to enter but twice in the day, to light the lamps, and to doe other seruices. All the other eunuchs attend without to the seruice of the Mosquita, and the other two sepulchres of Fatma, and Alli, where euery one may go and touch at his pleasure, and take of the earth for deuotion, as many do.

Of things without the City.

Without the city and on euery side are most faire gardens, with many fountaines of most sweet water, infinite poudes, abundance of fruit, with much honest liuing, so that this place is very pleasant and delightfull. This city hath three gates, one of which is an hospitall caused to be built by Cassachi, called the Rose, who was wife to Sultan Soliman grandfather to this emperor. The sayd hospitall hath nought els woorth mention, saue that it is fairely built, and hath large reuenues belonging thereunto, and nourisheth many poore people. A mile from the city are certaine houses wherof they affirme one to be the same, where Mahumer in his lifetime dwelt. This house hath on euery side very many faire date trees, amongst which there are two which grow out of one stocke exceeding high, and these, they say, their Prophet graffed with his owne hand: the fruit thereof is alwayes sent to Constantinople, to be presented vnto the Grand Signior, and is sayd to be that blessed fruit of the Prophet. Nere vnto the date trees is a faire fountaine of cleere and sweet water, the which by a conduit pipe is brought into the city of Medina. Also there is a little Mosquita, wherein three places are counted holy, and greatly reuerenced: the first they affirme, that their Prophet made his first prayer in, after he knew God: the second is that whither he went when he would see the holy house of Abraham, where when he fate downe to that intent, they say the mountaines opened from the toppe to the bottome to shew him the house, and after closed againe as befoze: the third holy place is in the midst of the sayd Mosquita, where is a tombe made of lime and stone fouresquare, and full of sand, wherein, they say, was buried that blessed camell which Mahumer was alwayes wont to ride vpon. On the other side of the city are other tombes of holy Mahumetans, and euery one of them hath a tombe built vpon foure pillers, amongst which three were the companions of Mahumer, to wit, Abubacar, Ottoman, and Omar; all which are visited of the pilgrims as holy places.

The offering of the vestures vnto the sepulchres.

The Carouan being come to Medina two houres befoze day, and resting there till the evening, the captaine then with his company and other pilgrims setteth forthward, with the greatest pompe possible: and taking with him the vesture which is made in manner of a pyramis, with many other of golde and silke, departeth, going thorow the midst of the city, vntill he come to the Mosquita, where hauing prayed, he presenteth vnto the tombe of his prophet (where the eunuchs receiuing hands are ready) the vesture for the sayd tombe: and certaine eunuchs entering in take away the old vesture, and lay on the new, burning the olde one, and diuiding the golde thereof into equall portions. After this are presented other vestures for the ornament of the Mosquita. Also the people without deliuer vnto the eunuchs ech man somewhat to touch the tombe therewith, which they keepe as a relique with great deuotion. This ceremony being ended, the captaine resteth in Medina two dayes, to the end the pilgrims may finish their deuotion and ceremonies: and after they depart to Iambor. A good dayes iourney thence is a steepe mountaine, ouer which is no passage, sauing by one narrow path called Demir Capi, which was in times past called the yron gate. Of this gate the Mahumetans say, that Ally the companion and some in law of Mahumer, being here pursued by many Christians, and comming vnto this mountaine, not seeing any way wherby to flee, drew out his sword, and striking the said mountaine, diuided it in sunder, and passing thorow saued his life on the other side. Whereouer, this Alli among the Persians is had in greater reuerence then Mahumer, who affirme, that the sayd Alli hath done greater things and moze miraculous then Mahumer, and therefore they esteeme him for God almighty his fellows. But to returne to our matter, the captaine with the carouan within two dayes after returneth for Cairo, and comming to Ezlem, findeth there a captaine with threescore horses come thither to bring refreshments to the said captaine of the pilgrimage, as also to sell vnto the pilgrims some victuals. From thence they set forthward, and comming to Birca within two leagues of Cairo, there is the master of the house of the Bascha of Cairo with all his horsemen come thither to receiue him, with a sumptuous and costly banquet made at the cost of the Bascha for the captaine and his retinue, who after he is well refreshed departeth toward the castle of Cairo to salute the Bascha, who receiuing him with great ioy and gladnesse in token of good wil presenteth him with a garment of cloth of golde very rich: and the captaine taking the Alcaron out of the chest presenteth it to the Bascha, who hauing kissed it, commandeth to lay it up againe. Some there are which affirme, that being arrived at Cairo, they kill that goodly camell which carried the Alcaron, and ate him; which is nothing so: for they are so superstitious to the contrary, that to gaine all the world world they would not kill him. But if by casualty he should die, in this case happy and blessed they thinke themselves, which can get a morsell to eat. And thus much concerning the voyage of the captaine of the carouan of Cairo.

The voyage and trauell of M. Caesar Fredericke, Marchant of Venice, into the East India, and beyond the Indies. Wherein are contained the customes and rites of those countries, the merchandises and commodities, aswell of golde and siluer, as spices, drugges, pearles, and other iewels: translated out of Italian by M. Thomas Hicke.cke.

Caesar Fredericke to the Reader.

Having (gentle Reader) for the space of eightene yeeres continually coasted and trauelled, as it were, all the East Indies, and many other countreys beyond the Indies, wherein I haue had both good and ill successe in my trauels: and hauing seene & vnderstood many things woorthy the noting, and to be knowen to all the world, the which were neuer as yet written of any: I thought it good (seeing the Almighty had giuen me grace, after so long perils in passing such a long voyage to returne into mine owne countrey, the noble city of Venice) I say, I thought it good, as briefly as I could, to write and set forth this voyage made by me, with the maruellous things I haue seene in my trauels in the Indies: The mighty Princes that gouerne those countreys, their religion and faith that they haue, the rites and customes which they vse, and liue by, of the diuers successe that happened vnto me, and how many of these countreys are abounding with spices, drugs, and iewels, giuing also profitable aduertisement to all those that haue a desire to make such a voyage. And because that the whole world may more commodiously reioyce at this my trauell, I haue caused it to be printed in this order: and now I present it vnto you (gentle & louing Readers) to whom for the varieties of things heerein contained, I hope that it shall be with great delight receiued. And thus God of his goodnesse keepe you.

Caesar Fredericke trauelled eightene yeeres in the East Indies.

A voyage to the East Indies, and beyond the Indies, &c.

In the yere of our Lord God 1563, I Caesar Fredericke being in Venice, and very desirous to see the East parts of the world, shipped my selfe in a shippe called the Gradaige of Venice, with certaine merchandise, gouerned by M. Iacomo Vatica, which was bound to Cyprus with his ship: with whom I went: and when we were arrived in Cyprus, I left that ship, and went in a lesser to Tripoly in Soria, where I stayed a while. Afterward I tooke my iourney to Alepo, and there I acquainted my selfe with marchants of Armenia, and Boozes, that were marchants, and consoled to go with them to Ormus, and wee departed from Alepo, and in two dayes iourney and a halfe, wee came to a city called Bir.

The author is going fro Venice to Cyprus and Tripoly.

Of the city called Bir.

Bir is a small city very scarce of all manner of victuals; and nere vnto the walles of the city runneth the riuer of Euphrates. In this city the marchants diuide themselves into companies, according to their merchandise that they haue, and there either they buy or make a boat to carry them and their goods to Babylon downe the riuer Euphrates, with charge of a master and mariners to conduct the boat in the voyage: these boats are in a manner flat bottomed, yet they be very strong: and for all that they are so strong, they will serue but for one voyage. They are made according to the shodnesse of the riuer, because that the riuer is in many places full of great stones, which greatly hinder and trouble those that goe downe the riuer. These boats serue but for one voyage downe the riuer vnto a village called Feluchia, because it is impossible to bring them by the riuer backe againe. At Feluchia the marchants plucke their boats in peeces, or else sell them for a small price, for that at Bir they cost the marchants forty or fifty chickens a peece, and they sel them at Feluchia for seven or eight chickens a peece, because that when the marchants returne from Babylon backe againe, if they haue merchandise or goods that oweth custome, then they make their returne in forty dayes thorow the wildernesse, passing that way with a great teale lesser charges then the other way. And if they haue not merchandise that oweth custome, then they goe by the way of Mosul, where it costeth them great charges both the Carouan and company.

The riuer Euphrates.

Feluchia a small city on Euphrates.

company. From Bir where the marchants imbarke themselves to Feluchia ouer against Babylon, if the riuer haue good stoe of water, they shall make their voyage in fifteene or eightene dayes downe the riuer, and if the water be lowe, and it hath not rained, then it is much trouble, and it will be forty or fifty dayes iourney downe, because that when the barks strike on the stones that be in the riuer, then they must vnlade them, which is great trouble, and then lade them againe when they haue mended them: therefore it is not necessary, neither doe the marchants go with one boat alone, but with two or thre, that if one boat split and be lost with striking on the sholes, they may haue another ready to take in their goods, vntill such time as they haue mended the broke boat, and if they draw the broken boat on land to mend her, it is hard to defend her in the night from the great multitude of Arabians that will come downe there to robbe you: and in the riuers euery night, when you make fast your boat to the bankeside, you must keepe good watch against the Arabians which are theues in number like to ants, yet when they come to robbe, they will not kill, but steale & run away. Harquebuzes are very good weapons against them, for that they stand greatly in feare of the shot. And as you passe the riuer Euphrates from Bir to Feluchia, there are certein places which you must passe by, where you pay custome certaine medines vpon a bale, which custome is belonging to the sonne of Aborise king of the Arabians and of the desert, who hath certaine cities and villages on the riuer Euphrates.

The Arabian theues are in number like to Ants.

Feluchia and Babylon.

Feluchia is a village where they that come from Bir doe imbarke themselves and vnlade their goods, and it is distant from Babylon a dayes iourney and an halfe by land: Babylon is no great city, but it is very populous, and of great trade of strangers because it is a great thoroughfare for Persia, Turkia, and Arabia: and very often times there goe out from thence Carouans into diuers countreys: and the city is very copious of victuals, which comme out of Armenia downe the riuer of Tygris, on certaine Zatiars or Raffes made of blowen hides or skinned calfel Vrij. This riuer Tygris doth wash the walles of the city. These Raffes are bound fast together, and then they lay boards on the aforesayd blowen skinned, and on the boards they lade the commodities, and so come they to Babylon where they vnlade them, and being vnladen, they let out the winde out of the skinned, and lade them on cammels to make another voyage. This city of Babylon is situate in the kingdome of Persia, but now gouerned by the Turks. On the other side of the riuer towards Arabia, ouer against the city, there is a faire place or towne, and in it a faire Bazarro for marchants, with very many lodgings, where the greatest part of the marchants strangers which come to Babylon do lie with their marchandize. The passing ouer Tygris from Babylon to this Boroough is by a long bidge made of boates chained together with great chaines: provided, that when the riuer waereth great with the abundance of raine that falleth, then they open the bidge in the middle, where the one halfe of the bidge falleth to the walles of Babylon, and the other to the banks of this Boroough, on the other side of the riuer: and as long as the bidge is open, they passe the riuer in small boats with great danger, because of the smallnesse of the boats, and the ouerlading of them, that with the fiercenesse of the streame they be ouerthrowen, or els the streame doth carry them away, so that by this meanes, many people are lost and drowned: this thing by prooffe I haue many times seene.

A bidge made of boates.

Of the tower of Babylon.

The Tower of Nimrod or Babel is situate on that side of Tygris that Arabia is, and in a very great plaine distant from Babylon seuen or eight miles: which tower is ruinated on euery side, and with the falling of it there is made a great mountaine: so that it hath no soyme at all, yet there is a great part of it standing, which is compassed and almost couered with the aforesayd fallings: this Tower was builded and made of foure square Bricks, which Bricks were made of earth, and dried in the Sunne in maner and soyme following: first they layed a lay of Bricks, then a Bat made of Canes, square as the Bricks, and in stead of lime, they daubed it with earth: these Bats of Canes are at this time so strong, that it is a thing woonderfull to behold, being of such great antiquity: I haue gone round about it, and haue not found any place where there hath bene any doore or entrance: it may be in my iudgement in circuit about a mile, and rather lesse then more.

These bricks be in thickness six or seuen inches, and a foot & a halfe square.

This Tower in effect is contrary to all other things which are seene afar off, for they seeme small, & the more nere a man cometh to them the bigger they be: but this tower afar off seemeth a very great thing, and the nether you come to it the lesser. By iudgement & reason of this is, that because because the Tower is set in a very great plaine, and hath nothing more about to make any thew saving the ruines of it which it hath made round about, and for this respect describing it a farre off, that piece of the Tower which yet standeth with the mountaine that is made of the substance that hath fallen from it, maketh a greater shew then you shall finde comming neere to it.

Babylon and Basora.

From Babylon I departed for Basora, shipping my selfe in one of the barks that use to go in the river Tigris from Babylon to Basora, and from Basora to Babylon: which barks are made after the maner of Fufts or Gallions with a Sponon and a covered poope: they haue no pompe in them because of the great abundance of pitch which they haue to pitch them with all: which pitch they haue in abundance two dayes iourney from Babylon. Here vnto the river Euphrates, there is a city called Heit, nere vnto which city there is a great plaine full of pitch, very maruellous to beholde, and a thing almost incredible, that out of a hole in the earth, which continually thoweth out pitch into the aire with continuall smoake, this pitch is thowen with such force, that being hot it falleth like as it were sprinkled ouer all the plaine, in such abundance that the plaine is alwayes full of pitch: the Moors and the Arabians of that place say, that that hole is the mouth of hell: and in truerth, it is a thing very notable to be marked: and by this pitch the whole people haue great benefit to pitch their barks, which barks they call Daneck and Saffin. When the river of Tygris is well replenished with water, you may passe from Babylon to Basora in eight or nine dayes, and sometimes more and sometimes lesse: we were halfe so much more which is 14 or 15 daies, because the waters were low: they may saile day & night, and there are some places in this way where you pay so many medins on a baile: if the waters be lowe, it is 18 dayes iourney.

This hole whereout cometh this pitch is most true, and the water & pitch runneth into the balley of the land where the pitch resteth, & the water runneth into the river Euphrates, and it maketh all the river to be as it were blackish with the smell of pitch and bymstone.

Basora.

Basora is a city of the Arabians, which of olde time was gouerned by those Arabians called Zizarij, but now it is gouerned by the great Turke where he keepeth an army to his great charges.

Zizarij, an ancient people.

The Arabians called Zizarij haue the possession of a great countrey, and cannot be overcome of the Turke, because that the sea hath diuided their countrey into an Island by chauncels with the ebbing and flowing of the sea, and for that cause the Turke cannot bying an army against them, neither by sea nor by land, and another reason is, the inhabitants of that Island are very strong and warlike men. A dayes iourney before you come to Basora, you shall haue a little castle of fort, which is set on that point of the land where the rivers of Euphrates and Tygris meet together, and the castle is called Corna: at this point, the two rivers make a monstrous great river, that runneth into the sea, which is called the gulf of Persia, which is towards the South: Basora is distant from the sea fiftene miles, and it is a city of great trade of spices and drugges which come from Ormus. Also there is great store of corne, Rice, and Dates, which the countrey doth peeld. I shipped my selfe in Basora to go for Ormus, and so we sailed thowow the Persian sea six hundred miles, which is the distance from Basora to Ormus, and we sailed in small ships made of boards, bound together with small cords or ropes, and in stead of calking they lay betweene euery board certaine straw which they haue, and so they sowe board and board together, with the straw betweene, wherethowow there cometh much water, and they are very dangerous. Departing from Basora we passed 200 miles with the sea on our right hand, along the gulf, until at length we arriued at an Island called Carichij, from whence we sailed to Ormus in sight of the Persian shore on the left side, and on the right side towards Arabia we discouered infinite Islands.

At the castle of Corna the river Euphrates and Tygris do meet.

Ormuz is the barrenest Island in all the world.

Ormuz.

Ormuz is an Island in circuit five and twenty or thirty miles, and it is the barrenest and most drie Island in all the world, because that in it there is nothing to be had, but salt water, and wood, all other things necessary for mans life are brought out of Persia twelve miles off, and out of other Islands nere thereunto adioyning, in such abundance and quantity, that the city is alwayes replenished with all maner of store: there is standing nere vnto the waters side a very faire castell, in the which the captaine of the king of Portugall is alwayes resident with a good band of Portugallies, and before this castell is a very faire prospect: in the city dwell the married men, souldiers and marchants of euery nation, amongst whom there are Moores and Gentiles. In this city there is very great trade for all sorts of spices, drugges, like, cloth of like, bycardo, and diuers other sorts of marchandise come out of Persia: and amongst all other trades of merchandise, the trade of Horses is very great there, which they carry from thence into the Indies. This Island hath a Hoore king of the race of the Persians, who is created and made king by the Captaine of the castle, in the name of the king of Portugall. At the creation of this king I was there, and saw the ceremonies that they vse in it, which are as followeth. The olde King being dead, the Captaine of the Portugals chuseth another of the blood royall, and maketh this election in the castle with great ceremonies, and when hee is elected, the Captaine sweareth him to be true and faithfull to the King of Portugall, as his Lord and Gouernour, and then he giueth him the Scepter regall. After this with great feasting & pompe, and with great company, he is brought into the royall palace in the city. This King keepeth a good traine, and hath sufficient reuenues to maintaine himselfe without troubling of any, because the Captaine of the castle doeth mainteine and defend his right, and when that the Captaine and he ride together, he is honoured as a king, yet he cannot ride abroad with his traine, without the consent of the Captaine first had: it behooueth them to doe this, and it is necessary, because of the great trade that is in the city: their proper language is the Persian tongue. There I shipped my selfe to goe for Goa, a city in the Indies; in a shippe that had fourescore horses in her. This is to aduertise these Marchants that goe from Ormuz to Goa to shippe themselves in these shippes that carry horses, because euery shippe that carrieth twenty horses or vpwards is priuileged, that all the marchandise whatsoeuer they carry shall pay no custome, whereas the shippes that carry no horses are bound to pay right per centioo of all the goods they bring.

Goa, Diu, and Cambaia.

Diu.

Cambaia.

Goa is the principall city that the Portugals haue in the Indies, where is resident the Viceroy with his Court and ministers of the King of Portugall. From Ormuz to Goa is nine hundred foure score and ten miles distance, in which passage the first city that you come to in the Indies, is called Diu, and is situate in a little Island in the kingdome of Cambaia, which is the greatest strength that the Portugals haue in all the Indies, yet a small city, but of great trade, because there they lade very many great ships for the straights of Mecca and Ormuz with marchandise, and these shippes belong to the Hoorees and Chyilians, but the Hoorees can net trade neither saile into those seas without the licence of the Viceroy of the king of Portugall, so thatwise they are taken and made good prizes. The marchandise that they lade these ships with, all cometh from Cambaia a port in the kingdome of Cambaia, which they bring from thence in small barks, because there can no great shippes come thither, by reason of the shaltnesse of the water thereabouts, and these sholes are an hundred or fourescore miles about in a straight or gulfe, which they call Macareo, which is as much to say, as a race of a tide, because the waters there run out of that place without measure, so that there is no place like to it, unless it be the kingdome of Pegu, where there is another Macareo, where the waters run out with more force then these doe. The principall city in Cambaia is called Amadaur, it is a rayes iourney and an halfe from Cambaia, it is a very great city and very populous, and for a city of the Gentiles it is very well made and builded with faire houses and large streets, with a faire place in it with many shippes, and in shew like to Cairo, but not so great: also Cambaia is situate on the seas side, and is a very faire city. The time that I was there, the city was in great calamity & scarcity, so that I haue scene the men of the countrey that were Gentiles take their children, their sonnes and their daughters, and haue desired the Portugals to buy them, and I haue scene them solde for eight or ten laines a peece, which may be of our money x.s. or xiii.s. iii. d. For all this, if I had not scene it, I could not haue beleueed that there should be such a trade at Cambaia as there is: for in the time of euery new Hoone and euery full Hoone, the small barks (immune- rable) come in and out, for at those times of the Hoone the tides and waters are higher then at other times they be. These barkes be laden with all sorts of spices, with silke of China, with Sandols, with Elephants teeth, Uelucts of Vercini, great quantity of Pannina, which cometh from Mecca, Chickinos which be pieces of golde woorth seven shillings a peece sterling, with money, and with diuers sorts of other marchandise. Also these barks lade out, as it were, an infinite quantity of cloth made of Bumbast of all sorts, as white stamped and painted, with great quantity of Indico, dyed ginger & conserued, Myrabolans drie and crinite Borafo in paste, great store of sugar, great quantity of Cotton, abundance of Opium, Asa Fetida, Puchio, with many other sorts of dyugges, turbants made in Diu, great stones like to Corncolaes, Granats, Agats, Dialpy, Calcidonij, Hematits, and some kinde of naturall Diemenos. There is in the city of Cambaia an order, but no man is bound to keepe it, but they that will;

but all the Portugall marchants keepe it, the which is this. There are in this city certaine Brokers which are Gentiles and of great authority, and haue euery one of them fifteene or twenty seruants, and the Marchants that vse that countrey haue their Brokers, with which they be serued: and they that haue not bene there are informed by their friends of the order, and of what broker they shall be serued. Now euery fifteene dayes (as abouesayd) that the fleet of small shippes entrench into the port, the Brokers come to the water side, and these Marchants as soone as they are come on land, do giue the cargason of all their goods to that Broker that they will haue to do their businesse for them, with the marks of all the fardles and packs they haue: and the marchant hauing taken on land all his furniture for his house, because it is needfull that the Marchants that trade to the Indies carry provision of household with them, because that in euery place where they come they must haue a new house, the Broker that hath receiued his cargason, comman- deth his seruants to carry the Marchants furniture for his house home, and load it on some cart, and carry it into the city, where the Brokers haue diuers empty houses meet for the lodging of Marchants, furnished onely with bedsteds, tables, chaires, and empty iarses for water: then the Broker sayeth to the Marchant, Goe and repose your selfe, and take your rest in the city. The Broker tarrieth at the water side with the cargason, and causeth all his goods to be discharged out of the ship, and payeth the custome, and causeth it to be brought into the house where the marchant lieth, the Marchant not knowing any thing thereof, neither custome, nor charges. These goods being brought to this place into the house of the Marchant, the Broker demandeth of the Marchant if he haue any desire to sell his goods or merchandise, at the prices that such wares are worth at that present time: And if he hath a desire to sell his goods presently, then at that instant the Broker selleth them away. After this the Broker sayeth to the Marchant, you haue so much of euery sort of merchandise neat and cleare of euery charge, and so much ready money. And if the Marchant will employ his money in other commodities, then the Broker telleth him that such and such commodities will cost so much, put aboord without any maner of charges. The Marchant vnderstanding the effect, maketh his account; and if he thinke to buy or sell at the prices currant, he giueth order to make his merchandise away: and if he hath commodity for 20000 duckets, all shall be barred or solde away in fifteene dayes without any care or trouble: and when as the Marchant thinketh that he cannot sell his goods at the price currant, he may tary as long as he will, but they cannot be solde by any man but by that Broker that hath taken them on land and payed the custome: and perchance tarying sometimes for sale of their commodity, they make good profit, and sometimes losse: but those merchandise that come not ordinarily euery fifteene dayes, in tarying for the sale of them, there is great profit. The barks that lade in Cambaieria go for Diu to lade the ships that go from thence for the streights of Mecca and Ormus, and some go to Chaul and Goa: and these ships be very well appointed, or els are guarded with the Armada of the Portugals, for that there are many Corsaries or Pyrats which goe courting alongst that coast, robbing and spoiling: and for feare of these theenes there is no safe sailing in those seas, but with ships very well appointed and armed, or els with the fleet of the Portugals, as is aforesayd. In fine, the kingdome of Cambaia is a place of great trade, and hath much doings and traffique with all men, although hitherto it hath bene in the hands of tyrants, because that at 75 yeeres of age the true king being at the assault of Diu, was there slaine; whose name Sulkan Baddu. At that time foure or five captaines of the army diuided the kingdome amongst themselves, and euery one of them shewed in his countrey what tyranny he could: but twelue yeeres ago the great Mogol a Hoore king of Agra and Delly, forty dayes iourney within the land of Amadaur, became the gouernour of all the kingdome of Cambaia without any resistance, because he being of great power and force, deniuing which way to enter the land with his people, there was not any man that would make him any resistance, although they were tyrants and a beastly people, they were soone brought vnder obedience. During the time I dwelt in Cambaieria I saw very mar- uellous things: there were an infinite number of artificers that made bracelets called Mannij, or bracelets of elephants teeth, of diuers colours, for the women of the Gentiles, which haue their armes full decked with them. And in this occupation there are spent euery yeere many thou- sands of crownes: the reason whereof is this, that when there dieth any whatsoener of their kin- dred, then in signe and token of mourning and sorrow, they breake all their bracelets from their armes, and presently they go and buy new againe, because that they had rather be without their meat then without their bracelets.

Daman. Basan. Tana.

HAuing passed Diu, I came to the second city that the Portugals haue, called Daman, situ- ate in the territory of Cambaia, distant from Diu an hundred and twenty miles: it is no towne of merchandise, saue Rice and coyne, and hath many villages vnder it, where in time of peace the Portugals take their pleasure, but in time of warre the enemies haue the spoile of them; in such wise that the Portugals haue little benefit by them. Next vnto Daman you shall haue Basan, which is a filthy place in respect of Daman: in this place is Rice, Coyne, and Timber to make shippes and gallies. And a small distance beyond Basan is a little Island called Tana, a place very populous with Portugals, Moores, and Gentiles: these haue nothing but Rice, there are many makers of Armes, and weauers of girdles of wooll and bumbast blacke and redde like to Moorcharies.

Of the cities of Chaul, and of the Palmer tree.

Beyond this Island you shall finde Chaul in the firme land; and they are two cities, one of the Portugals, and the other of the Moores: that city which the Portugals haue is situate lower then the other, and gouerneth the mouth of the harbour, and is very strongly walled: and as it were a mile and an halfe distant from this is the city of Moores; gouerned by their king Zamalluco. In the time of warres there cannot any great ships come to the city of the Moores, because the Portugals with their ordinance will sincke them, for that they must perforce passe by the castles of the Portugals: both the cities are ports of the sea, and are great cities, and haue vnto them great traffique and trade of merchandise, of all sortes of spices, drugges, silke, cloth of silke, Sandols, Marfins, Versins, Porcelane of China, Veluets and Scarlets that come from Portugall, and from Meca: with many other sortes of merchandise. There come euery yeere from Cochins, and from Cananor tenne or fiftene great shippes laden with great Muts cured, and with Sugar made of the selfe same Muts called Giagra: the tree whereon these Muts doe grow is called the Palmer tree: and throughout all the Indies, and especially from this place to Goa, there is great abundance of them, and it is like to the Date tree. In the whole world there is not a tree more profitable and of more goodnesse then this tree is, neither doe men reape so much benefit of any other tree as they do of this, there is not any part of it but serueth for some vse, and none of it is woorthy to be burnt. With the timber of this tree they make shippes without the mixture of any other tree, and with the leaues thereof they make sailes, and with the fruit thereof, which be a kinde of Muts, they make wine, and of the wine they make Sugar and Placetto, which wine they gather in the spring of the yeere: out of the middle of the tree where continually there goeth or runneth out white liquour like vnto water, in that time of the yeere they put a vessell vnder euery tree, and euery euening and morning they take it away full, and then distilling it with fire it maketh a very strong liquour: and then they put it into butts, with a quantity of Zibibbo, white or blacke and in short time it is made a perfect wine. After this they make of the Muts great store of oile: of the tree they make great quantity of boozes and quarters for buildings. Of the barke of this tree they make cables, ropes, and other furniture for shippes, and, as they say, these ropes be better then they that are made of Penne. They make of the bowes, bedsteds, after the Indies fashion, and Scauiches for merchandise. The leaues they cut very small, and weaue them, and so make sailes of them, for all manner of shipping, or els very fine mats. And then the first rinde of the Mut they stampe, and make thereof perfect Ockam to calke shippes, great and small: and of the hard barke thereof they make spoones and other vessels for meat, in such wise that there is no part thereof thowen away or cast to the fire. When these Mats be Greene they are full of an excellent sweet water to drinke: and if a man be thirsty, with the liquour of one of the Mats he may satisfie himselfe: and as this Mut ripeneth, the liquour thereof turneth all to kernell. There goeth out of Chaul for Mallaca, for the Indies, for Macao, for Portugall, for the coasts of Melinde, for Ormus, as it were an infinite number and quantity of goods and merchandise that come out of the kingdome of Cambaia, as cloth of bumbast white, painted, printed, great quantity of Indico, Opium, Cotton, Silke of euery sort, great store of Borafo in Paste, great store of Ferida, great store of yron, coyne, and other merchandise. The Moore king Zamalluco is of great power, as one that at need may command, & hath in his camp, two hundred thousand men of warre, and hath great store of artillery, some of them made in pieces, which for their greatnesse can not be carried to and fro: yet although they be made in pieces, they are so commodious that they worke with them marvellous well, whose shotte is of stone, and there hath bene of that shot sent vnto the king of Portugall for the rarenes of the thing. The city where the king Zamalluco hath his being, is within the land of Chaul seven or eight dayes iourney, which city is called Abneger. Thre score and tenne miles from Chaul, towards the Indies, is the port of Dabul, an haue of the king Zamalluco: from thence to Goa is an hundred and fifty miles.

Goa.

GOa is the principall city that the Portugals haue in the Indies, wherein the Viceroy with his royall Court is resioent, and is in an Island which may be in circuit fise and twenty or thirtymiles: and the city with the boroughs is reasonable bigge, and for a citie of the Indies it is reasonable faire, but the Island is farre more fairer: for it is as it were full of goodly gardens, replenished with diuers trees and with the Palmer trees as is aforesayd. This city is of great traffique for all sorts of marchandise which they trade withall in those parts: and the fleet which commeth euery yeere from Portugall, which are fise or sixe great shippes that come directly for Goa, arrive there ordinarily the sixth or tenth of September, and there they remaine forty or fifty dayes, and from thence they goe to Cochín, where they lade for Portugall, and often times they lade one shippe at Goa and the other at Cochín for Portugall. Cochín is distant from Goa three hundred miles. The city of Goa is situate in the kingdome of Dialcan a king of the Moories, whose chiefe city is vy in the countrey eight dayes iourney, and is called Bisapor: this king is of great power, for when I was in Goa in the yeere of our Lord 1570, this king came to giue assault to Goa, being encamped nere unto it by a riuer side with an army of two hundred thousand men of warre, and he lay at this siege foureteene moneths: in which time there was peace concluded, and as report went amongst his people, there was great calamity and mortallity which bzed amongst them in the time of Winter, and also killed very many elephants. Then in the yeere of our Lord 1567, I went from Goa to Bezeneger the chiefe city of the kingdome of Narsinga eight dayes iourney from Goa, within the land, in the company of two other merchants which carried with them three hundred Arabian hozles to that king: because the hozles of that countrey are of a small stature, and they pay well for the Arabian hozles: and it is requisite that the merchants sell them well, for that they stand them in great charges to bring them out of Persia to Ormus, and from Ormus to Goa, where the ship that bringeth twenty hozles and upwards payeth no custome, neither ship nor goods whatsoever; whereas if they bring no hozles, they pay 8 per cento of all their goods: and at the going out of Goa the hozles pay custome, two and forty pagodios for euery hozle, which pagody may be of sterling money sixe shillings eight pence, they be pieces of golde of that value. So that the Arabian hozles are of great value in those countreys, as 300, 400, 500 duckets a hozle, and to 1000 duckets a hozle.

The chiefe place the Portugals haue in the Indies.

Bezeneger.

The city of Bezeneger was sacked in the yeere 1565, by foure kings of the Moories, which were of great power and might: the names of these foure kings were these following, the first was called Dialcan, the second Zamaluc, the third Coramaluc, and the fourth Viridy: and yet these foure kings were not able to ouercome this city and the king of Bezeneger, but by treafon. This king of Bezeneger was a Gentile, and had, amongst all other of his captaines, two which were notable, and they were Moories: and these two captaines had either of them in charge theescore and ten or fourescore thousand men. These two captaines being of one religion with the foure kings which were Moories, wrought meanes with them to betray their owne king into their hands. The king of Bezeneger esteemed not the force of the foure kings his enemies, but went out of his city to wage battell with them in the fieldes; and when the armies were ioyned, the battell lasted but a while not the space of foure houres, because the two traitourous captaines, in the chiefest of the fight, with their compaines turned their faces against their king, and made such disorder in his army, that as astonied they set themselves to flight. Thirty yeeres was this kingdome gouerned by three bzethzen which were tyzants, the which keeping the rightfull king in prison, it was their vse euery yeere once to shew him to the people, and they at their pleasures ruled as they listed. These bzethzen were three captaines belonging to the father of the king they kept in prison, which when he died, left his sonne very yong, and then they tooke the gouernment to themselves. The chiefest of these three was called Ramaragio, and sat in the royall throne, and was called the king: the second was called Temiragio, and he tooke the gouernment on him: the third was called Bengaire, and he was captaine generall of the army. These three bzethzen were in this battell, in the which the chiefest and the last were neuer heard of quicke nor dead. Onely Temiragio fled in the battell, hauing lost one of his eyes: when the newes came to the city of the ouerthrow in the battell, the wiues and childzen of these three tyzants, with their lawfull king (kept prisoner) fled away, spoiled as they were, & the foure kings of the Moories entered the city Bezeneger with great triumph, & there they remained sixe moneths, searching vnder houses & in all places for money & other things that were hidden, and then they departed to their owne kingdomes, because they were not able to maintaine such a kingdome as that was, so farre distant from their owne countrey.

When the kings were departed from Bezeneger, this Temiragio returned to the city, and then beganne for to repopulate it, and sent word to Goa to the Merchants, if they had any horses, to bring them to him, and he would pay well for them, and for this cause the aforesayd two Merchants that I went in company withall, carried those horses that they had to Bezeneger. Also this Tyrant made an order of lawe, that if any Merchant had any of the horses that were taken in the aforesayd battell or warres, although they were of his owne marke, that he would giue as much for them as they would: and beside he gaue generall safe conduct to all that should bring them. When by this meanes he saw that there were great store of horses brought thither vnto him, hee gaue the Merchants faire wordes, vntill such time as he saw they could bring no more. Then he licenced the Merchants to depart, without giuing them any thing for their horses, which when the poore men saw, they were desperate, and as it were mad with sorrow and griefe.

I rested in Bezeneger seuen moneths, although in one moneth I might haue discharged all my businesse, for it was necessary to rest there vntill the wapes were cleere of theeues, which at that time ranged vp and downe. And in the time I rested there, I saw many strange and beastly deeds done by the Gentiles. First, when there is any Noble man or woman dead, they burne their bodies: and if a married man die, his wife must burne herselfe aloue, for the loue of her husband, and with the body of her husband: so that when any man dieth, his wife will take a moneths leaue, two or three, or as shee will, to burne her selfe in, and that day being come, wherein shee ought to be burnt, that morning shee goeth out of her house very carely, either on horsebacke or on an elephant, or else is borne by eight men on a smal stage: in one of these orders she goeth, being apparellled like to a Bride, carried round about the City, with her haire downe about her shoulders, garnished with iewels and flowers, according to the estate of the party, and they goe with as great ioy as Brides doe in Venice to their nuprials: shee carrieth in her left hand a looking glasse, and in her right hand an arrow, and singeth thowow the City as she passeth, and sayth, that she goeth to sleepe with her deere spouse and husband. She is accompanied with her kindred and friends vntill it be one or two of the clocke in the afternoone, then they goe out of the City, and going along the riuer side called Nigondin, which runneth vnder the walles of the City, vntill they come vnto a place where they vse to make this burning of women, being widowes, there is prepared in this place a great square caue, with a little pinnacle hard by it, foure or fise steppes vp: the aforesayd caue is full of dried wood. The woman being come thither, accompanied with a great number of people which come to see the thing, then they make ready a great banquet, and she that shall be burned eateth with as great ioy and gladnesse, as though it were her wedding day: and the feast being ended, then they goe to dancing and singing a certein time, according as she will. After this, the woman of her owne accord, commandeth them to make the fire in the square caue where the drie wood is, and when it is kindled, they come and certifie her thereof, then presently she leaueth the feast, and taketh the neerest kinsman of her husband by the hand, and they both goe together to the banke of the aforesayd riuer, where she putteth off all her iewels and all her clothes, and giueth them to her parentes or kinsfolke, and couering herselfe with a cloth, because she will not be seene of the people being naked, she throweth herselfe into the riuer, saying: O wretches, wash away your sinnes. Comming out of the water, she rowleth herselfe into a yellow cloth of foureteene braces long: and againe she taketh her husbands kinsman by the hand, and they go both together vp to the pinnacle of the square caue wherein the fire is made. When she is on the pinnacle, shee talketh and reasoneth with the people, recommending vnto them her children and kindred. Before the pinnacle they vse to set a mat, because they shall not see the fiercenesse of the fire, yet there are many that will haue them plucked away, shewing therein an heart not fearefull, and that they are not affrayd of that sight. When this silly woman hath reasoned with the people a good while to her content, there is another woman that taketh a pot with oile, and syzinklieth it ouer her head, and with the same she anoynteth all her body, and afterwards throweth the pot into the fornace, and both the woman and the pot goe together into the fire, and presently the people that are round about the fornace throw after her into the caue great pieces of wood, so by this meanes, with the fire and with the blowes that she hath with the wood thowen after her, she is quickly dead, and after this there groweth such sorrow and such lamentation among the people, that all their mirth is turned into howling and weeping, in such wise, that a man could scarce beare the hearing of it. I haue seene many burnt in this maner, because my house was neere to the gate where they goe out to the place of burning: and when there dieth any great man, his wife with all his slaues with whom hee hath had carnall copulation, burne themselves together with him. Also in this kingdome I haue seene amongst the base sort of people this vse and order, that the man being dead, hee is carried to the place where they will make his sepulchre, and setting him as it were upright, then commeth his wife before him on her knees, calling her armes about his necke, with embracing and clasping him, vntill such time as the Palsons haue made a wall round about them, and when the wall is as high as their neckes, there commeth a man behinde the woman and stranglet her: then when she is dead, the workemen finish the wall ouer their heads, and so they lie buried both together. Besides these, there are an infinite number of beastly qualities amongst them, of which I haue no desire to write, I was desirous to know the cause why these women would so wilfully burne themselves against nature and law, and it was tolde mee that this law was of an ancient time, to make prouision against the slaughters which women made of their husbands. For in those dayes before this law was made, the women for euery little displeasure that their husbands had done vnto them, would presently poison their husbands, and take other men, and now by reason of this law they are more faithfull vnto their husbands, and count their liues as deare as their owne, because that after his death her owne followeth presently.

The cause why the women do so burne themselves.

In the yeere of our Lord God 1567, for the ill successe that the people of Bezeneger had, in that their City was sacked by the foure kings, the king with his Court went to dwell in a castle eight dayes journey by in the land from Bezeneger, called Penegonde. Also five dayes journey from Bezeneger, is the place where they get Diamants: I was not there, but it was tolde me that it is a great place, compassed with a wall, and that they sell the earth within the wall, for so much a Squadron, and the limits are set how deepe or how low they shall digge. Those Diamants that are of a certaine size and bigger then that size are all for the king, it is many yeeres agone, since they got any there, for the troubles that haue bene in that kingdome. The first cause of this trouble was, because the sonne of this Temeragio had put to death the lawfull king which he had in prison, for which cause the Barons and Noblemen in that kingdome would not acknowledge him to be their King, and by this meanes there are many kings, and great diuision in that kingdome, and the city of Bezeneger is not altogether destroyed, yet the houses stand still, but empty, and there is dwelling in them nothing, as is reported, but Tygers and other wilde beasts. The circuit of this city is foure & twentie miles about, and within the walles are certaine mountaines. The houses stand walled with earth, and plaine, all sauing the three palaces of the three tyrant brethren, and the Pagodes which are idole houses: these are made with lime and fine marble. I haue seene many kings Courts, and yet haue I seene none in greatnesse like to this of Bezeneger, I say, for the order of his palace, for it hath nine gates or ports. First when you goe into the place where the king did lodge, there are five great ports or gates: these are kept with Captaines and souldiers: then within these there are four lesser gates, which are kept with Porters. Without the first gate there is a little porch, where there is a Captaine with five and twenty souldiers, that keepeth watch and ward night and day: and within that another with the like guard, wherethrough they come to a very faire Court, and at the end of that Court there is another porch as the first, with the like guard, and within that another Court. And in this wise are the first five gates guarded and kept with those Captaines: and then the lesser gates within are kept with a guard of Porters: which gates stand open the greatest part of the night, because the custome of the Gentiles is to doe their businesse, and make their feasts in the night, rather then by day. The city is very safe from cheeues, for the Portugall merchants sleepe in the streets, or vnder porches, for the great heat which is there, and yet they neuer had any harme in the night. At the end of two moneths, I determined to go for Goa in the company of two other Portugall Marchants, which were making ready to depart, with two palanchines or little litters; which are very commodious for the way, with eight f alchines which are men hired to carry the palanchines, eight for a palanchine, foure at a time: they carry them as we vse to carry barrowes. And I bought me two bullocks, one of them to ride on, and the other to carry my victuals and prouision, for in that countrey they ride on bullocks with pannels, as we terme them, gires and bydles, and they haue a very good commodious pace. From Bezeneger to Goa in Summer it is eight dayes journey, but we went in the midst of Winter, in the month of Iuly, and were fifteene dayes comming to Ancola on the sea coast, so in eight dayes I had lost my two bullocks: for he that carried my victuals, was weake and could not goe, the other when I came vnto a riuer where was a little bridge to passe ouer, I put my bullocke to swimming, and in the midst of the riuer there was a little Island, vnto the which my bullocke went, and finding pasture, there he remained still, and in no wise we could come to him: and so perforce, I was forced to leaue him, and at that time there was much raine, and I was forced to go seuen dayes

a foot with great paines : and by great chance I met with Falchines by the way, whom I hired to carry my clothes and victuals. We had great trouble in our iourney, for that euery day wee were taken prisoners, by reason of the great dissension in that kingdome : and euery morning at our departure we must pay rescate foure or fure pagies a man. And another trouble wee had as bad as this, that when as wee came into a new gouernours countrey, as euery day we did, although they were all tributary to the king of Bezeneger, yet euery one of them stamped a feuerall coine of Copper, so that the money that we tooke this day would not serue the next : at length, by the helpe of God, we came safe to Ancola, which is a countrey of the queene of Gargopam, tributary to the king of Bezeneger. The marchandise that went euery yere from Goa to Bezeneger were Arabian Hoyles, Cleuets, Damafks, and Sattens, Armeine of Portugall, and pieces of China, Saffron, and Skarlets : and from Bezeneger they had in Turky for their commodities, Iewels, and Pagodies which be ducats of golde : the apparell that they vse in Bezeneger is Cleuet, Satten, Damafke, Scarlet, or white Bumbast cloth, according to the estate of the person with long hats on their heads, called Colae, made of Cleuet, Satten, Damafke, or Scarlet, girding themselves in stead of girdles with some fine white bombast cloth : they haue breeches after the order of the Turks : they weare on their feet plaine high things called of them Aspergh, and at their eares they haue hanging great plenty of golde.

The marchandise that come in and out to Bezeneger euery yere.

The apparell of those people.

Their Winter is our Summer.

Returning to my voyage, when we were together in Ancola, one of my companions that had nothing to lose, tooke a guide, and went to Goa, whither they goe in foure dayes, the other Portugall not being disposed to go, tarried in Ancola for that Winter. The Winter in those parts of the Indies beginneth the fifteenth of May, and lasteth vnto the end of October : and as we were in Ancola, there came another Marchant of hoyles in a palanchine, and two Portugall souldiers which came from Zeilan, and two carriers of letters, which were Christians bozne in the Indies : all these consorted to goe to Goa together, and I determined to goe with them, and caused a palanchine to be made for me very poorly of Canes ; and in one of them Canes I hid priuily all the Iewels I had, and according to the order, I tooke eight Falchines to carry me : and one day about eleuen of the clocke wee set forward on our iourney, and about two of the clocke in the afternoon, as we passed a mountaine which diuideth the territozy of Ancola and Dialcan, I being a little behinde my company, was assaulted by eight theeuers, foure of them had swordes and targets, and the other foure had bowes and arrowes. When the Falchines that carried me understood the noise of the assault, they let the palanchine and me fall to the ground, and ranne away and left me alone, with my clothes wrappd about me : presently the theeuers were on my necke, and rifeling me, they stripped me stark naked, and I staid my selfe sicke, because I would not leaue the palanchine, and I had made me a little bedde of my clothes ; the theeuers sought it very narrowly and subtilly, and found two purses that I had, well bound vp together, wherein I had put my Copper money which I had changed for foure pagodies in Ancola. The theeuers thinking it had bene so many ducats of golde, searched no further : then they threw all my clothes in a bush, and hied them away, and as God would haue it, at their departure there fell from them an handkercher, and when I saw it, I rose from my palanchine or couch, and tooke it by, and wrappd it together within my palanchine. Then these my Falchines were of so good condition, that they returned to seeke mee, whereas I thought I should not haue found so much goodness in them : because they were payed their money aforehand, as is the vse, I had thought to haue seene them no moze. Before their coming I was determined to plucke the Cane wherein my Iewels were hidden, out of my couch, and to haue made me a walking staffe to carry in my hand to Goa, thinking that I should haue gone thither on foot, but by the faithfulness of my Falchines, I was rid of that trouble, and so in foure dayes they carried me to Goa, in which time I made hard fare, for the theeuers left me neither money, golde, nor silver, and that which I did eat was giuen me of my men for Gods sake : and after at my coming to Goa I payed them for euery thing royally that I had of them. From Goa I departed for Cochin, which is a voyage of three hundred miles, and betweene these two cities are many holdes of the Portugals, as Onor, Mangalor, Barzelor, and Cananor. The Holbe or Fort that you shall haue from Goa to Cochin that belongeth to the Portugals, is called Onor, which is in the kingdome of the queene of Baracella, which is tributary to the king of Bezeneger : there is no trade there, but onely a charge with the Captaine and company he keepeth there. And passing this place, you shall come to another small castile of the Portugals called Mangalor, and there is very small trade but onely for a little Rice : and from thence you goe to a little fort called Barzelor, there they haue good store of Rice which is carried to Goa : and from thence you shall goe to a city called Cananor, which is a harquebus shot distant from the chiefest city that the king of Cananor hath in his kingdome being a king of the Gentiles : and he & his are very naughty & malicious people, alwayes hauing delight to

to be in warres with the Portugales, and when they are in peace, it is for their interest to let their merchandize passe: there goeth out of this kinzdome of Cananor, all the Cardamomū, great store of Pepper, Ginger, Pomie, ships laden with great Nuts, great quantitie of Archa, which is a fruit of the bignesse of Nutmegs, which fruite they eate in all those partes of the Indies and beyond the Indies, with the leafe of an Herbe which they call Betrell, the which is like unto our Quie leafe, but a litle lesser and thinner: they eate it made in plaisters with the lime made of Distherchis, and thozow the Indies they spend great quantitie of money in this composition, and it is vsed daily, which thing I would not haue beleueed, if I had not scene it. The customers get great profite by these Herbes, for that they haue custome for them. When this people eate and chaw this in their mouthes, it maketh their spittle to bee red like vnto blood, and they say, that it maketh a man to haue a very good stomacke and a sweete breath, but sure in my iudgement they eate it rather to fulfill their filthy lusses, and of a knaucie, for this Herbe is most and hote, & maketh a very strong expulsion. From Cananor you go to Cranganor, which is another small fort of the Portugales in the land of the king of Cranganor, which is another king of the Gentiles, and a countrey of small importance, and of an hundred and twentie miles, full of thienes, being vnder the king of Calicut, a king also of the Gentiles, and a great enemy to the Portugales, which when hee is alwayes in warres, hee and his countrey is the nest and resting for stranger thecues, and those hee called Moores of Carposā, because they weare on their heads long red hats, and these thienes part the spoyles that they take on the Sea with the king of Calicut, for hee giueth leaue vnto all that will goe a roving, liberally to goe, in such wise, that all along that coast there is such a number of thienes, that there is no sailing in those Seas but with great ships and very well armed, or els they must go in company with the army of the Portugals. From Cranganor to Cochin is 15. miles.

Betrell is a very profitable herbe in that countrey.

Enemies to the king of Portugall.

Cochin.

Cochin is next vnto Goa, the chiefest place that the Portugales haue in the Indies, and there is great trade of Spices, drugges, and all other sortes of merchandize for the kingdome of Portugale, and there within the land is the kingdome of Pepper, which Pepper the Portugales take in their shippes by bulke, and not in sakes: the Pepper that goeth for Portugale is not so good as that which goeth for Mecca, because that in times past the officers of the king of Portugale made a contract with the king of Cochin, in the name of the king of Portugale, for the prizes of Pepper, and by reason of that agreement betweene them at that time made, the price can neither rise nor fall, which is a very lowe and base price, and for this cause the vntainnes bring it to the Portugales, greene and full of filthe. The Moores of Mecca that giue a better price, haue it cleane and drie, and better conditioned. All the Spices and drugs that are brought to Mecca, are stolen from thence as Contrabanda. Cochin is two cities, one of the Portugales, and another of the king of Cochin: that of the Portugales is situate nearest vnto the Sea, and that of the king of Cochin is a mile and a halfe by higher in the land, but they are both set on the bankes of one riuer which is very great and of a good depth of water, which riuer commeth out of the mountaines of the king of the Pepper, which is a king of the Gentiles, in whose kingdome are many Christians of saint Thomas order: the king of Cochin is also a king of the Gentiles and a great faithfull friend to the king of Portugale, and to those Portugales which are married, and are Citizens in the Citie Cochin of the Portugales. And by this name of Portugales throughout all the Indies, they call all the Christians that come out of the West, whether they bee Italians, Frenchmen, or Almaines, and all they that marrie in Cochin do get an office according to the trade he is of: this they haue by the great priuileges which the Citizens haue of that city, because there are two principal commodities that they deale withal in that place, which are these. The great store of Silke that commeth from China, and the great store of Sugar which commeth from Bengala: the married Citizens pay not any custome for these two commodities: for all other commodities they pay 4. per cento custome to the king of Cochin, rating their goods at their owne pleasure. Those which are not married and strangers, pay in Cochin to the king of Portugale eight per cento of all maner of merchandise. I was in Cochin when the Viceroy of the king of Portugale wrought what hee could to breake the priuilege of the Citizens, and to make them to pay custome as other did: at which time the Citizens were glad to waigh their Pepper in the night that they laded the ships withall that went to Portugale and stole the custome in the night. The king of Cochin hauing vnderstanding of this, would not suffer any more Pepper to bee weighed. Then presently after this, the marchants were licensed to doe as they did before, and there was no more speech of this.

Within Cochin is the kingdome of Pepper.

The Pepper that the Portugals bring, is not so good as that which goeth for Mecca, which is brought hither by y^e streights.

Great priuileges that the citizens of Cochin haue.

this matter, nor any wrong done. This king of Cochin is of a small power in respect of the other kings of the Indies, for hee can make but seuentie thousand men of armes in his campe: hee hath a great number of Gentlemen which hee calleth Amochi, and some are called Nairi: these two sorts of men esteeme not their liues any thing, so that it may be for the honour of their king, they will thrust themselves forward in euery danger, although they know they shall die. These men goe naked from the girdle vppwardes, with a clothe rolled about their thighs, going barefooted, and hauing their haire very long and rolled vp together on the toppe of their heads, and alwayes they carrie their Bucklers or Targets with them and their swordes naked, these Nairi haue their wines common amongst themselves, and when any of them goe into the house of any of these women, hee leaueh his sword and target at the doore, and the time that hee is there, there dare not any bee so hardie as to come into that house. The kings children shall not inherite the kingdome after their father, because they hold this opinion, that perchance they were not begotten of the king their father, but of some other man, therefore they accept for their king one of the sonnes of the kings sisters, or of some other woman of the blood roial, for that they be sure they are of the blood roiall.

It very strange thing hardly to be beleueed.

The Nairi and their wines vse for a brauerie to make great holes in their eares, and so bigge and wide, that it is incredible, holding this opinion, that the greater the holes bee, the more noble they esteeme themselves. I had leaue of one of them to measure the circumference of one of them with a theed, and within that circumference I put my arme vp to the shoulder, cloathed as it was, so that in effect they are monstrous great. Thus they doe make them when they be litle, for then they open the eare, & hang a piece of gold or lead thereat, & within the opening, in the hole they put a certaine leafe that they haue for that purpose, which maketh the hole so great. They lade ships in Cochin for Portugale and for Ormus, but they that goe for Ormus carrie no Pepper but by Contrabanda, as for Sinamome they easilie get leaue to carrie that away, for all other Spices and drugs they may liberally carrie them to Ormus or Cambaia, and so all other merchandize which come from other places, but out of the kingdom of Cochin properly they carpy away with them into Portugale great abundance of Pepper, great quantitie of Ginger dried and conserued, wild Sinamom, good quantitie of Arecca, great store of Cordage of Cairo, made of the bark of the tree of the great Nut, and better then that of Dempe, of which they carrie great store into Portugale.

parting of the ships from Cochin.

The shippes euery yeere depart from Cochin to goe for Portugall, on the fift day of December, or the fift day of January. Nowe to follow my voyage for the Indies: from Cochin I went to Coulam, distant from Cochin seuentie and two miles, which Coulam is a small Fort of the king of Portugales, situate in the kingdom of Coulam, which is a king of the Gentiles, and of small trade: at that place they lade onely halfe a ship of Pepper, and then they goeth to Cochin to take in the rest, and from thence to Cao Comori is seuentie and two miles, and there endeth the coast of the Indies: and alongst this coast, neere to the water side, and also to Cao Comori, downe to the lowe land of Chilao, which is about two hundred miles, the people there are as it were all turned to the Christian faith: there are also Churches of the Friers of S. Pauls order, which Friers doe very much good in those places in turning the people, and in conuerting them, and take great paines in instructing them in the law of Christ.

The fishing for Pearles.

The order
how they fish for pearles.

The Sea that lieth betweene the coast which descendeth from Cao Comori, to the lowe land of Chilao; and the Island Zeilan, they call the fishing of Pearles, which fishing they make euery yeere, beginning in March or Aprill, and it lasteth fiftie dayes, but they doe not fishe euery yeere in one place, but one yeere in one place, and another yeere in another place of the same sea. When the time of this fishing draweth neere, then they send very good Diuers, that goe to discouer where the greatest heapes of Shiflers bee vnder water, and right against that place where greatest store of Shiflers bee, there they make or plant a village with houses and a Bazar, all of stone, which standeth as long as the fishing time lasteth, and it is furnished with all things necessarie, and nowe and then it is neere vnto places that are inhabited, and other times farre off, according to the place where they fishe. The Fishermen are all Christians of the countrey, and who so will may goe to fishing, paying a certaine dutie to the king of Portugall, and to the Churches of the Friers of Saint Paule, which are in that coast. All the while that they are fishing, there are three or foure Fustes armed to defend the Fishermen from Routers. It was my chance to bee there one time in my passage, and I saw the order that that they used in fishing, which is this. There are three or foure Barkes that make consort together, which are like to our little Pilot boates, and a little lesse, there goe scuen or eight men in a boate: and I haue scene in a morning a great number of them goe out, and anker in fifteene or eightene fadome of water, which is the Ordinarie depth of all that coast. When they are at anker, they cast a rope into the Sea, and at the ende of the rope, they make fast a great stone, and then there is ready a man that hath his nose and his eares well stopper, and annointed with oyle, and a basket about his necke, or vnder his left arme, then hee goeth downe by the rope to the bottome of the Sea, and as fast as he can hee filleth the basket, and when it is full, he shaketh the rope, and his fellowes that are in the Barke hale him up with the basket: and in such wise they goe one by one untill they haue laden their barke with oysters, and at euening they come to the village, and then euery company maketh their mountaine or heape of oysters one distant from another, in such wise that you shall see a great long rowe of mountaines or heapes of oysters, and they are not touched untill such time as the fishing bee ended, and at the ende of the fishing euery companie sitteth round about their mountaine or heape of oysters, and fall to opening of them, which they may easilie doe because they bee dead, drie and brittle: and if euery oyster had pearles in them, it would bee a very good purchase, but there are very many that haue no pearles in them: when the fishing is ended, then they see whether it bee a good gathering or a badde: there are certaine expert in the pearles whom they call Chimni, which set and make the price of pearles according to their caracts, beautie, and goodnesse, making foure sortes of them. The first sort bee the round pearles, and they be called Aia of Portugale, because the Portugales doe buy them. The second sorte which are not round, are called Aia of Bengala. The third sort which are not so good as the second, they call Aia of Canara, that is to say, the kingdom of Bezeneger. The fourth and last sort, which are the least and worst sort, are called Aia of Cambaia. Thus the price being set, there are merchants of euery countrey which are ready with their money in their handes, so that in a fewe dayes all is bought up at the prices set according to the goodnesse and caracts of the pearles.

These pearles are valued according to the caracts which they weigh. Every caract is 4. grames, and these men that price the haue an instrument of copper with holes in it, which be made by degrees for 10. sort of pearles withall.

In this Sea of the fishing of pearles is an Island called Manar, which is inhabited by Christians of the countrey which first were Gentiles, and haue a small hold of the Portugales being situate ouer agaynst Zeilan: and betweene these two Islands there is a chanell, but not very big, and hath but a small depth therein: by reason whereof there cannot any great shippe passe that way, but small ships, and with the increase of the water which is at the change or the full of the Moone, and yet for all this they must unlade them and put their goods into small vessels to lighten them before they can passe that way for feare of Sholdes that lie in the chanell, and after lade them into their shippes to goe for the Indies, and this doe all small shippes that passe that way, but those shippes that goe for the Indies Eastwardes, passe by the coast of Coromandel, on the other side by the land of Chilao which is betweene the firme land and the Island Manar: and going from the Indies to the coast of Coromandel, they loose some shippes, but they bee empty, because that the shippes that passe that way discharge their goods at an Island called Periparane, and there land their goods into small flat bottomed boates which drawe litle water, and are called Tane, and can run ouer euery Shold without either danger or losse of any thing, for that they carrie in Periparane untill such time as it bee faire weather. Before they depart to passe the Sholdes, the small shippes and flat bottomed boates goe together in companie, and when they haue sailed fife and thirtie miles, they arrive at the place where the Sholdes are, and at that place the windes blowe so forcible, that they are forced to goe thorow, not hauing any other refuge to saue themselves. The flat bottomed boates goe safe thorow, where as the small shippes if they misse the aforesayd chanell, sticke fast on the Sholdes, and by this meanes many are lost: and coming backe from the Indies, they goe not that way, but passe by the chanell of Manar as is abouesayd, whose chanell is Dazie, and if the shippes sticke fast, it is great chance if there be any danger at all. The reason why this chanell is not moze sure to goe thither, is, because the windes that raigne or blowe betweene Zeilan and Manar, make the chanell so shallow with water, that almost there is not any passage. From Cao Comori to the Island of Zeilan is 120. miles ouerthwart.

Zeilan.

Zeilan is an Island, in my iudgement, a great deale bigger then Cyprus: on that side towards the Indies lying Westward is the citie called Columba, which is a hold of the Portugales, but without walles or ennies. It hath towards the Sea a free port, the lawfull king of of that Island is in Columbo, and is turned Christian and maintained by the king of Portugal, being deprived of his kingdom. The king of the Gentiles, to whom this kingdom did belong, was called Madoni, which had two sonnes, the first named Barbinas the prince; and the second Ragine. This king by the policie of his younger sonne, was deprived of his kingdom, who because hee had entised and done that which pleased the armie and souldiours, in despight of his father and brother being prince, usurped the kingdom, and became a great warrior. First, this Island had three kings; the king of Cotta with his conquered prisoners: the king of Candia, which is a part of that Island, and is so called by the name of Candia, which had a reasonable power, and was a great friend to the Portugals, which sayd that hee liued secretly a Christian; the third was the king of Gianisampatan. In thirtie yeeres that this Ragine gouerned this Island, he became a great tyrant.

Cairo is a stuffe that they make ropes with, the which is the barke of a tree.

The cutting & gathering of Sinamom.

In this Island there groweth fine Sinamom, great store of Pepper, great store of Nuttes and Arochoe: there they make great store of Cairo to make Cordage: it bringeth forth great store of Christall Cats eyes, or Ochi de Gari, and they say that they finde there some Rubies, but I haue sold Rubies well there that I brought with me from Pegu. I was desirous to see how they gather the Sinamom, or take it from the tree that it groweth on, and so much the rather, because the time that I was there, was the season which they gather it in, which was in the moneth of Aprill, at which time the Portugals were in armes, and in the field, with the king of the countrey; yet I to satisfie my desire, although in great danger, tooke a guide with mee and went into a wood three miles from the Citie, in which wood was great store of Sinamome trees growing together among other wilde trees; and this Sinamome tree is a small tree, and not very high, and hath leaues like to our Baie tree. In the moneth of March or Aprill, when the sappe goeth vp to the toppe of the tree, then they take the Sinamom from that tree in this wise. They cut the barke of the tree round about in length from knot to knot, or from ioint to ioint, aboue and belowe, and then casie with their handes they take it away, laying it in the Sunne to drie, and in this wise it is gathered, and yet for all this the tree dieth not, but agaynst the next yeere it will haue a new barke, and that which is gathered euery yeere is the best Sinamome: for that which groweth two or three yeeres is great, and not so good as the other is; and in these woods groweth much Pepper.

Negapatan.

From the Island of Zeilan men vse to goe with small Shippes to Negapatan, within the firme land, and seuentie two miles off is a very great Citie, and very populous of Portugals and Christians of the countrey, and part Gentiles: it is a countrey of small trade, neither haue they any trade there, saue a good quantitie of Rice, and cloth of Bumbast which they carie into diuers partes: it was a very plentifull countrey of victuals, but now it hath a great deale lesse; and that abundance of victuals caused many Portugales to goe thither and build houses, and dwell there with small charge.

This Citie belongeth to a noble man of the kingdom of Bezeneger being a Gentile, neuertheless the Portugales and other Christians are well intreated there, and haue their Churches there with a monasterie of Saint Francis order, with great deuotion and very well accommodated, with houses round about: yet for all this, they are amongst tyrants, which alwayes at their pleasure may doe them some harme, as it happned in the yeere of our Lord God one thousand five hundred, fiftie and five: for I remember very well, how that the Nayer, that is to say, the lord of the citie, sent to the citizens to demaund of them certaine Arabian horses, and they hauing denied them vnto him, and gainesayd his demaund, it came to passe that this lord had a desire to see the Sea, which when the poore citizens vnderstood, they doubted some euill, to heare a thing which was not wont to bee, they thought that this man would come to sacke the Citie, and presently they embarked themselves the best they could with their moouables, merchandize, iewels, money, and all that they had, and caused the shippes to put from the shore. When this was done, as their euill chance would haue it, the next night following, there came such a great storme that it put all the shippes on land perforce, and brake them to peeces, and all the goods that came on land and were saued, were taken from them by the souldiours and armie of this lord which came downe with him to see the Sea, and were attendant at the Sea side, not thinking that any such thing would haue happened.

Saint Thomas or San Tome.

From Negapatan following my voyage towards the East an hundred and fiftie miles, I found the house of blessed Saint Thomas, which is a Church of great deuotion, and greatly regarded of the Gentiles for the great miracles they haue heard to haue bene done by that blessed Apostle: neere vnto this Church the Portugals haue builded them a Citie in the countrey subiect to the king of Bezeneger, which citie although it bee not very great, yet in my iudgement it is the fairest in all that part of the Indies: and it hath very faire houses and faire gardens in vacant places very well accommodated: it hath streetes large and streight, with many Churches of great deuotion, their houses be set close one vnto another, with little doozes, euery house hath his defence, so that by that meanes it is of force sufficient to defend y Portugals against the people of that countrey. The Portugals there haue no other possession but their gardens and houses that are within the citie: the customes belong to the king of Bezeneger, which are very small and easie, for that it is a countrey of great riches and great trade: there come euery yeere two or three great ships very rich, besides many other small ships: one of the two great ships goeth for Pegu, and the other for Malacca, laden with fine Bumbast cloth of euery sort, painted, which is a rare thing, because those kinde of clothes shew as they were gilded with diuers colours, and the more they be washed, the liuelier the colours will shew. Also there is other cloth of Bumbast which is wouen with diuers colours, and is of great value: also they make in Sane Tome great stoe of red Warne, which they die with a roote called Saia, and this colour will neuer waste, but the more it is washed, the more redder it will shew: they lade this yarne the greatest part of it for Pegu, because that there they worke and weaue it to make cloth according to their owne fashion, and with lesser charges. It is a maruelous thing to them which haue not seene the lading and unlading of men and merchandize in S. Tome as they do: it is a place so dangerous, that a man cannot bee serued with small barkes, neither can they doe their businesse with the boates of the shippes, because they would be beaten in a thousand pierces, but they make certaine barkes (of purpose) high, which they call Maladie, they be made of litle boards; one board being so wed to another with small cordes, and in this order are they made. And when they are thus made, and the owners will imbarke any thing in them, either men or goods, they lade them on land, and when they are laden, the Barke-men thrust the boate with her lading into the streame, and with great speed they make haste all that they are able to rowe out against the huge waues of the sea that are on that shore, vntill that they carie them to the ships: and in like maner they lade these Maladies at the shippes with merchandise and men. When they come neere the shore, the Barke-men leape out of the Barke into the Sea to keepe the Barke right that she cast not thwart the shore, and being kept right, the Suffe of the Sea setteth her lading dyp on land without any hurt or danger, and sometimes there are some of them that are ouerthrowen, but there can be no great losse, because they lade but a litle at a time. All the merchandize they lade outwards, they emball it well with Ore hides, so that if it take wet, it can haue no great harme.

A painted kind of cloth & dyed of diuers colours which those people delight much in, and esteeme them of great price.

In my voyage, returning in the yeere of our Lord God one thousand, five hundred, sixtie and sixe, I went from Goa vnto Malacca, in a Shippe or Gallion of the king of Portugal, which went vnto Banda for to lade Nutmegs & Peares: from Goa to Malacca are one thousand eight hundred miles, we passed without the Island Zeilan, and went through the chanell of Nicubar, or els through the chanell of Sombroero, which is by the middle of the Island of Sumatra, called in olde time Taprobana: and from Nicubar to Pegu is as it were a rowe or chaine of an infinite number of Islands, of which many are inhabited with wilde people, and they call those Islands the Islands of Andemaon, and they call their people sauage or wilde, because they eat one another: also these Islands haue warre one with another, for they haue small Barkes, and with them they take one another, and so eat one another: and if by cuil chance any ship be lost on those Islands, as many haue bene, there is not one man of those ships lost there that escapeth vneaten or vnslain. These people haue not any acquaintance with any other people, neither haue they trade with any, but liue onely of such fruites as those Islands yeeld: and if any ship come neere vnto that place or coast as they passe that way, as in my voyage it happened as I came from Malacca through the chanell of Sombroero, there came two of their Barkes neere vnto our ship laden with fruite, as with Ponces which wee call Adams apples, with fresh Nuts, and with a fruit called Inani, which fruit is like to our Turneps, but is very sweete and good to eat: they would not come into the shippe for any thing that wee could doe: neither would they take any money for their fruit, but they would trucke for olde shirtes or pierces of olde linnen breeches, these ragges they let downe with a rope into their Barke vnto them, and looke Sumatra.

This Island of Sumatra is a great Island and deuided and gouerned by many kings, and deuided into many chanelis, where throughe there is passage: vpon the headland towarde the West is the kingdom of Aſſi gouerned by a Hooye king: this king is of great force and strength, as he that belide his great kingdom, hath many Fioſſis and Gallies. In his kingdom groweth great ſtoze of Pepper, Ginger, Benjamin: he is an bitter enemy to the Portugals, and hath diuers times bene at Malacca to fight againſt it, and hath done great harme to the boroughes thereof, but the citie alway withſtood him valiantly, and with their ordinance did great ſpoile to his campe. At length I came to the citie of Malacca.

The commodities that grow in the kingdom of Aſſi.

The Citie Malacca.

The great trade that is at Malacca.

Malacca is a Citie of maruellous great trade of all kind of marchandize, which come from diuers partes, because that all the ſhippes that ſaile in theſe ſeas, both great and ſmall, are bound to touch at Malacca to paie their cuſtome there, although they vnlade nothing at all, as we doe at Elſnor: and if by night they eſcape away, and pay not their cuſtome, then they fall into a greater danger after: 1. for if they come into the Indies and haue not the ſcale of Malacca, they pay double cuſtome. I haue not paſſed further then Malacca towards the Eaſt, but that which I will ſpeake of here is by good information of them that haue bene there. The ſailing from Malacca towards the Eaſt is not common for all men, as to China and Iapan, and ſo for wards to go who will, but onely for the king of Portugall and his nobles, with leaue graunted vnto them of the king to make ſuch voiaiges, or to the iuriſdiction of the captaine of Malacca, where he expecteth to know what voiaiges they make from Malacca thither, & theſe are the kings voiaiges, that euery yere there departeth fro Malacca 2. gallions of the kings, one of the goeth to y Moluccos to lade Cloues, and the other goeth to Banda to lade Nutmegs and Baces. Theſe two gallions are laden for the king, neither doe they carie any particular mans goods, ſauing the portage of the Mariners and ſouldiers, and for this cauſe they are not voiaiges for marchants, becauſe that going thither, they ſhal not haue where to lade their goods of returne, and beſides this, the captaine will not cary any marchant for either of theſe two places. There goe ſmall ſhippes of the Moores thither, which come from the coaſt of Iaua, and change or giuld their commodities in the kingdom of Aſſi, and theſe be the Baces, Cloues, and Nutmegs, which go for the ſtreights of Mecca. The voiaiges that the king of Portugall graunterh to his nobles are theſe, of China and Iapan, from China to Iapan, and from Iapan to China, and from China to the Indies, and the voyage of Bengala, Maluco, and Sonda, with the lading of ſine cloth, and euery ſort of Bumball cloth. Sonda is an Island of the Moores neere to the coaſt of Iaua, and there they lade Pepper for China. The ſhip that goeth euery yere from the Indies to China, is called the ſhip of Drugs, becauſe ſhe carrieth diuers drugs of Cambaia, but the greateſt part of her lading is ſiluer. From Malacca to China is eightene hundred miles: and from China to Iapan goeth euery yere a ſhippe of great importance laden with Silke, which for returne of their Silke byingeth barres of ſiluer which they trucke in China. The diſtance betweene China and Iapan is foure and twenty hundred miles, and in this way there are diuers Ilands not very bigge, in which the Friars of ſaint Paul, by the helpe of God, make many Chriſtians there like to themſelues. From theſe Ilands hitherwards the place is not yet diſcouered for the great ſholdneſſe of Sandes that they find. The Portugals haue made a ſmall citie neere vnto the coaſt of China called Macao, whole church and houſes are of wood, and it hath a biſhoprike, but the cuſtoms belong to the king of China, and they goe and pay the ſame at a citie called Canton, which is a citie of great importance and very beautifull two dayes iourney and a halfe from Macao. The people of China are Gentiles, and are ſo iealous and fearefull, that they would not haue a ſtranger to put his foote within their land: ſo that when the Portugals go thither to pay their cuſtome, and to buy their marchandize, they will not conſent that they ſhall lie or lodge within the citie, but ſend them ſoozth into the ſuburbes. The countrey of China is neere the kingdom of great Tartaria, and is a very great countrey of the Gentiles and of great importance, which may be iudged by the rich and precious marchandize that come from thence, then which I beleeue there are not better nor in greater quantitie in the whole world beſides.

First, great store of golde, which they carie to the Indies, made in plates like to little shippes, and in value thre and twentie carats a peece, very great aboundance of fine silke, cloth of damaske and taffata, great quantitie of muske, great quantitie of Occam in barres, great quantitie of quicksilver and of Cinaper, great store of Camfoza, an infinite quantitie of Porcellane, made in vessels of diuerse sortes, great quantitie of painted cloth and squares, infinite store of the rootes of China: and euery yeere there commeth from China to the Indies, two or thre great shippes, laden with most rich and precious marchandise. The Rubarbe commeth from thence ouer lande, by the way of Persia, because that euery yeere there goeth a great Carouan from Persia to China, which is in going thither sixe moneths. The Carouan arriuerth at a Citie called Lanchin, the place where the king is resident with his Court. I spake with a Persian that was thre yeeres in that citie of Lanchin, and he tolde me that it was a great Citie and of great importance. The voiaages of Malacca which are in the iurisdiction of the Captaine of the castle, are these: Euery yeere he sendeth a small shippe to Timor to lade white Sandols, for all the best commeth from this Island: there commeth some also from Solor, but that is not so good: also he sendeth another small ship euery yeere to Cauchin China, to lade there wood of Aloes, for that all the wood of Aloes commeth from this place, which is in the firme land neere vnto China, and in that kingdome I could not knowe how that wood groweth by any meanes. For that the people of the countrey will not suffer the Portugales to come within the land, but onely for wood and water, and as for all other things that they wanted, as victuals or marchandise, the people bring that a boord the ship in small barkes, so that euery day there is a mart kept in the ship, vntill such time as the be laden: also there goeth another ship for the said Captaine of Malacca to Sion, to lade Uerzino: all these voiaages are for the Captaine of the castle of Malacca, and when he is not disposed to make these voiaages, he selleth them to another.

The citie of Sion, or Sim.

Sion was the imperiall seat, and a great Citie, but in the yeere of our Lord God one thousand five hundred fiftie and seuen, it was taken by the king of Pegu, which king made a voyage or came by lande foure moneths iourney with an armie of men through his launde, and the number of his armie was a million and foure hundredeth thousand men of warre: when hee came to the Citie, he gaue assault to it, and besieged it one and twentie monethes before he could winne it, with great losse of his people, this I know, for that I was in Pegu sixe moneths after his departure, and saue when that his officers that were in Pegu, sent five hundredeth thousand men of warre to furnish the places of them that were slaine and lost in that assault: yet for all this, if there had not bene treason against the citie, it had not bene lost: for on a night there was one of the gates let open, through the which with great trouble the king gaue into the citie, and became gonerall of Sion: and when the Emperour saue that he was betrayed, and that his ennemie was in the citie, he poisoned himselfe: and his wiues and children, friends and noblemen, that were not slaine in the first affront of the entrance into the citie, were all caried captiues into Pegu, where I was at the coming home of the king with his triumphs and victorie, which coming home & returning from the warres was a goodly sight to behold, to see the Elephants come home in a square, laden with golde, silver, iewels, and with noble men and women that were taken prisoners in that citie.

A prince of a marvellous strength and power.

Now to returne to my voyage: I departed from Malacca in a great shippe which went for Saint Tome, being a Citie situate on the coast of Coromandel: and because the Captaine of the castles of Malacca had vnderstanding by abuisse that the king of *Assi would come with a great armie and power of men against them, therefore vpon this he would not giue licence that any shippes should depart: Wherefore in this ship wee departed from thence in the night, without making any provision of our water: and wee were in that shippe foure hundredeth and odd men: we departed from thence with intention to goe to an Island to take in water, but the windes were so contrary, that they would not suffer vs to fetch it, so that by this meanes wee were two and fortie dayes in the sea as it were lost, and we were dyuen too and fro, so that the first lande that we discovered, was beyonde Saint Tome, moze then five hundredeth miles which were the mountaines of Zerzerline, neere vnto the kingdome of Orisa, and so wee came to Orisa with many sicke, and moze that were dead for want of water: and they that were sicke in foure dayes dyed: and I for the space of a yeere after had my throat so sore and hoarse, that I could neuer satisfie my thirst in drinking of water: I iudge the reason of my hoarseness to be with soppes that I wet in vineger and oyle, wherewith I lusted my selfe many dayes. There was not any want of bread nor of wine: but the wines of that countrey are so hot that being drunke without water they will kill a man : neither are they able to drinke them : when we beganne to want water, I sawe certaine Moores that were officers in the ship, that solde a small dish full for a duckat, after this I sawe one that would haue giuen a barre of Pepper, which is two quintalles and a halfe, for a litle measure of water, and he could not haue it. Truly I beleue that I had died with my slaue, whom then I had to serue mee, which cost mee verie deare: but to prouide for the daunger at hand, I solde my slaue for halfe that he was worth, because that I would saue his drinke that he drunke, to serue my owne purpose, and to saue my life.

Of the kingdome of Orisa, and the riuier Ganges.

ORisa was a faire kingdome and trustie, through the which a man might haue gone with golde in his hande without any daunger at all, as long as the lawefull King reigned which was a Gentile, who continued in the citie called Catecha, which was within the land sixe dayes iourney. This king loued strangers marueilous well, especially marchants which had traffique in and out of his kingdome, in such wise that hee would take no custome of them, neither any other grieuous thing. Onely the shippe that came thither payde a small thing according to her portage, and euery yeere in the port of Orisa were laden five and twentie or thirtie ships great and small, with ryce and diuers sortes of fine white bumbaste cloth, ople of Zerzeline which they make of a seed, and it is very good to eate and to fry fish withal, great store of butter, Lacca, long pepper, Ginger, Mirabolans dy and condite, great store of cloth of herbes, which is a kinde of silke which groweth amongst the woods without any labour of man, and when the bole thereof is growen round as bigge as an Orange, then they take care onely to gather them. About sirteene yeeres past, this king with his kingdome were destroyed by the king of Parane, which was also king of the greatest part of Bengala, and when he had got the kingdome, he set custome there twenty pro cento, as Marchants payde in his kingdome: but this tyrant enioyed his kingdome but a small time, but was conquered by another tyrant, which was the great Mogol king of Agra, Delly, and of all Cambaia, without any resistance. I departed from Orisa to Bengala, to the harbour Piqueno, which is distant from Orisa towarthes the East a hundred and seuentie miles. They goe as it were rowing alongst the coast fiftie and foure miles, and then we enter into the riuier Ganges: from the mouth of this riuier, to a citie called Satagan, where the marchants gather themselves together with their trade, are a hundred miles, which they rowe in eightene houres with the increase of the water: in which riuer it floweth and ebbereth as it doth in the Thamiz, and when the ebbing water is come, they are not able to rowe against it, by reason of the swiftnesse of the water, yet their barkes be light and armed with oares, like to Foistres, yet they cannot preuaile against that streame, but for refuge must make them fast to the banke of the riuier untill the next flowing water, and they call these barkes Bazaras and Paruas: they rowe as well as a Galliot, or as well as euer I haue seene any. A good tides rowing before you come to Satagan, you shall haue a place which is called Buttor, and from thence vpwards the ships doe not goe, because that vpwardes the riuer is very shallowe, and litle water. Euery yeere at Buttor they make and vnmake a Village, with houses and shoppes made of strawe, and with all things necessarie to their vles, and this village standeth as long as the ships ride there, and till they depart for the Indies, and when they are departed, euery man goeth to his plot of houses, and there setteth fire on them, which thing made me to maruaile. For as I passed by to Satagan, I sawe this village standing with a great number of people, with an infinite number of ships and Bazars, and at my returne coming downe with my Captaine of the last ship, for whom I carried, I was amazed to see such a place so soone razed and burnt, & nothing left but the signe of the burnt houses. The small ships go to Satagan, and there they lade.

Of the citie of Satagan.

In the port of Satagan euery yeere lade thirtie or five and thirtie ships great and small, with rice, cloth of Bombast of diuerse sortes, Lacca, great abundance of sugar, Mirabolans dyed and preserued, long pepper, ople of Zerzeline, and many other sortes of marchandise. The citie of Satagan is a reasonable faire citie for a citie of the Moores, abounding with all things, and was gouerned by the king of Parane, and now is subiect to the great Mogol. I was in this kingdome foure moneths, whereas many marchants did buy or freight boates for their benefites, and with these barkes they goe by and downe the riuer of Ganges to faires, buying their commoditie with a great aduantage, because that euery day in the weeke they haue a taste, now in one place, and now in another, and I also hired a barke and went vp and downe the river and did my businesse, and so in the night I saw many strange things. The kingdome of Bengala in times past hath bene as it were in the power of Moores, neuertheless there is great store of Gentiles among them; alwayes whereas I haue spoken of Gentiles, is to be understood Idolaters, and whereas I speak of Moores I meane Mahomers sect. Those people especially that be within the land doe greatly worship the river of Ganges: for when any is sicke, he is brought out of the countrey to the banke of the river, and there they make him a small cottage of strawe, and euery day they wet him with that water, whereof there are many that die, and when they are dead, they make a heape of stiches and boughes and lay the dead bodie thereon, and putting fire thereunto, they let the bodie alone untill it be halfe roasted, and then they take it off from the fire, and make an emptie iarre fast about his necke, and so throw him into the river. These things euery night as I passed by and downe the river I saw for the space of two moneths, as I passed to the sayres to buy my commodities with the marchants. And this is the cause that the Portugales will not drinke of the water of the river Ganges, yet to the sight it is more perfect and clearer then the water of Nilus. From the port Piqueno I went to Cochín, and from Cochín to Malacca, from whence I departed for Pegu being eight hundred miles distant. That voyage is wont to be made in sixe and twentie or thirtie dayes, but we were foure moneths, and at the ende of three moneths our ship was without victuals. The Pilot told vs that wee were by his altitude not farre from a citie called Tanalarý, in the kingdome of Pegu, and these his words were not true, but we were (as it were) in the middle of many Ilands, and many uninhabited rockes, and there were also some Portugales that affirmed that they knew the land, and knewe also where the citie of Tanalarý was.

Moores are of the sect of Mahomet.

A ceremony of the gentiles when they are dead.

This citie of right belongeth to the kingdome of Sion, which is situate on a great rivers side, which cometh out of the kingdome of Sion: and where this river runneth into the sea, there is a villiage called Mirgim, in whose harbour euery yeere there lade some ships with Uerzina, Appa, and Beniamin, a few cloues, nutmegs and maces which come from the coast of Sion, but the greatest marchandise there is Uerzin and Appa, which is an excellent wine, which is made of the floure of a tree called Apper. Whose liquor they distill, and so make an excellent drinke cleare as chrystall, good to the mouth, and better to the stomacke, and it hath an excellent gentle vertue, that if one were rotten with the french pockes, drinking good store of this, he shall be whole againe, and I haue seene it proued, because that when I was in Cochín, there was a friend of mine, whose nose beganne to drop away with that disease, and he was counselled of the doctors of physicke, that he should goe to Tanalarý at the time of the new wines, and that he should drinke of the apper wine, night and day, as much as he could before it was distilled, which at that time is most delicate, but after that it is distilled, it is more strong, and if you drinke much of it, it will fume into the head with drunkennesse. This man went thither, and did so, and I haue seene him after with a good colour and sound. This wine is very much esteemed in the Indies, and for that it is brought so farre off, it is very deare: in Pegu ordinarily it is good cheape, because it is neerer to the place where they make it, and there is euery yeere great quantitie made thereof. And returning to my purpose, I say, being amongst these rockes, and farre from the land which is ouer against Tanalarý, with great scarcitie of victuals, and that by the saying of the Pilot and two Portugales, holding then firme that wee were in front of the aforesayd harbour, we determined to goe thither with our boat and fetch victuals, and that the shippe should stay for vs in a place assigned. We were twentie and eight persons in the boat that went for victuals, and on a day about twelue of the clocke we went from the ship, assuring our selues to bee in the harbour before night in the aforesayd port, wee rowed all that day, and a great part of the next night, and all the next day without finding harbour, or any signe of good landing, and this came to passe through the euill counsell of the two Portugales that were with vs.

Marchandise comming from Sion.

Apper wine good to cure the french disease.

For we had overshot the harbour and left it behind vs, in such wise that we had lost the land inhabited, together with the shippe, and we eight and twentie men had no manner of victuall with vs in the boate, but it was the Lords will that one of the Mariners had brought a litle rice with him in the boate to barter away for some other thing, and it was not so much but that three or foure men would haue eaten it at a meale: Iooke the gouernment of this Rye, promising that by the helpe of God that Rye should be nourishment for vs untill it pleased God to send vs to some place that was inhabited: & when I slept I put the rye into my bosome because they should not rob it from me: we were nine daies rowing along the coast, without finding any thing but countreys uninhabited, & desert Ilands, where if we had found but grasse it would haue seemed sugar unto vs, but wee could not finde any, yet we found a fewe leaues of a tree, and they were so hard that we could not chewe them, we had water and wood sufficient, and as wee rowed, we could goe but by flowing water, for when it was ebbing water, wee made fast our boat to the banke of one of those Ilandes, and in these nine dayes that we rowed, we found a cante of nest of Tortoises egges, wherein were one hundred fortye and foue egges, the which was a great helpe unto vs: these egges are as bigge as a hennes egge, and haue no shell about them but a tender skinne, euery day we sodde a kittle full of those egges, with an handfull of rice in the broth thereof: it pleased God that at the ende of nine dayes we discouered certaine fisher men, a fishing with small barkes, and we rowed towards them, with a good cheate, for I thinke there were neuer men moze glad then we were, for we were so fozie afflicted with penurie, that we could scarce stande on our legges. Yet according to the order that we set for our ryce, when we sawe those fisher men, there was left sufficient for foure dayes. The first village that we came to was in the gulse of Tauay, vnder the king of Pegu, whereas we found great store of victuals: then for two or thre dayes after our arriual there, we would eate but litle meate any of vs, and yet for all this, we were at the point of death the most part of vs. From Tauay to Martauan, in the kingdome of Pegu, are seuentie two miles. We laded our boate with victuals which were abundantly sufficient for sixe moneths, from whence we departed for the port and Citie of Martauan, where in short time we arriued, but we found not our ship there as we had thought we should, from whence presently we made out two barkes to goe to looke for her. And they found her in great calamitie, and neede of water, being at an anker with a contrary winde, which came verpill to pass, because that she wanted her boate a moneth, which should haue made her prouision of wood and water, the shippe also by the grace of God arriued safely in the aforesaid port of Martauan.

the Portugales.

WE found in the Citie of Martauan ninetie Portugales of Merchants and other base men, which had fallen at difference with the Rector or gouernour of the citie, and all for this cause, that certaine vagabondes of the Portugales had slaine five sutchines of the king of Pegu, which chaunced about a moneth after the king of Pegu was gone with a million and foure hundred thousand men to conquire the kingdome of Sion. They haue for custome in this Countrey and kingdome, the king being wheresoeuer his pleasure is to bee out of his kingdome, that euery fiftene dayes there goeth from Pegu a Carouan of sutchines, with euery one a basket on his head full of some fruites or other delicates of refreshings, and with cleane clothes: it chaunced that this Carouan passing by Martauan, and resting themselves there a night, there happened betweene the Portugales and them wordes of despight, and from wordes to blowes, and because it was thought that the Portugales had the worse, the night following, when the sutchines were a sleepe with their companie, the Portugales went and cut off five of their heads. Now there is a lawe in Pegu, that whosoever killeth a man, he shall buy the shed blood with his money, according to the estate of the person that is slaine, but these sutchines being the seruants of the king, the Rectors durst not doe any thing in the matter, without the consent of the king, because it was necessarie that the king should knowe of such a matter. When the king had knowledge thereof, he gaue commaundement that the malefactors should be kept vntill his comming home, and then he would duely minister iustice, but the Captaine of the Portugales would not deliuer those men, but rather set himselfe with all the rest in armes, and went euery day through the Citie marching with his Drumme and ensignes displayed. For at that time the Citie was empty of men, by reason they were gone all to the warres and in businesse of the king: in the midst of this rumour wee came thither, and I thought it a strange thing to see the Portugales vse such insolencie in another mans Citie. And I stood in doubt of that which came to passe, and would not vnlade my goods because that they were moze sure in the shippe then on the land, the greatest part of the lading was the owners of the shippe, who was in Malacca, yet there were diuerse marchants there, but their goods were of small importance, all those marchants tolde me that they would not vnlade any of their goods there, vntill I would vnlade first, yet after they left my counsell and followed their owne, and put their goods a lande and lost euery whit. The Rector with the custome sent for mee, and demanded why I put not my goods a lande, and payed my custome as other men did: To whom I answered, that I was a marchant that was newly come thither, and seeing such disorder amongst the Portugales, I doubted the losse of my goods which cost me very deare, with the sweate of my face, and for this cause I was determined not to put my goods on lande, untill such time as his honour would assure me in the name of the king, that I should haue no losse, and although there came harme to the Portugales, that neither I nor my goods should haue any hurt, because I had neither part nor any difference with them in this tumult: my reason sounded well in the Rectors eares, and so presently he sent for the Wargits, which are as Counsellors of the Citie, and there they promised mee on the kings head or in the behalfe of the king, that neither I nor my goods should haue any harme, but that we should be safe and sure: of which promise there were made publike notes. And then I sent for my goods and had them on land, and payde my custome, which is in that countrey ten in the hundred of the same goods, and for my more securitie I tooke a house right against the Rectors house. The Captaine of the Portugales, and all the Portugall marchants were put out of the Citie, and I with twentie and two poore men which were officers in the shippe, had my dwelling in the Citie. After this, the Gentiles deuided to be reuenged of the Portugales; but they would not put it in execution untill such time as our small shippe had discharged all her goods, and then the next night following came from Pegu foure thousand souldiers with some Elephants of warre; and befoze that they made any tumult in the citie, the Rector sent, and gaue commaundement to all Portugales that were in the Citie, when they heard any rumour of noyse, that for any thing they should not goe out of their houses, as they tendered their owne health. Then foure houres within night I heard a great rumour and noyse of men of warre, with Elephants which threw downe the doores of the ware-houses of the Portugales; and their houses of wood and strawe, in the which tumult there were some Portugales wounded, and one of them slaine; and others without making prooffe of their manhoode, which the day befoze did so bragge, at that time put themselves to flight most shamefully, and saved themselves a boord of litle shippes, that were at an anker in the harbour, and some that were in their beds fled away naked, and that night they caried away all the Portugalles goods out of the suburbs into the Citie, and those Portugales that had their goods in the suburbs also. After this the Portugales that were fledde into the shippes to saue themselves, tooke a newe courage to themselves, and came on lande and set fire on the houses in the suburbs, which houses being made of boorde and strawe, and the winde blowing fresh, in small time were burnt and consumed, with which fire halfe the Citie had like to haue beene burnt; when the Portugales had done this, they were without all hope to recouer any part of their goods againe, which goods might amount to the summe of fiftene thousand ducats, which, if they had not set fire to the towne, they might haue had againe without any losse at all. Then the Portugales vnderstanding that this thing was not done by the consent of the king, but by his Lieutenant and the Rector of the citie were very ill content, knowing that they had made a great fault, yet the next morning following, the Portugales beganne to bende and shoot their ordinance against the Citie; which batterie of theirs continued foure dayes, but all was in vaine, for the shotte neuer hit the Citie, but lighted on the top of a small hill neere vnto it, so that the citie had no harme. When the Rector perceiued that the Portugales made batterry against the Citie, hee tooke one and twentie Portugales that were there in the Citie, and sent them foure miles into the Countrey, there to tarry untill such time as the other Portugales were departed, that made the batterry, who after their departure let them goe at their owne libertie without any harme done vnto them. I my selfe was alwayes in my house with a good guard appointed me by the Rector, that no man should doe me iniurie, nor harme me nor my goods; in such wise that hee performed all that he had promised me in the name of the king, but he would not let me depart befoze the coming of the king, which was greatly to my hinderance, because I was twenty and one moneths sequestred, that I could not buy nor sell any kinde of marchandize. Those commodities that I brought thither, were peper, sandols, and Porcellan of China; so when the king was come home, I made my supplication vnto him, and I was licenced to depart when I would.

From Martauan I departed to goe to the chiefest Citie in the kingdome of Pegu, which is also called after the name of the kingdome, which voyage is made by sea in three or foure daies; they may goe also by lande, but it is better for him that hath marchandize to goe by sea and lesser charge. And in this voyage you shall haue a Macareo, which is one of the most marueilous things in the world that nature hath wrought, and I neuer saw any thing so hard to be beleued as this, to wit, the great increasing & diminishing of the water there at one pich or instant, and the horrible earthquake and great noyse that the said Macareo maketh where it commeth. We departed from Martauan in barkes, which are like to our Egypt boates, with the increase of the water, and they goe as swift as an arrowe out of a bow, so long as the tide runneth with them, and when the water is at the highest, then they drawe themselves out of the Channell towards some banke, and there they come to anker, and when the water is diminished, then they rest on dry land:

and when the barkes rest dry, they are as high from the bottome of the Chanell, as any house top is high from the ground. They let their barkes lie so high for this respect, that if there should any shippe rest or ride in the Chanell, with such force commeth in the water, that it would ouerthrowe shippe or barke: yet for all this, that the barkes be so farre out of the Chanell, and though the water hath lost her greatest strength and furie before it come so high, yet they make fast their prowes to the streame, and oftentimes it maketh them very fearefull, and if the anker did not holde her prow by by strength, shee would be ouerthrowen and lost with men and goods. When the water beginneth to increase, it maketh such a noise and so great that you would thinke it an earthquake, and presently at the first it maketh three waues. So that the first washeth ouer the barke, from sterne to sterne, the second is not so furious as the first, and the thirde rapseth the Anker, and then for the space of sixe houres while the water encrease, they rowe with such swiftnesse that you would thinke they did fly: in these tydes there must be lost no iot of time, for if you arrive not at the stagions before the tyde be spent, you must turne backe from whence you came. For there is no staying at any place, but at these stagions, and there is more daunger at one of these places then at another, as they be higher and lower one then another. When as you returne from Pegu to Martauan, they goe but halfe the tide at a time, because they will lay their barkes by aloft on the banks, for the reason aforesayd. I could neuer gather any reason of the noise that this water maketh in the increase of the tide, and in diminishing of the water. There is another Macareo in Cambaya, but that is nothing in comparison of this. By the helpe of God we came safe to Pegu, which are two cities, the olde and the newe, in the olde citie are the Merchant strangers, and marchantes of the Countrey, for there are the greatest doings and the greatest trade. This citie is not very great, but it hath very great suburbs. Their houses be made with canes, and couered with leaues, or with strawe, but the marchants haue all one house or Magason, which house they call Godon which is made of brickes, and there they put all their goods of any valure, to saue them from the often mischances that there happen to houses made of such stuffe. In the new citie is the pallace of the king, and his abiding place with all his barons and nobles, and other gentlemen; and in the time that I was there, they finished the building of the new citie: it is a great citie, very plaine and flat, and foure square, walled round about, and with ditches that compasse the wals about with water, in which ditches are many crocodils, it hath no drawe bridges, yet it hath twentie gates, five for euery square on the walles, there are many places made for centinels to watch, made of wood and couered or guilt with gold, the streetes thereof are the fayrest that I haue scene, they are as streight as a line from one gate to another, and standing at the one gate you may discouer to the other, and they are as broad as 10 or 12 men may ride a breast in them: and those streetes that be thwart are faire and large, these streetes, both on the one side and on the other, are planted at the doozes of the houses, with nut trees of India, which make a very commodious shadowe, the houses be made of wood and couered with a kind of tiles in forme of cups, very necessary for their vse, the kings palace is in the middle of the citie, made in forme of a walled castle, with ditches full of water round about it, the lodgings within are made of wood all ouer gilded, with fine pinacles, and very costly worke, couered with plates of golde. Truly it may be a kings house: within the gate there is a faire large court, from the one side to the other, wherein there are made places for the strongest and stoutest Elephants appointed for the seruice of the kings person, and amongst all other Elephants, he hath foure that be white, a thing so rare that a man shall hardly finde another king that hath any such, and if this king knowe any other that hath white Elephants, he sendeth for them as for a gift. The time that I was there, there were two brought out of a farre Countrey, and that cost me something the sight of them, for that they commaund the marchants to goe to see them, and then they must giue somewhat to the men that bring them: the brokers of the marchants giue for euery man halfe a duckat, which they call a Tanfa, which amounteth to a great summe, for the number of merchants that are in that citie; and when they haue payde the aforesayde Tanfa, they may chuse whether they will see them at that time or no, because that when they are in the kings stall, euery man may see them that will: but at that time they must goe and see them, for it is the kings pleasure it should be so. This King amongst all other his titles, is called the King of the white Elephants, and it is reported that if this king knewe any other king that had any of these white Elephants, and would not send them vnto him, that he would hazard his whole kingdome to conquer them, he esteemeth these white Elephants very deere, and they are had in great regard, and kept with very meete seruice, euery one of them is in a house, all gilded ouer, and they haue their meate giuen them in vessels of siluer and golde, there is one blacke Elephant the greatest that hath bene scene, and he is kept according to his bignesse, he is nine cubites high, which is a marueilous thing,

It is reported that this king hath foure thousand Elephants of warre, and all haue their teeth, and they vse to put on their two vppermost teeth sharpe pikes of yron, and make them fast with rings, because these beastes fight, and make battell with their teeth; hee hath also very many pong Elephants that haue not their teeth sprowled forth; also this king hath a braue deuise in hunting to take these Elephants when hee will, two miles from the Citie. He hath builded a faire pallace all guilded, and within it a faire Court, and within it and rounde about there are made an infinite number of places for men to stande to see this hunting: nere vnto this Pallace is a mighty great wood, through the which the hunt-men of the king ride continually on the backs of the feminine Elephants, teaching them in this businesse. Euery hunter carrieth out with him fire of these feminines, and they say that they anoynt the secret place with a certaine composition that they haue, that when the wilde Elephant doeth smell thereunto, they followe the feminines and cannot leaue them: when the hunt-men haue made prouision, the Elephant is so entangled, they guide the feminines towards the Pallace which is called Tambell, and this Pallace hath a doore which doth open and shut with engines, before which doore there is a long straight way with trees on both the sides, which couereth the way in such wise as it is like darknesse in a corner: the wilde Elephant when he cometh to this way, thinketh that he is in the woods. At the end of this darke way there is a great field, when the hunters haue gotten this praye, when they first come to this field, they send presently to giue knowledge thereof to the Citie, and with all speed there go out fiftie or sixtie men on horsebacke, and doe beset the fildes rounde about: in the great fildes then the females which are taught in this businesse goe directly to the mouth of the darke way, and when as the wilde Elephant is entred in there, the hunters shoute and make a great noise, as much as is possible, to make the wilde Elephant enter in at the gate of that Pallace, which is then open, and as soone as hee is in, the gate is shut without any noise, and so the hunters with the female Elephants, and the wilde one are all in the Court together, and then within a small time the females withdraw themselves away one by one out of the Court, leauing the wilde Elephant alone: and when he perceiueth that he is left alone, he is so madde that for two or thre houres to see him, it is the greatest pleasure in the world: he weepeth, hee singeth, hee runneth, hee tussleth, hee thrusteth vnder the places where the people stand to see him, thinking to kill some of them, but the posts and timber is so strong and great, that hee cannot hurt any body, yet hee oftentimes beareth his teeth in the grates; At length when hee is weary and hath laboured his body that hee is all wet with sweat, then hee plucketh in his truncke into his mouth, and then hee throweth out so much water out of his belly, that hee sprinkleth it ouer the heades of the lookers on, to the uttermost of them, although it be very high: and then when they see him very weary, there goe certaine officers into the Court with long sharpe canes in their hands, and pick him that they make him to goe into one of the houses that is made alongst the Court for the same purpose: as there are many which are made long and narrow, that when the Elephant is in, he cannot turne himself to goe backe againe. And it is requisite that these men should be very wary and swift, for although their canes be long, yet the Elephant would kill them if they were not swift to saue themselves: at length when they haue gotten him into one of those houses, they stand ouer him in a loft and get ropes vnder his belly and about his necke, and about his legges, and binde him fast, and so let him stand foure or fise dapes, and giue him neither meate nor drinke. At the ende of these foure or fise dapes, they vnloose him and put one of the females vnto him, and giue them meate and drinke, and in eight dapes he is become tame. In my iudgment there is not a beast so intellectuall as are these Elephants, nor of more vnderstanding in all the world: for he will do all things that his keeper saith, so that he lacketh nothing but humaine speech.

It is reported that the greatest strength that the king of Pegu hath is in these Elephants, for when they goe to battell, they let on their backs a Castle of wood bound thereto, with bands vnder their bellies: and in euery Castle foure men very commodiously set to fight with hargabushes, with bowes and arrowes, with darts and pikes, and other launcing weapons: and they say that the skinne of this Elephant is so hard, that an harquebuss will not pierce it, vnlesse it bee in the eye, temples, or some other tender place of his body. And besides this, they are of great strength, and haue a very excellent order in their battell, as I haue scene at their feastes which they make in the peere, in which feastes the king maketh triumphes, which is a rare thing and worthy memorie, that in so barbarous a people there should be such goodly orders as they haue in their armies, which be distinct in squares of Elephants, of horsemen, of harquebushers and pikemen, that truly the number of them are infinite: but their armour and weapons are very nought and weak as well the one as the other: they haue very bad pikes, their swords are woyle made, like long knives without points, his harquebushes are most excellent, and alway in his warres he hath eightie thousand harquebushes, and the number of them encreasech dayly. Because the king will haue them shoote euery day at the Plancke, and so by continuall exercise they become most excellent shot: also hee hath great Dominion made of very good mettall; to conclude there is not a King on the earth that hath more power or strength then this king of Pegu, because hee hath twentie and sixe crowned kings at his commaunde. He can make in his Campe a million and an halfe of men of warre in the fildc against his enemies. The state of his kingdome and maintenance of his army, is a thing incredible to consider, & the victuals that should maintaine such a number of people in the warres: but he that knoweth the nature and qualitie of that people, will easily beleue it. I haue scene with mine eyes, that those people and souldiers haue eaten of all sorts of wild beasts that are on the earth; whether it bee very filchie or otherwise all serueth for their mouths: yea, I haue scene them eat Scoptions and Serpents, also they feed of all kinde of herbes and grasse. So that if such a great armie want not water and salt, they wil maintaine themselves a long time in a bush with rootes, flowers and leaues of trees, they carry rice with them for their voyage, & that serueth them in stead of comfits, it is so daintie vnto them. This king of Pegu hath not any army or power by sea, but in the land, for people, dominions, golde and silver, he farre exceeds the power of the great Turke in treasure and strength. This king hath diuers Magalons full of treasure, as gold, & silver, and euery day he crieth forth it more and more, and it is neuer diminished. Also hee is Lord of the Mines of Rubies, Saphires & Spinels. Neere vnto his royal pallace there is an inestimable treasure whereof hee maketh no account, for that it standeth in such a place that euery one may see it, and the place where this treasure is, is a great Court walled round about with walls of stone, with two gates which stand open euery day. And within this place or Court are foure gilded houses couered with lead & in euery one of these are certaine heathenish idoles of a very great value. In the first house there is a statue of the image of a man of gold very great, & on his head a crowne of gold beset with most rare Rubies and Saphires, and round about him are 4. little childzen of gold. In the second house there is the statue of a man of silver, that is set as it were sitting on heapes of money: whose stature in height, as hee sitteth, is so high, that his highnesse exceeds the height of any one roofof an house; I measured his fette, and found that they were as long as all my body was in height, with a crowne on his head like to the first. And in the thirde house, there is a statue of brasse of the same bignesse, with a like crowne on his head. In the 4. and last house there is a statue of a man as big as the other, which is made of Gansa, which is the mettall they make their money of, & this mettall is made of copper & leade mingled together. This statue also hath a crowne on his head like the first: this treasure being of such a value as it is, standeth in an open place that euery man at his pleasure may go & see it: for the keepers thereof neuer forbid any man the sight thereof. I say as I haue said before, that this king euery yere in his feastes triumpheth: & because it is worthy of the noting, I thinke it meet to write thereof, which is as followeth. The king rideth on a triumphant cart or wagon all gilded, which is drawen by 16. goodly horses: and this cart is very high with a goodly canopy ouer it, behind the cart goe 20. of his Lords & nobles, with euery one a rope in his hand made fast to the cart for to hold it vp right that it fall not. The king sitteth in the middle of the cart; & vpon the same cart about the king stande 4. of his nobles most fauored of him, and before this cart wherein the king is goeth all his army as aforesaid, and in the middle of his army goeth all his nobilitie, round about the cart, that are in his dominions, a marvellous thing it is to see so many people, such riches & such good order in a people so barbarous as they be. This king of Pegu hath one pyncipal wife which is kept in a Seraglio, he hath 300. concubines, of whom it is reported that he hath 90. childzen. This king sitteth euery day in person to heare the suites of his subiects, but he nor they neuer speake one to another, but by supplications made in this order. The king sitteth vp aloft in a great hall, on a tribunall seat, and lower vnder him sit all his Barons round about, then those that demand audience enter into a great Court before the king, and there set them downe on the ground 40. paces distant from the kings person, and amongst those people there is no difference in matters of audience before the king, but all alike, and there they sit with their supplications in their hands, which are made of long leaues of a tree, these leaues are 3. quarters of a yard long, & two fingers broad, which are written with a sharpe iron made for y purpose, & in those leaues are their supplications written, & with their supplications they haue in their hands a present or gift, according to the waightines of their matter. Then come 6. secretaries downe to read these supplications, taking them & reading them before the king, & if the king think it good to do to them that fauour or iustice that they demand, then he commaundeth to take the presents out of their hands: but if he thinke their demand be not iust or according to right, he commaundeth them away without taking of their gifts or presents. In the Indies there is not any marchandise that is good to bring to Pegu, unless it bee at some times by chance to bring Opium of Cambaia, and if he bring moncy he shall lose by it. Now the commodities that come from S. Tome are the onely marchandize for that place, which is the great quantitie of cloth made there, which they vse in Pegu; which cloth is made of bombast wouen and patterned, so that the more that kinde of cloth is washed, the more liuelie they shewe their colours, which is a rare thing, and there is made such account of this kinde of cloth which is of so great importance, that a small bale of it will cost a thousand or two thousand ducckets. Also from S. Tome they layd great store of red yarne, of bombast dyed with a roote which they call Saia, as also sayd, which colour will neuer out. With which marchandise euery yeere there goeth a great shippe from S. Tome to Pegu, of great importance, and they usually depart from S. Tome to Pegu the 11. or 12. of September, & if the stay until the twelfth, it is a great hap if the returne not without making of her voyage. Their vse was to depart the first of September, and then they made sure voyages, and now because there is a great labour about that kinde of cloth to bring it to perfection, and that it be well dyed, as also the greedinesse of the Captaine that would make an extraordinary gaine of his freight, thinking to haue the wind alwayes to serue their turne, they stay so long, that at sometimes the winde turneth. For in those parts the windes blow firmly for certaine times; with the which they goe to Pegu with the winde in poepe, and if they arrive not there before the winde change, and get ground to anker, perforce they must returne backe againe; for that the gales of the winde blowe there for three or foure moneths together in one place with great force. But if they get the coast & anker there, then with great labour they may saue their voyage. Also there goeth another great shippe from Bengala euery yeere, laden with fine cloth of bombast of all sorts, which arriueth in the harbour of Pegu, when the ship that commeth from S. Tome departeth. The harbour where these two ships arrive is called Colmin. From Malaca to Martauan, which is a port in Pegu, there come many small ships, and great, laden with pepper, Sandolo, Procellan of China, Camfora, Brinco, and other marchandise. The ships that come from Mecca enter into the port of Pegu and Cirion, and those shippes bring cloth of Tiaell, Scarlets, Veluets, Opium, and Chickinos, by the which they lose, and they bring them because they haue no other thing that is good for Pegu: but they esteeme not the losse of them, for that they make such great gaine of their commodities that they care not thence out of that kingdome. Also the king of Assi his ships come thither into the same port laden with paper; from the coast of S. Tome of Bengala out of the Sea of Bara to Pegu are three hundred miles, and they go it by the river in foure daies, with the encreasing water, or with the flood, to a City called Colmin, and there they discharge their ships, whither the Customers of Pegu come to take the note and markes of all the goods of euery man, & take the charge of the goods on them, and conuey them to Pegu, into the kings house, wherein they make the custome of the marchandise. When the Customers haue taken the charge of the goods & put them into barks, the Rector of the City giueth licence to the Marchants to take barks, and goe up to Pegu with their marchandise; and so three or foure of them take a barks and goe up to Pegu in company. God deliuer euery man that hee giue not a wrong note, and enerie, or thinke to leale any custome: for if they do, for the least trifle that is, he is utterly vndone, for the king doeth take it for a most great affront to bee deceiued of his custome; and therefore they make diligent searches, three times at the lading and unlading of the goods, and at the taking of them a land. In Pegu this search they make when they goe out of the ship for Diamonds, Pearles, and fine cloth which taketh little roome: for because that all the iewels that come into Pegu, and are not found of that countrey, pay custome, but Rubies, Sappyes and Spinels pay no custome in nor out: because they are found growing in that Countrey. I haue spoken before, how that all Marchants that meane to goe thorow the Indies, must carry al maner of household stufte with them which is necessary for a house, because that there is not any lodging nor Innes nor hostes, nor chamber roome in that Countrey, but the first thing a man doth when he commeth to any City is to hire a house, either by the yeere or by the moneth, or as he meanes to stay in those parts.

In Pegu their order is to hire their houses for sixe moneths. Nowe from Colmin to the Citie of Pegu they goe in sixe houres with the flood, and if it be ebbing water, then they make fast their boate to the riuer side, and there tary until the water flow againe. It is a very commodious and pleasant voyage, hauing on both sides of the riuers many great villages, which they call Cities: in the which hennes, pigeons, egges, milke, rice, and other things be very good cheape. It is all plaine, and a goodly Countrey, and in eight dayes you may make your voyage up to Maceo, distant fro Pegu twelue miles, & there they discharge their goods, & lade them in Carts or waines drawen with oxen, and the Marchants are caried in a closet which they call Deling, in the which a man shall be very well accommodated, with cushions vnder his head, and couered for the defence of the Sunne and raine, and there he may sleepe if he haue wil thereunto: and his foure Falchines carry him running away, changing two at one time and two at another. The custome of Pegu and freight thither, may amount vnto twentie or twentie two per cento, and 23. according as he hath more or lesse stolen from him that day they custome the goods. It is requisite that a man haue his eyes watchfull, and to be carefull, and to haue many friends, for when they custome in the great hall of the king, there come many gentlemen accompanied with a number of their slaues, and these gentlemen haue no shame that their slaues rob strangers: whether it be cloth in the wing of it or any other thing, they laugh at it. And although the Marchants helpe one another to keepe watch, & looke to their goods, they cannot looke thereto so narrowly but one or other wil rob something, either more or lesse, according as their marchandise is more or lesse: and yet on this day there is a worse thing then this: although you haue set so many eyes to looke there for your benefit, that you escape vnrobbed of the slaues, a man cannot choole but that he must be robbed of the officers of the customehouse, for paying the custome with the same goods oftentimes they take the best that you haue, & not by rate of euery sort as they ought to do, by which meanes a man payeth more then his dutie. At length when the goods be dispatched out of the custome house in this order, the Marchant causeth them to be caried to his house, and may do with them at his pleasure.

There are in Pegu 8. brokers of the kings, which are called Tareghe, who are bound to sell all the marchandise which come to Pegu, at the common or the currant price: then if the marchants wil sell their goods at that price, they sel them away, and the brokers haue two in the hundredth of euery sort of marchandise, and they are bound to make good the debis of those goods, because they be sold by their hands or meanes, & on their wordes, and oftentimes the marchant knoweth not to whom he giueth his goods, yet he cannot lose any thing thereby, for that the broker is bound in any wise to pay him, and if the marchant sel his goods without the consent of the broker, yet neuertheless he must pay him two per cento, and be in danger of his money: but this is very seldom scene, because the wife, children, and slaues of the debtor are bound to the creditor, and when his time is expired and payment not made, the creditor may take the debtor and carry him home to his house, and shut him vp in a Magasin, whereby presently he hath his money, and not being able to pay the creditor, he may take the wife, children, and slaues of the debtor, and sel them, for so is the lawe of that kingdome. The currant money that is in this city, and throughout all this kingdome is called Gansa or Ganza, which is made of Copper and leade: It is not the money of the king, but euery man may stamp it that wil, because it hath his iust partition or value: but they make many of them false, by putting ouermuch lead into them, and those will not passe, neither will any take them. With this money Ganza, you may buy golde or siluer, Rubies and Puske, and other things. For there is no other money currant amongst them. And Golde, siluer and other marchandise are at one time dearer then another, as all other things be.

This Ganza goeth by weight of Byze, & this name of Byza goeth for y^e accompt of the weight, and commonly a Byza of a Ganza is worth (after our accompt) halfe a ducat, little more or lesse: and albeit that Gold and siluer is more or lesse in price, yet the Byza neuer changeth: euery Byza maketh a hundredth Ganza of weight, and so the number of the money is Byza. He that goeth to Pegu to buy Jewels, if he wil do well, it behoueth him to be a whole yere there to do his businesse. For if so be that he would return with the ship he came in, he cannot do any thing so conveniently for the benefit of the time, because that when they custome their goods in Pegu that come from S. Tome in their ships, it is as it were about Christmas: and when they haue customed their goods, then must they sell them for their credits sake for a moneth or two: and then at the beginning of March the ships depart. The Marchants that come from S. Tome take for the payment of their goods, gold, and siluer, which is neuer wanting there. And 8. or 10. dayes before their departure they are all satisfied: also they may haue Rubies in payment, but they make no accompt of them: and they that will winter there for another yere, it is needfull that they be aduertized, that in the sale of their goods, they specifie in their bargain, the terme of two or 3. moneths payment, & that their payment shalbe in so many Ganza, and neither golde nor siluer: because that with the Ganza they may buy & sel euery thing with great aduantage. And how needful is it to be aduertized, when they wil recouer their payments, in what order they shal receiue their Ganza? Because he that is not experienced may do himselfe great wrong in the weight of the Gansa, as also in the fallenesse of them: in the weight he may be greatly deceived, because that from place to place it doth rise and fall greatly: and therefore when any wil receiue money or make payment, he must take a publique wayer of money, a day or two before he go about his businesse, and giue him in payment for his labour two Byzaes a moneth, and for this he is bound to make good all your money, & to maintaine it for good, for that hee receiue it and scales the bags with his seale: and when hee hath receiued any store, then hee causeth it to be brought into the Magasin of the Marchant, that is the owner of it.

That money is very weightie, for fourtie Byza is a strong porters burden; and also where the Marchant hath any payment to be made for those goods which he buyeth, the Common wayer of money that receiue his money must make the payment thereof. So that by this meanes, the Marchant Marchant with the charges of two Byzes a moneth, receiveth and payeth out his money without losse or trouble. The Marchandizes that goe out of Pegu are Gold, Silver, Rubies, Sappires, Spinellies, great store of Benjamin, long pepper, Leade, Lacca, rice, wine, some sugar, yet there might be great store of sugar made in the Countrey, for that they have abundance of Canes, but they give them to Eliphantes to eat, and the people consume great store of them for food, and many more doe they consume in vaine things, as these following. In that kingdome they spend many of these Sugar canes in making of houses and tents which they call Varely for their idoles, which they call Pagodes, whereof there are great abundance, great and small, and these houses are made in forme of little hills, like to Sugar loaves or to Bells, and some of these houses are as high as a reasonable steeple, at the foote they are very large, some of them be in circuit a quarter of a mile. The saide houses within are full of earth, and walled round about with bricke and dirt in steade of lime, and without forme, from the top to the foote they make a covering for them with Sugar canes, and plaister it with lime all over, for otherwise they would bee spoiled, by the great abundance of raine that falleth in those Countreys. Also they consume about these Varely or idol houses great store of lease-gold, for that they overlay all the cops of the houses with gold, and some of them are covered with golde from the top to the foote: in covering whereof there is great store of gold spent, for that every 10. peres they new overlay them with gold, from the top to the foote, so that with this vanitie they spend great abundance of golde. For every 10. peres the raine doeth consume the gold from these houses. And by this meanes they make golde dearer in Pegu then it would bee, if they consumed not so much in this vanitie. Also it is a thing to be noted in the buying of Jewels in Pegu, that he that hath no knowledge shall have as good Jewels, and as good cheap, as he that hath bene practized there a long time, which is a good order, and it is in this wise. There are in Pegu foure men of good reputation, which are called Tareghe, or brokers of Jewels. These foure men have all the Jewels or Rubies in their handes, and the Marchant that will buy cometh to one of these Tareghe and telleth him, that he hath so much money to imploy in Rubies. For though the hands of these foure men passe all the Rubies: for they have such quantitie, that they knowe not what to doe with them, but sell them at most vile and bale prices. When the Marchant hath broken his mind to one of these brokers or Tareghe, they carry him home to one of their Shops, although he hath no knowledge in Jewels: and when the Jewellers perceiue that hee will employ a good round summe, they will make a bargain, and if not, they let him alone. The vse generally of this Citie is this; that when any Marchant hath bought any great quantitie of Rubies, and hath agreed for them, hee carrieth them home to his house, let them be of what value they will, he shall have space to looke on them and peruse them in two or three dayes: and if he hath no knowledge in them, he shall alwayes have many Marchants in that Citie that have very good knowledge in Jewels; with whom he may alwayes conferr and take counsell, and may shew them unto whom he will; and if he finde that hee hath not employed his money well, hee may returne his Jewels backe to them whom hee had them of, without any losse at all. Which thing is such a shame to the Tareghe to have his Jewels returne, that he had rather beare a blow on the face then that it should be thought that he sold them so deere to have them returned. For these men have alwayes great care that they affoord good pennyworths, especially to those that have no knowledge. This they doe, because they would not loose their credite: and when those Marchants that have knowledge in Jewels buy any, if they buy them deere, it is their own fault, and not the brokers: yet it is good to have knowledge in Jewels, by reason that it may somewhat ease the price. There is also a very good order which they have in buying of Jewels, which is this: There are many Marchants that stand by at the making of the bargain, and because they shall not understand howe the Jewels be sold, the Broker and the Marchants have their hands under a cloth, and by touching of fingers and nipping the ioynts they know what is done, what is bidden, and what is asked. So that the standers by knowe not what is demanded for them, although it be for a thousand or 10. thousand duckets. For every ioynt and every finger hath his signification. For if the Marchants that stande by should understand the bargain, it would breed great controuersie amongst them. And at my being in Pegu in the moneth of August, in Anno 1569, having gotten well by my endeavour, I was desirous to see mine owne Countrey, and I thought it good to goe by the way of S. Tome, but then I should tarry until March.

In which journey I was counsailed, yea, and fully resolved to goe by the way of Bengala, with a shippe there ready to depart for that voyage. And then wee departed from Pegu to Chariagan a great harbour or port, from whence there goe small ships to Cochin, before the fleet depart for Portugall, in which ships I was fully determined to goe to Lisbon, and so to Venice. When I had thus resolved my selfe, I went a boord of the shippe of Bengala, at which time it was the yeere of Touffon: concerning which Touffon ye are to understand, that in the East Indies often

Unfortunate are they that are at sea in that yere and time of the Touffon, because few there are that escape that danger. In this yere it was our chance to be at sea with the like storme, but it happened well unto vs, for that our ship was newly over-plancked, and had not any thing in her save victuall and ballast, Silver and golde, which from Pegu they carry to Bengala, and no other kinde of Merchandise. This Touffon or cruel storme endured three dayes and three nights: in which time it carried away our sailes, yards, and rudder; and because the shippe laboured in the Sea, wee cut our mast over boord: which when we had done the labourd a great deale more then before, in such wise, that she was almost full with water that came over the highest part of her and so went downe: and for the space of three dayes and three nights sixtie men did nothing but hale water out of her in this wise, twentie men in one place, and twentie men in another place, and twentie in a thirde place: and for all this storme, the shippe was so good, that shee tooke not one iot of water below through her sides, but all ran downe through the hatches, so that those sixtie men did nothing but cast the Sea into the Sea. And thus drining too and fro as the winde and Sea would, we were in a darke night about foure of the clocke cast on a shoale: yet when it was day, we could neither see land on one side nor other, and knew not where we were. And as it pleased the diuine power, there came a great waue of the Sea, which braue vs beyond the shoale. And when wee felt the shippe afloat, we rose up as men reuiued, because the Sea was calme and smooth water, and then sounding we found twelue fadome water, and within a while after wee had but fixe fadome, and then presently we came to anker with a small anker that was left vs at the sterne, for all our other were lost in the storme: and by and by the shippe strooke a ground, and then wee did prop her that she should not overthow.

This Island is called Son-diua.

When it was day the shippe was all dry, and wee found her a good mile from the Sea on drie land. This Touffon being ended, we discovered an Island not farre from vs, and we went from the shippe on the sands to see what Island it was: and wee found it a place inhabited, and, to my iudgement, the fertilest Island in all the world, the which is diuided into two parts by a chanel which passeth betwene it, & with great trouble we brought our ship into the same chanel, which parteth the Island at flowing water, and there we determined to stay 40. dayes to refresh vs. And when the people of the Island saw the ship, and that we were coming a land: presently they made a place of bazar or a market, with shops right ouer against the ship with all manner of prouision of victuals to eat, which they brought downe in great abundance, and sold it so good cheape, that we were amazed at the cheapenesse thereof. I bought many salted kine there, for the prouision of the ship, for halfe a Larine a piece, which Larine may be 12. shillings fixe pence, being very good and fat; and 4. wilde hogges ready dresled for a Larine; great fat hennes for a Bizzie a piece, which is at the most a pennie: and the people told vs that we were deceived the halfe of our money, because we bought things so deare. Also a sacke of fine rice for a thing of nothing, and consequently all other things for humane sustenance were there in such abundance, that it is a thing incredible but to them that haue seene it. This Island is called Sondiaua belonging to the kingdome of Bengala, distant 120. miles from Chatigan, to which place wee were bound. The people are Moores, and the king a very good man of a Moore king, for if he had bin a tyrant as others be, he might haue robbed vs of all, because the Portugall captaine of Chatigan was in armes against the Rector of that place, & every day there were some slaine, at which newes we rested there with no small feare, keeping good watch and ward aboord euery night as the vse is, but the gouernour of the towne did comfort vs, and bad vs that we should feare nothing, but that we should repose our selues securely without any danger, although the Portugales of Chatigan had slaine the gouernour of that City, and said that we were not culpable in that fact; and mozeouer he did vs euery day what pleasure he could, which was a thing contrary to our expectations considering that they & the people of Chatigan were both subiects to one king. We departed from Sondiaua, & came to Chatigan the great port of Bengala, at the same time when the Portugales had made peace and taken a truce with the gouernours of the towne, with this condition that the chiefe Captaine of the Portugales with his ship should depart without any lading: for there were then at that time 18. ships of Portugales great and small. This Captaine being a Gentleman and of good courage, was notwithstanding contented to depart to his greatest hinderance, rather then hee would seeke to hinder so many of his friends as were there, as also because the time of the yere was spent to go to the Indies. The night before he departed, euery ship that had any lading therein, put it aboord of the Captaine to helpe to ease his charge and to recompence his courtelies. In this time there came a messenger from the king of Rachim to this Portugall Captaine, who saide in the behalfe of his king, that hee had heard of the courage and valure of him, desiring him gently that he would vouchsafe to come with the ship into his port, and comming thither he should be very wel intreated. This Portugal went thither and was very well satisfied of this King.

This King of Rachim hath his seate in the middle coast betweene Bengala and Pegu, and the greatest enemy he hath is the king of Pegu: which king of Pegu deuileth night and day how to make this king of Rachim his subject, but by no meanes hee is able to doe it: because the king of Pegu hath no power nor armie by Sea. And this king of *Rachim may arme two hundred Gallies or fiftie by Sea, and by land he hath certaine stiles with the which when the king of Pegu p[re]senceth any harme towards him, hee may at his pleasure drowne a great part of the Countrey. So that by this meanes hee cutteth off the way whereby the king of Pegu should come with his power to hurt him.

Op, Aracan.

The commodities that goe from Chatigan to the Indies.

The Portugal ships depart toward Portugall out of the harbor of Coch.

Goa was besieged.

Opium a good commodity in Pegu.

From the great port of Chatigan they carry for the Indies great store of Rice, very great quantitie of Bombast cloth of euery sort, Sugar, cozne, and money, with other marchandize. And by reason of the warres in Chatigan, the Portugall ships taried there so long, that they arrived not at Coch in so soone as they were wont to doe other yeeres. For which cause the fleet that was at Coch in was departed for Portugal before they arrived there, and I being in one of the small shippes before the fleet, in discouering of Coch in, we also discouered the last shippe of the fleet that went from Coch in to Portugall; where shee made saile, for which I was maruiculously discouered, because that all the yeere following, there was no going for Portugall, and when we arrived at Coch in I was fully determined to goe for Venice by the way of Ormus, and at that time the Citie of Goa was besieged by the people of Dialcan, but the Citizens forced not this assault, because they supposed that it would not continue long. For all this I embarked my selfe in a Galley that went for Goa; meaning there to shippe my selfe for Ormus: but when we came to Goa, the Viceroy would not suffer any Portugal to depart, by reason of the warres. And being in Goa but a small time, I fell sicke of an aggruic that helde mee foure moneths: which with phisicke and diet cost me eight hundred duckets, and there I was constrained to sell a small quantitie of Rubies to sustaine my neede: and I solde that for five hundred duckets, that was worth a thousand. And when I beganne to waxe well of my discaise, I had but little of that money left, euery thing was so scarce: For euery chicken (and yet not good) cost mee seven or eight Liuers, which is six shillings, or six shillings eight pence. Beside this great charges, the Apothecaries with their medicines were no small charge to me. At the ende of six moneths they raised the siege, and then I beganne to worke, for Jewels were risen in their pices: for, whereas before I sold a few of refused Rubies, I determined then to sell the rest of all my Jewels that I had there, and to make an other voyage to Pegu. And for because that at my departure from Pegu, Opium was in great request, I went then to Cambaya to imploy a good round summe of money in Opium, and there I bought 60. percells of Opium, which cost me two thousand & a hundred duckets, euery ducket at foure shillings two pence. Forcouer I bought three bales of Bombast cloth, which cost me eight hundred duckats, which was a good commodity for Pegu: when I had bought these things, the Viceroy commanded that the custome of the Opium should be payde in Goa, and paying custome there I might carry it whither I would. I shipped my 3. bales of cloth at Chaul in a shippe that went for Coch in, and I went to Goa to pay the aforesaid custome for my Opium, and from Goa I departed to Coch in in a ship that was for the voyage of Pegu, and went to winter then at S. Tome. When I came to Coch in, I understood that the ship that had my three bales of cloth was cast away and lost, so that I lost my 800. Serafins or duckats: and departing from Coch in to goe for S. Tome, in casting about for the Island of Zeilan the Pilote was deceived, for that the Cape of the Island of Zeilan lieth farre out into the sea, and the Pilote thinking that he might haue passed hard aboord the Cape, and paying roomer in the night; when it was morning we were farre within the Cape, and past all remedy to go out, by reason the winds blew so fiercely against vs. So that by this meanes we lost our voyage for that yeere, and we went to Manar with the ship to winter there, the ship having lost her mastes, and with great diligence we hardly saued her, with great losses to the Captaine of the ship, because he was forced to fraight another ship in S. Tome for Pegu with great losses and interest, and I with my friends agreed together in Manar to take a bark to carry vs to S. Tome; which thing we did withal the rest of the marchants; and arriuing at S. Tome I had newes through or by the way of Bengala, that in Pegu Opium was very deare, and I knew that in S. Tome there was no Opium but mine to go for Pegu that yeere, so that I was holden of al the marchants there to be very rich: and so it would haue p[ro]oued, if my aduerser fortune had not bin contrary to my hope, which was this. At that time there went a great ship from Cambaya, to the king of Assi, with great quantitie of Opium, & there to lade pepper: in which voyage there came such a storme, that the ship was forced with wether to goe roomer 800. miles, and by this meanes came to Pegu, whereas they arrived a day before mee; so that Opium which was before very deare, was now at a base price: so that which was sold for fiftie Bizzes before, was sold for 2. Bizzes & an halfe, there was such quantitie came in that ship; so that I was glad to stay two yerres in Pegu unless I would have giuen away my commoditie: and at the end of two yerres of my 200. duckets which I bestowed in Cambaya, I made but a thousand duckets. Then I departed againe from Pegu to goe for the Indies and for Ormus with great quantitie of Lacca, and from Ormus I returned into the Indies for Chaul, and from Chaul to Cochín, and from Cochín to Pegu. Once more I lost occasion to make me riche, for whereas I might have brought good store of Opium againe, I brought but a little, being fearefull of my other voyage before. In this small quantitie I made good profite. And now againe I determined to go for my Countrey, and departing from Pegu, I carried and wintered in Cochín, and then I left the Indies and came for Ormus.

I thinke it very necessary before I ende my voyage, to reason somewhat, and to shewe what fruits the Indies do perld and bring forth. First, in the Indies and other East parts of India there is Peper and ginger, which groweth in all parts of India. And in some parts of the Indies, the greatest quantitie of peper groweth amongst wilde bushes, without any manner of labour: saving, that when it is ripe they goe and gather it. The tree that the peper groweth on is like to our Iuie, which runneth up to the tops of trees wheresoeuer it groweth: and if it should not take holde of some tree, it would lie flat and rot on the ground. This peper tree hath his floure and berry like in all parts to our Iuie berry, and those berries be graines of peper: so that when they gather them they be greene, and then they lay them in the Sunne, and they become blacke.

Peper tree.

Ginger.

The Ginger groweth in this wise: the land is tilled and sowed, and the herbe is like to Panizo, and the roote is the ginger. These two spices grow in diuers places.

Cloues.

The Cloues come all from the Moluccas, which Moluccas are two Islands, not very great, and the tree that they grow on is like to our Lawrell tree.

Nutmegs and Maces.

The Nutmegs and Maces, which grow both together, are brought from the Island of Banda, whose tree is like to our walnut tree, but not so big.

White Sandol. Canfora.

All the good white Sandol is brought from the Island of Timor. Canfora being commeth all from China, and all that which groweth in canes commeth from Borneo, & I thinke that this Canfora commeth not into these parts: for that in India they consume great store, and that is very deare. The good Lignum Aloes commeth from Cauchinchina.

Lignum Aloes. Beniamin.

The Beniamin commeth from the kingdome of Assi and Sion.

Long peper.

Long peper groweth in Bengala, Pegu, and Iaua.

This Muske the Jewes doe counterfeit and take out halfe the good muske and beat the flesh of an asse and put in the roome of it.

Muske commeth from Tartaria, which they make in this order, as by good information I haue bene told. There is a certaine beast in Tartaria, which is wilde and as big as a wolfe, which beast they take alive, & beat him to death with small stauces y his blood may be spread through his whole body, then they cut it in pieces, & take out all the bones, & beat the flesh with the blood in a mortar very smal, and dry it; and make purses to put it in of the skin, and these be the rods of muske.

Truely I know not whereof the Amber is made, and there are diuers opinions of it, but this is most certaine, it is cast out of the Sea, and throwne on land, and found vpon the sea bankes.

Rubies Sapphyres, and Spynels.

The Rubies, Sapphyres, and the Spynels be gotten in the kingdome of Pegu. The Diamants come from diuers places; and I know but three sortes of them. That sort of Diamants that is called Chiappe, commeth from Bezeneger. Those that be pointed naturally come from the land of Delly, and from Iaua, but the Diamants of Iaua are more waightie then the other, I could neuer vnderstand from whence they that are called Balassi come.

The Balassi growe in Zeilan.

Pearles they fish in diuers places, as before in this booke is shorne.

Spodiom.

From Cambaza commeth the Spodiom which congeleth in certaine canes, whereof I found many in Pegu, when I made my house there, because that (as I haue said before) they make their houses there of wouen canes like to mats. From Chaul they trade along the coast of Melinde in Ethiopia, within the land of Casraria: on that coast are many good harbors kept by the Moores. Thither the Portugals bring a kinde of Bombast cloth of a low price, and great store of Pater-nosters of beads made of patric glasse, which they make in Chaul according to the vse of the Countrey: and from thence they carry Elephants teeth for India, stauces called Casari, and some Amber and Gold. On this coast the king of Portugall hath his castle called Mozambique, which is of as great importance as any castle that hee hath in all his Indies vnder his protection, and the Captaine of this castle hath certaine voyages to this Casraria, to which places no Marchants may goe, but by the Agent of this Captaine: and they vse to goe in small shippes, and trade with the Casars, and their trade in buying and selling is without any speech one to the other. In this wise the Portugals bring their goods by litle and litle along the Sea coast, and lay them downe:

and so depart, and the Casar Marchants come and see the goods, & there they put downe as much gold as they thinke the goods are worth, and so goe their way and leaue their golde and the goods together, then cometh the Portugal, and finding the golde to his content, hee taketh it and goeth his way into his ship, and then cometh the Casar and taketh the goods and carrieth them away: and if he finde the golde there still, it is a signe that the Portugals are not contented, and if the Casar thinke he hath put too little, he addeth moze, as he thinketh the thing is worth: and the Portugals must not stand with them too strickt; for if they doe, then they will haue no moze trade with them: For they disdaine to be refused, when they thinke that they haue offered ynough, for they be apcruith people, and haue dealt so of a long time: and by this trade the Portugals change their commodities into gold, and carry it to the Castle of Mozambique, which is in an Island not farre distant from the firme land of Cafaria on the coast of Ethiopia, and is distant from India 2800. miles. Now to returne to my voyage, when I came to Ormus, I found there Master Francis Berettin of Venice, and we freighted a bark together to goe for Basora for 70. duckets, and with vs there went other Marchants, which did ease our freight, and very commodiously wee came to Basora and there we stayed 40. dayes for providing a Carouan of barks to go to Babylon, because they vse not to goe two or 3. barks at once, but 25. or 30. because in the night they cannot go, but must make them fast to the banks of the riuer, and then we must make a very good & strong guard, and be well provided of armes, for respect & safegard of our goods, because the number of the eues is great that come to spoile and rob the marchants. And when we depart for Babylon we goe a litle with our saile, and the voyage is 38. or 40. dayes long, but we were 50. dayes on it. When we came to Babylon we stayed there 4. moneths, until the Carouan was ready to go ouer the wilderness, or desert for Alepo; in this citie we were 6. Marchants that accompanied to gether, five Venetians and a Portugal; whose names were as followeth, Messer Florinasa with one of his kindemen, Messer Andrea de Polo, the Portugal & M. Francis Berettin and I, and so wee furnished our selues with victuals and beanes for our hoxles for 40. dayes; and wee bought hoxses and mules, for that they bee very good cheape there, I my selfe bought a hoxse there for 11. shakens, and solde him after in Alepo for 30. duckets. Also we bought a Tent which did vs very great pleasure: we had also amongst vs 32. Camels laden with marchandise: for the which we paid 2. duckets for euery camels lading, and for euery 10. camels they made 11. for so is their vse and custome. We take also with vs 3. men to serue vs in the voyage, which are vsed to goe in those voyages for sine D. a man, and are bound to serue vs to Alepo: so that we passed very well without any trouble: when the camels cried out to rest, our pavilion was the first that was erected. The Carouan maketh but small iourneis about 20. miles a day, & they set forthwards euery morning before day two houres, and about two in the after noone they sit downe. We had great good hap in our voyage, for that it rained: For which cause we neuer wanted water, but euery day found good water, so that we could not take any hurt for want of water. Yet we caried a camicl laden alwayes with water for euery good respect that might chance in the desert, so that wee had no want neither of one thing, nor other that was to bee had in the countrey. For wee came very well furnished of euery thing, and euery day we eat fresh mutton, because there came many shepheards with vs with their flocks, who kept those sheepe that we bought in Babylon, and euery marchant marked his sheepe with his owne marke, and we gaue the shepheards a Medin, which is two pence of our money, for the keeping and feeding our sheepe on the way, and for killing of them. And beside the Medin they haue the heads, the skines, and the intrails of euery sheepe they kil. We fire bought 20. sheepe, and when we came to Alepo we had 7. aliue of them. And in the Carouan they vse this order, that the marchants doe lende flesh one to another, because they will not carry raw flesh with them, but pleasure one another by lending one one day, and another another day.

From Babylon to Alepo is 40. dayes iourney, of the which they make 36. dayes ouer the wilderness, in which 36. dayes they neither see house, trees, nor people that inhabite it, but onely a plaine, and no signe of any way in the world. The pilots go before, and the Carouan followeth after. And when they sit downe all the Carouan vnlabeth and sitteth downe, for they know the stations where the wells are. I say, in 36. dayes we passe ouer the wilderness. For when wee depart from Babylon two dayes we passe by villages inhabited until we haue passed the riuer Euphrates. And then within two dayes of Alepo we haue villages inhabited. In this Carouan there goeth alway a Captaine that doth Justice vnto all men: and euery night they keepe watch about the Carouan, and coming to Alepo we went to Tripoli, whereas Master Florin, and Master Andrea Polo, and I, with a Frier, went and hired a barke to goe with vs to Ierusalem. Departing from Tripolie, we arrived at Iassa: from which place in a day and halfe we went to Ierusalem, and we gaue order to our barke to carry for vs until our returne. Wee stayed in Ierusalem 14. dayes, to visite those holy places: from whence we returned to Iassa, and from Iassa to Tripolie, and there we shipped our selves in a ship of Venice called the Bagazzana: And by the helpe of the diuine power, we arrived safely in Venice the sixt of November 1581. If there be any that hath any desire to goe into those partes of India, let him not be astonied at the troubles that I haue passed: because I was intangled in many things: for that I went very pooze frō Venice with 1200. duc-kets imployed in marchandize, and when I came to Tripolie, I fell sicke in the house of Master Regaly Oratio, and this man sent away my goods with a small Carouan that went from Tripo-lie to Alepo, and the Carouan was robbd, and all my goods lost sauing foure chests of glasses which cost me 200. duc-kets, of which glasses I found many broken: because the cheeuies thinking it had bene other marchandize, brake them by, and seeing they were glasses they let them all alone. And with this onely stocke I aduentured to goe into the Indies: And thus with change and rechange, and by diligence in my voyage, God did blesse and helpe me, so that I got a good stocke. I will not be vnmindfull to put them in remembrance, that haue a desire to goe into those parts, how they shall keepe their goods, and giue them to their heires at the time of their death, and howe this may be done very securely. In all the cities that the Portugales haue in the Indies, there is a house cal- led the schoole of Sancta misericordia commissaria: the gouernours wherof, if you giue them for their paines, will take a copy of your will and Testament, which you must alwayes carpy about you; and chiefly when you go into the Indies. In the countrey of the Moores and Gentiles, in those voyages alwayes there goeth a Captaine to administer Justice to all Christians of the Por- tugales. Also this captaine hath authoritie to recouer the goods of those Marchants that by chance die in those voyages, and they that haue not made their Wills and registred them in the aforesaide schooles, the Captaines will consume their goods in such wise, that litle or nothing will be left for their heires and friends. Also there goeth in these same voyages some marchants that are com- missaries of the schoole of Sancta misericordia, that if any Marchant die and haue his Will made, and hath giuen order that the schoole of Misericordia shall haue his goods and sell them, then they sende the money by exchange to the schoole of Misericordia in Lisbone, with that copie of his Testament, then from Lisbon they giue intelligence thereof, into what part of Christendome soeuer it be, and the heires of such a one comming thither, with testimoniall that they be heires, they shall receiue there the value of his goods: in such wise that they shall not loose any thing. But they that die in the kingdome of Pegu loose the thirde part of their goods by ancient custome of the Countrey, that if any Christian dieth in the kingdome of Pegu, the king and his officers rest heires of a thirde of his goods, and there hath neuer bene any deceit or fraude used in this matter. I haue knowen many rich men that haue dwelled in Pegu, and in their age they haue desired to go into their owne Countrey to die there, and haue departed with all their goods and substance with- out let or trouble.

parel in Pegu.

In Pegu the fashion of their apparel is all one, as well the Noble man, as the simple: the one- ly difference is in the finenes of the cloth, which is cloth of Bombast one finer then another, and they weare their apparell in this wise: First, a white Bombast cloth which serueth for a shirt, then they gird another painted bombast cloth of foureteene brases, which they binde by betwixt their legges, and on their heads they weare a small tock of three brases, made in guize of a myter, and some goe without tocks, and cary (as it were) a hiue on their heades, which doeth not passe the lower part of his eate, when it is lifted by: they goe all bare footed, but the Noble men neuer goe on foote, but are carled by men in a seate with great reputation, with a hat made of the leaues of a tree to keepe him from the raine and Sunne, or otherwise they ride on horsebacke with their feete bare in the stirrops. All sorts of women whatsoeuer they be, weare a smocke downe to the girdle, and from the girdle downewards to the foote they weare a cloth of three brases, open be- fore; so strait that they cannot goe, but they must shewe their secret as it were aloft, and in these going they saine to hide it with their hand, but they cannot by reason of the straitnes of their cloth. They say that this vse was inuented by a Queene to be an occasion that the sight thereof might remoue from men the vices against nature, which they are greatly giuen vnto: which sight shoul- d caule them to regard women the more. Also the women goe bare footed, their armes laden with hoopoes of golde and Jewels: And their fingers full of pperious rings, with their haire rolled by a- bout their heads. Many of them weare a cloth about their shoulders in stead of a cloake.

Now to finish that which I haue begunne to write, I say, that those parts of the Indies are very good, because that a man that hath litle, shall make a great scale thereof; alwayes they must go- uerne themselves that they be taken for honest men. For why: to such there shal neuer want helpe to doe wel, but he that is vicious, let him cary at home and not go thither, because he shall alwayes be a begger, and die a pooze man.

Letters concerning the voyage of M. Iohn Newbery and M. Ralph Fitch, made by the way of the Leuant Sea to Syria, and ouerland to Balsara, and thence into the East Indies, and beyond, In the yeere 1583.

¶ A letter written from the Queenes Maiestie, to Zelabdim Echebar King of Cambaia, and sent by Iohn Newbery. In February Anno 1583.

Elizabeth by the grace of God, &c. To the most inuincible, and most mightie prince, lord Zelabdim Echebar king of Cambaya. Inuincible Emperoz, &c. The great affection which our Subjects haue, to visite the most distant places of the world, not without good will and intention to introduce the trade of marchandize of al nations whatsoeuer they can, by which meanes the mutual and friendly trafique of marchandize on both sides may come, is the cause that the bearer of this letter Iohn Newbery, ioyntly with those that be in his company, with a courteous and honest boldnesse, doe repaire to the borders and countreys of your Empire, we doubt not but that your imperial Maiestie through your royal grace, will fauourably and friendly accept him. And that you would doe it the rather for our sake, to make vs greatly beholding to your Maiestie; wee should moze earnestly, and with moze wordes require it, if wee did think it needful. But by the singular report that is of your imperial Maiesties humanitie in these vndermost partes of the world, we are greatly eased of that burden, and therefore we vse the fewer and lesse wordes: onely we request that because they are our subjects, they may be honestly intreasted and receiued. And that in respect of the hard iourney which they haue vnderaken to places so far distant, it would please your Maiestie with some libertie and securitie of voiage to gratifie it, with such priuileges as to you shall seeme good: which curtesie if your Imperial maiestie shal to our subjects at our requests performe, wee, according to our royall honour, wil recompence the same with as many deserts as we can. And herewith we bid your Imperial Maiestie to farewell.

A letter written by her Maiestie to the King of China,
In Februarie 1583.

Elizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, &c. Most Imperial and inuincible prince, our honest subiect Iohn Newbery the bzinger hereof, who with our fauour hath taken in hand the voyage which now hee pursueth to the parts and countreys of your Empire, not trusting vpon any other ground then vpon the fauour of your Imperial clemencie and humanitie, is moued to vndertake a thing of so much difficultie, being perswaded that hee hauing entered into so many perils, your Maiestie will not dislike the same, especially, if it may appeare that it be not damageable vnto your royall Maiestie, and that to your people it will bring some profite: of both which things he not doubting, with moze willing minde hath prepared himselfe for his destinated voyage vnto vs well liked of, & by this meanes we perceiue, that the profite which by the mutual trade on both sides, al the princes our neighbors in þe West do receiue, your Imperial maiestie & those that be subiect vnder your dominion, to their great ioy and benefit shal haue the same, which consisteth in the transporting out ward of such things whereof we haue plenty, & in bzinging in such things as we stand in need of. It cannot other wise be, but that seeing we are bozne and made to haue need one of another, & that wee are bound to aide one another, but that your imperial Maiestie wil wel like of it, & by your subjects to like in duety wil be accepted. For the increase whereof, if your imperial Maiestie shal adde the securitie of passage, with other priuileges most necessary to vse the trade with your men, your maiestie shal doe that which belongeth to a most honorable & liberal prince, and deserue so much of vs, as by no continuance or length of time shalbe forgotten. Which request of ours we do most instantly desire to be takē in good part of your maiestie, and so great a benefit towards vs & our men, we shall endeuor by diligence to requite when time shal serue therunto. The God Almighty long preferue your Imperial maiestie.

A letter of M. Iohn Newbery, written from Alep, to M. Richard Haklūt of Oxford, the 28. of May, Anno 1583.

Right wel beloued, and my assured good friend, I heartily commend me vnto you, hoping of your good health, &c. After we set saile from Grauesend, which was the 13. day of February last, wee remained vpon our coast untill the 11. day of March, and that day we set saile from Falmouth, and neuer ankered till wee arriued in the road of Tripolie in Syria, which was the last day of Aprill last past, where wee stayed 14. dayes: and the twentie of this present we came hither to Alepo, and with Gods helpe, within siue or sixe dayes goe from hence towards the Indies. Since my comming to Tripolis I haue made very earnest inquirie both there and here, for the booke of Cosinographie of Abilsada Ismael, but by no meanes can heare of it. Some say that possibly it may be had in Persia, but notwithstanding I will not faile to make inquirie for it, both in Babylon, and in Balsara, and if I can finde it in any of these places, I will send it you from thence. The letter which you deliuered me for to cōpy out, that came from M. Thomas Steuens in Goa, as also the note you gaue mee of Francis Fernandes the Portugall, I brought thence with me among other wrytings vnawares, the which I haue sent you here inclosed. Here is great preparation for the warres in Persia, and from hence is gone the Bassa of a towne called Rahemet, and shortly after goeth the Bassa of Tripolis, and the Bassa of Damasco, but they haue not all with them aboue 6000. men from hence, and they goe to a towne called Almerome, which is thre dayes iourney from Trapezunde, where they shal meete with diuers capitaines and souldiers that come from Constantinople and other places thereabout, which goe altogether into Persia. This yere many men goe into the warres, and so hath there euery yere since the beginning thereof, which is eight yeres or thereabouts, but very fewe of them returne againe. Notwithstanding, they get of the Persians, and make castles and holdes in their countrey. I pray you make my hearty commendations to master Peter Guillame, and master Philip Iones, and to M. Walter Warner, and to all the rest of our friends. Master Fitch hath him heartily commended vnto you: and so I commit you to the tuition of the Almighty, who bleesse and keepe you, and send vs a ioyfull meeting. From Alepo, the 28. of May 1583.

Your louing friend to command in all that I may,
John Newberie.

Another letter of the said M. Newberie, written to Master Leonard Poore of London, from Alepo.

Right welbeloued, my very heartie commendations vnto you, and the rest of my friends remembered. My last I sent you was the 25. of February last, from Dele out of the Downes, after which time with contrary windes wee remained vpon our owne coast, vntill the 11. day of March, and then wee set saile from Falmouth, and the thirteenth day the winde came contrary with a very great storme, which continued eight dayes, and in this great storme wee had some of our goods wetted, but God bee thanked no great hurt done. After which time we sailed with a faire wind within the Streights, and so remained at Sea, and ankered at no place vntill our comming into the roade of Tripolis in Syria, which was the last day of Aprill. This was a very good passage. God make vs thankfull for it. The foureteenth day of this present wee came from Tripolis, and the twentieth day arrived here in Alepo, and with the helpe of God to morrowe or next day, wee beginne our voyage towards Babylon and Balsara, and so into India. Our friend Master Barret hath him commended to you, who hath sent you in the Emanuel a ball of Rumegs for the small cristles you sent him, which I hope long since you haue received. Also hee hath by his letter certified you in what order hee solde those things, whereof I can say nothing, because I haue not seene the accompt thereof, neither haue demanded it: for euer since our comming hither hee hath bene still busie about the dispatch of the shippe, and our voyage, and I likewise in buying of things here to cary to Balsara, and the Indies. Wee haue bought in currall for 1200. and odde ducats, and amber for foure hundredeth ducates, and some sōpe and broken glasse, with all other small cristles, all which things I hope will serue very wel for those places that wee shall goe vnto. All the rest of the accompt of the Barke Reinolds was sent home in the Emanuel, which was 3600. ducats, which is 200. pound more then it was rated. For master Saper rated it but 1100. li. and it is 1300. pound, so that our part is 200. pound. Besides such profit as it shall please God to sende thereof: wherefore you shall doe very well to speake to M. Saper for the accompt. And if you would content your selfe to trauell for three or foure yeres, I would wish you to come hither or goe to Cairo, if any goe thither. For wee doubt not if you had remained there but three or foure moneths, you would like so well of the place, that I thinke you would not desire to returne againe in three or foure yeres. And, if it should be my chance to remaine in any place out of England, I would choose this before all other that I know. My reason is, the place is healthfull and pleasant, and the gaines very good, and no doubt the profit will bee hereafter better, things being vsed in good order: for there should come in euery ship the fourth part of her Cargason in money, which would helpe to put away our commodities at a very good price. Also to haue two very good ships to come together, would doe very well: for in so doing, the danger of the voyage might be accompted as little as from London to Antwerpe.

Giles Porter and master Edmund Porter, went from Tripolis in a small barke to Iaffa, the same day that we came from thence, which was the 14 day of this present, so that no doubt but long since they are in Ierusalem: God send them and vs safe returne. At this instant I haue receiued the account of B. Barret, and the rest of the rings, with two and twentie duckats, two medicines in readie money. So there is nothing remaining in his hands but a few bookes, and with Thomas Bosstocke I left certaine small trifles, which I pray you demanda. And so once againe with my hearty commendations I commit you to the tuition of the almighty, who alwayes preserue vs. From Aleppo the 29 of May 1583.

Yours assured, John Newberie.

M. Poore, written from Babylon.

Mlast I sent you, was the 29 of May last past from Aleppo, by George Gill the purser of the Tiger, which the last day of the same moneth came from thence, & arrived at Feluge the 19 day of Iune, which Feluge is one dayes iourney from hence. Notwithstanding some of our company came not hither till the last day of the last moneth, which was for want of Camels to cary our goods: for at this time of the yeere, by reason of the great heate that is here, Camels are very scant to be gotten. And since our coming hither we haue found very small sales, but diuers say that in the winter our commodities will be very well sold, I pray God their words may prooue true. I thinke cloth, kerlies & tinne, haue neuer bene here at so low prices as they are now. Notwithstanding, if I had here so much readie money as the commodities are woorth, I would not doubt to make a very good profite of this voyage hither, and to Balsara, and so by Gods helpe there will be reasonable profite made of the voyage. But with halfe money & halfe commoditie, may be bought here the best sort of spices, and other commodities that are brought from the Indies, and without money there is here at this instant small good to be done. With Gods helpe two dayes hence, I minde to goe from hence to Balsara, and from thence of force I must goe to Ormus for want of a man that speaketh the Indian tongue. At my being in Aleppo I hired two Nazarianies, and one of them hath bene twice in the Indies, and hath the language very well, but he is a very lewde fellow, and therefore I will not take him with me.

Master Newberie his letter from Ormus, to M. Iohn Eldred and

Right welbeloued and my assured good friends, I heartily comend me vnto you, hoping of your good healths, &c. To certifie you of my voyage, after I departed fro you, time wil not permit: but the 4 of this present we arrived here, & the 10 day I with the rest were committed to prison, and about the middle of the next moneth, the Captaine wil send vs all in his ship for Goa. The cause why we are taken, as they say, is, for that I brought letters from Don Anronio. But the truth is, Michael Stropene was the onely cause, vpon letters that his brother wrote him from Aleppo. God knoweth how we shall be delt withall in Goa, and therefore if you can procure our maisters to send the king of Spaine his letters for our releasement, you should doe vs great good: for they cannot with iustice put vs to death, It may be that they will cut our throttes, or keepe vs long in prison: Gods will be done. All those commodities that I brought hither, had beene very well sold, if this trouble had not chanced. You shall do well to send with all speed a messenger by land from Bassara to Aleppo, for to certifie of this mischance, although it cost thirtie or forty crownes, for that we may be the sooner released, and I shalbe the better able to recouer this againe which is now like to be lost: I pray you make my hearty commendations, &c. From out of the prison in Ormuz, this 21 of September, 1583.

The barke of the Jewes is arrived here two daies past, by whom I know you did write, but your letters are not like to come to my handes. This bringer hath shewed me here very great courtesie, wherefore I pray you shew him what favour you may. About the middle of the next month I thinke we shall depart from hence, God be our guide. I thinke Andrew will goe by land to Aleppo, wherein I pray you further him what you may: but if he should not goe, then I pray you dispatch away a messenger with as much speede as possible you may. I can say no more, but do for me as you would I should do for you in the like cause, and so with my very hearty commendations, &c. From out of the prison in Ormuz, this 24 day of September, 1583.

His third Letter to Maister Leonard Poore, written from Goa.

Michael Stropene an Italian accused our men to be spies.

Y last I sent you was from Ormuz, whereby I certified you what had happened there unto me, and the rest of my company, which was, that foure dayes after our arrivall there, we were all committed to prison, except one Italian which came with me from Aleppo, whom the Captaine never examined, onely demanded what countryman he was, but I make account Michael Stropene, who accused vs, had informed the Captaine of him. The first day we arrived there, this Stropene accused vs that we were spies sent from Don Antonio, besides divers other lies: notwithstanding if we had beene of any other countrey then of England, we might freely haue traded with them. And although we be Englishmen, I know no reason to the contrary, but that we may trade hither and thither as well as other nations, for all nations doe, and may come freely to Ormuz, as Frenchmen, Flemmings, Almaines, Hungarians, Italians, Greckes, Armenians, Nazaranes, Turkes and Moores, Jewes & Gentiles, Persians, Moscovites, and there is no nation that they seeke for to trouble, except ours: wherefore it were contrary to all iustice and reason that they should suffer all nations to trade with them, and to forbid vs. But now I haue as great liberty as any other nation, except it be to go out of the countrey, which thing as yet I desire not. But I thinke hereafter, and before it be long, if I shall be desirous to go from hence, that they wil not deny me licence. Before we might be suffered to come out of prison, I was forced to put in suerties for 2000 pardaus, not to depart from hence without licence of the viceroy: other wise except this, we haue as much libertie as any other nation, for I haue our goods againe, & haue taken an house in the chiefest streete in the towne, called the Rue dretre, where we sell our goods.

There were two causes which moued the captaine of Ormus to imprison vs, & afterwards to send vs hither. The first was, because Michael Stropene had accused vs of many matters, which were most false. And the second was for that M. Drake at his being at Maluco, caused two pieces of his ordinance to be shot at a gallion of the kings of Portugall, as they say. But of these things I did not know at Ormus: and in the ship that we were sent in came the chiefest iustice in Ormus, who was called Aueador generall of that place, he had beene there three yeeres, so that now his time was expired: which Aueador is a great friend to the captaine of Ormus, who, certaine dayes after our comming from thence, sent for mee into his chamber, and there begatue to demand of me many things, to the which I answered: and amongst the rest, he said, that Master Drake was sent out of England with many ships, and came to Maluco, and there laded cloues, and finding a gallion there of the kings of Portugall, hee caused two pieces of his greatest ordinance to be shot at the same: and so perceiuing that this did greatly griene them, I asked, if they would be reuenged of me for that which M. Drake had done: To the which he answered, No: although his meaning was to the contrary.

Two causes of our mens imprisonment at Ormus.

He said moreover, that the cause why the capitaine of Ormus did send me for Goa, was, for that the Viceroy would understand of mee, what newes there was of Don Antonio, and whether he were in England, yea or no, and that it might be all for the best that I was sent hither, the which I trust in God wil so fall out, although contrary to his expectation: for had it not pleased God to put into the minds of the archbishop and other two Padres or Jesuits of S. Pauls colledge to stand our friends, we might haue rotted in prison. The archbishop is a very good man, who hath two yong men to his seruantes, the one of them was bozne at Hamborough, and is called Bernard Borgers: and the other was bozne at Enchuyfen, whose name is Iohn Linscor, who did vs great pleasure: for by them the archbishop was many times put in minde of vs. And the two good fathers of S. Paul, who trauelled very much for vs, the one of them is called Padre Marke, who was bozne in Bruges in Flanders, and the other was bozne in Wilshire in England, and is called Padre Thomas Streuens.

The author of the book of the East Indies.

Also I chanced to finde here a young man, who was bozne in Antwerpe, but the most part of his bringing by hath bene in London, his name is Francis de Rea, and with him it was my hap to be acquainted in Aleppo, who also hath done me great pleasure here.

This is he whose letters to his father from Goa are before put downe, and he was sometimes of Iesb colledge in Oxford.

In the prison at Ormus we remained many daies, also we lay a long time at sea continuing hither, and forthwith at our arriual here were caried to prison, and the next day after were sent for before the Aueadoz, who is the chiefest iustice, to be examined: and when we were examined, he presently sent vs backe againe to prison.

And after our being here in prison 13 daies, Iames Storie went into the monastery of S. Paul, where he remaineth, and is made one of the company, which life he liketh very well.

Iames Storie their painter.

And upon S. Thomas day (which was 22 daies after our arriual here) I came out of prison, and the next day after came out Ralph Fitch, and William Bets.

They arrived at Goa the 20 of Nouember 1583.

If these troubles had not chanced, I had bene in possibilitie to haue made as good a voyage as euer any man made with so much money. Many of our things I haue solde very well, both here and at Ormus in prison, notwithstanding the capitaine willed me (if I would) to sell what I could before we imbarked: & so with officers I went diuers times out of the castle in the morning, and solde things, and at night returned againe to the prison, and all things that I solde they did write, and at our imbarcking from thence, the captain gaue order that I should deliuer all my mony with the goods into the hands of the scriuano, or purser of the ship, which I did, and the scriuano made a remembrance, which he left there with the capitaine, that my selfe and the rest with mony & goods he should deliuer into the hands of the Aueadoz generall of India: but at our arriual here, the Aueadoz would neither meddle with goods nor mony, for that he could not prouie anything against vs: wherefore the goods remained in the ship 9 or 10 daies after our arriual, and then, for that the ship was to saile from thence, the scriuano sent the goods on shore, and here they remained a day and a night, and no body to receiue them. In the end they suffered this bzingier to receiue them, who came with me from Ormus, and put them into an house which he had piced for me, where they remained foure or five daies. But afterward when they should deliuer the money, it was concluded by the iustice, that both the money and goods should be deliuered into the positors hands, where they remained foure or five daies after my coming out of prison. At my being in Aleppo, I bought a fountaine of silver and gilt, sixe knives, sixe spoones, and one forke trimmed with corall for five and twentie chekins, which the capitaine of Ormus did take, and payed for the same twentie pardaos, which is one hundred larmes, and was worth there or here one hundred chekins. Also he had five emrauds set in golde, which were woorth five hundred or sixe hundred crownes, and payed for the same an hundred pardaos. Also he had nineteene and a halfe pikes of cloth, which cost in London twenty shillings the pike, and was worth 9 or 10 crownes the pike, and he payed for the same twelue larmes a pike. Also he had two pieces of greene Kerlies, which were worth foure and twentie pardaos the piece, and payd for them sixteene pardaos a piece: besides diuers other trifles, that the officers and others had in the like order, and some for nothing at all. But the cause of all this was Michael Siropene, which came to Ormus not woorth a penie, and now hath thirtie or fortie thousand crownes, and he griueth that any other stranger should trade thither but himselfe. But that shall not skill, for I trust in God to goe both thither and hither, and to buy and sell as freely as he or any other. There is very great good to be done in diuers of our commodities, and in like manner there is great profite to be made with commodities of this countrey, to be carried to Aleppo.

It were long for me to write, and tedious for you to read of all things that haue passed since my parting from you. But of all the troubles that haue chanced since mine arriual in Ormus, this bzingier is able to certifie you. I mind to stay here: wherefore if you will write vnto me, you may send your letters to some friend at Lisbone, & fro thence by the ships they may be conueyed hither.

A Letter written from Goa by Master Ralph Fitch to Master Leonard Poore abouesaid.

During friend Master Poore, &c. Since my departure from Aleppo, I haue not writen vnto you any letters, by reason that at Babylon I was sicke of the fluxe, and being sicke, I went from thence for Balsara, which was twelue dayes journey downe the riuer Tygris, where we had extreame hot weather, which was good for my disease, ill fare, and worse lodging, by reason our boat was pestered with people. In eight daies, that which I did eate was very small, so that if we had stayed two dayes longer vpon the water, I thinke I had died: but comming to Balsara, presently I mended, I thanke God. There we stayed 14 dayes, and then we imbarked our selues for Ormuz, where we arrived the fifth of September, and were put in prison the ninth of the same moneth, where we continued vntill the 11 of October, and then were shipt for this cite of Goa in the capitaines ship, with an 114 horses, and about 200 men: and passing by Diu & Chaul, where we went on land to water the 20 of Nouember, we arrived at Goa the 29 of the said moneth, where for our better intertainment we were presently put into a faire strong prison, where we continued vntill the 22 of December. It was the will of God that we found there 2 Padres, the one an Englishman, the other a Flemming. The Englishmans name is Padre Thomas Stevens, the others Padre Marco, of the order of S. Paul. These bid sue for vs vnto the Viceroy and other officers, and stood vs in as much strab, as our liues and goods were woorth: for if they had not stucke to vs, if we had escaped with our liues, yet we had had long imprisonment.

After 14 dayes imprisonment they offered vs, if we could put in suerties for 2000 duckats, we should goe abroad in the towne: which when we could not doe, the said Padres found suerties for vs, that we should not depart the countrey without the licence of the Viceroy. It doth spite the Italians to see vs abroad: and many maruell at our deliuerie. The painter is in the cloister of S. Paul, and is of their order, and sketh there very well. While we were in prison, both at Ormuz and here, there was a great deale of our goods pilfered and lost, and we haue bene at great charges in gifts and otherwise, so that a great deale of our goods is consumed. There is much of our things which wil sell very well, & some we shall get nothing for. I hope in God that at the returne of the Viceroy, which is gone to Chaul and to Diu, they say, to winne a castle of the Moores, whose returne is thought will be about Easter, then we shall get our libertie, and our suerties discharged. Then I thinke it will be our best way, either one of both to returne, because our troubles haue bene so great, & so much of our goods spoiled and lost. But if it please God that I come into England, by Gods helpe, I will returne hither againe. It is a braue and pleasant countrey, and very fruitfull. The summer is almost all the yeere long, but the chiefest at Christmas.

The day and the night are all of one length, very little difference, and marvellous great store of fruits. For all our great troubles, yet are we fat and well liking, for victuals are here plentie and good cheape. And here I will passe ouer to certifie you of strange things, vntill our meeting, for it would be too long to write thereof. And thus I commit you to God, who euer preserve you and vs all. From Goa in the East Indies the 25 of Januarie 1584.

The voyage of M. Ralph Fitch marchant of London by the way of Tripolis in Syria, to Ormuz, and so to Goa in the East India, to Cambaia, and all the kingdome of Zelabdim Echebar the great Mogor, to the mighty riuer Ganges, and downe to Bengala, to Bacola, and Chondert, to Pegu, to Iamabay in the kingdome of Siam, and backe to Pegu, and from thence to Malacca, Zeilan, Cochin, and all the coast of the East India: begunne in the yeere of our Lord 1583, and ended 1591, wherein the strange rites, maners, and customes of those people, and the exceeding rich trade and commodities of those countries are faithfully set downe and diligently described, by the aforesaid M. Ralph Fitch.

In the yeere of our Lord 1583, I Ralph Fitch of London marchant being desirous to see the countreys of the East India, in the company of Mr. John Newberie marchant (which had bene at Ormuz once before) of William Leedes Jeweller, and James Story Painter, being chiefly set forth by the right worshipfull Sir Edward ward Osborne knight, and M. Richard Staper citizens and marchants of London, did ship my selfe in a ship of London called the Tyger, wherein we went for Tripolis in Syria: & from thence we tooke the way for Aleppo, which we went in seven dayes with the Carouan. Being in Aleppo, and finding good company, we went from thence to Birra, which is two dayes and an halfe traualle with Camels.

Birra is a little towne, but very plentifull of victuals: and neere to the wall of the towne runneth the riuer of Euphrates. Here we bought a boate and agreed with a master and bargemen, for to go to Babylon. These boates be but for one voiage; for the streame doth runne so fast downe, wardes that they cannot returne. They carie you to a towne which they call Felugia, and there you sell the boate for a litle money, for that which cost you fiftie at Birra you sell there for seuen or eight. From Birra to Felugia is fiftene dayes iourney, it is not good that one boate goe alone, for if it should chance to breake, you should haue much a doe to saue your goods from the Arabians, which be alwayes there abouts robbing: and in the night when your boates be made fast, it is necessarie that you keepe good watch. For the Arabians that bee theeres, will come swimming and steale your goods and flee away, against which a gunne is very good; for they doe feare it very much. In the riuer of Euphrates from Birra to Felugia there be certaine places where you pay custome, so many Medines for a some of Camels lading; and certaine rasons and sope, which is for the sonnes of Aborise, which is Lord of the Arabians and all that great desert, and hath some villages vpon the riuer. Felugia where you vnlade your goods which come from Birra to a litle village: from whence you goe to Babylon in a day.

Babylon is a towne not very great but very populous, and of great traffike of strangers; for that it is the way to Persia, Turkia and Arabia: and from thence doe goe Carouans for these and other places. Here are great store of victuals, which come from Armenia downe the riuer of Tygris. They are brought vpon rascres made of goates skinnnes blowne full of winde and boydes layde vpon them: and thereupon they lade their goods which are brought downe to Babylon, which being discharged they open their skinnnes, and carry them bakke by Camels, to serue another time. Babylon in times past did belong to the kingdome of Persia, but nowe is subiect to the Turke.ouer against Babylon there is a very faire village from whence you passe to Babylon vpon a long bidge made of boats, and tyed to a great chaine of yron, which is made fast on either side of the riuer. When any boates are to passe by of downe the riuer, they take away certaine of the boates untill they be past.

The Tower of Babel is built on this side the riuer Tygris, towarde Arabia from the towne about seuen or eight miles, which tower is ruinated on all sides, and with the fall therof hath made as it were a litle mountaine, so that it hath no shape at all: it was made of bryckes dyed in the sonne, and certaine canes and leaues of the palme tree layed betwixt the bryckes. There is no entrance to be scene to goe into it. It doth stand vpon a great plaine betwixt the riuers of Euphrates and Tygris.

By the riuer Euphrates two dayes iourney from Babylon at a place called Aie, in a feld neere vnto it, is a strange thing to see: a mouth that doth continually throwe forth against the ayre boyling pitch with a filthy smoke: which pitch doth runne abroad into a great feld which is alwayes full thereof. The Moores say that it is the mouth of hell. By reason of the great quantitie of it, the men of that countrey doe pitch their boates two or three fuches thicke on the out side, so that no water doth enter into them. Their boates be called Danet. When there is great store of water in Tygris you may goe from Babylon to Basora in 8 or 9 dayes: if there be small store it will cost you the more dayes.

Basora in times past was vnder the Arabians, but now is subiect to the Turke. But some of them the Turke cannot subdue, for that they holde certaine Ilandes in the riuer Euphrates which the Turke cannot winne of them. They be theeres all and haue no settled dwelling, but remoue from place to place with their Camels, goates, and horses, wiues and children and all. They haue large blew gownes, their wiues eares and noses are ringed very full of rings of copper and siluer, and they weare rings of copper about their legs.

Basora standeth neere the gulf of Persia, and is a towne of great trade of spices and drugges which come from Ormus. Also there is great store of wheate, ryce, and dates growing thereabout, where with they serue Babylon and all the countrey, Ormus, and all the partes of India. I went from Basora to Ormus downe the gulf of Persia in a certaine shipp made of boozes, and sowed together with razzo, which is threed made of the huske of Coccoes; and certaine canes or strawe leaues sowed vpon the seames of the bozdes which is the cause that they leake very much. And so hauing Persia alwayes on the left hande, and the coast of Arabia on the right hande we passed many Ilandes; and among others the famous Ilande Ormus.

Ormus is an Island in circuit about five and twentie or thirtie miles, and is the greatest Island in the world: for there is nothing growing in it but onely salt; for their water, wood, or victuals, and all things necessary come out of Persia, which is about twelue miles from thence. All the Islands thereabout be very fruitfull, from whence all kinde of victuals are sent vnto Ormus. The Portugales haue a castle here which standeth neere vnto the sea, wherein there is a Captaine for the king of Portugale hauing vnder him a conuenient number of souldiers, wherof some part remaine in the castle, and some in the towne. In this towne are marchants of all Nations, and many Moores and Gentiles. Here is very great trade of all sortes of spices, drugs, silke, cloth of silke, fine tapestrie of Persia, great store of pearles which come from the Ile of Baharim, and are the best pearles of all others, and many hoyses of Persia, which serue all India. They haue a Moore to their king which is chosen and gouerned by the Portugales. Their women are very strangely attyred, wearing on their noses, eares, neckes, armes and legges many rings set with iewels, and lockes of siluer and golde in their eares, and a long barre of golde vpon the side of their noses. Their eares with the wright of their iewels be wozne so wide, that a man may thrust therof his fingers into them. Here very shortly after our arrivall wee were put in prison, and had part of our goods taken from vs by the Captaine of the castle, whose name was Don Mathias de Albuquerque; and from hence the eleuenth of October he shipped vs and sent vs for Goa vnto the Viceroy, which at that time was Don Francisco de Mascarenhas. The shippe wherein we were imbarcked for Goa belonged to the Capraine; and carried one hundred twentie and foure hoyses in it. All marchandise carried to Goa in a shippe wherein are hoyses pay no custome in Goa. The hoyses pay custome, the goods pay nothing; but if you come in a ship which byingeth no hoyses, you are then to pay eight in the hundred for your goods. The first citie of India that we arrived at vpon the first of Nouember, after we had passed the coast of Zindia, is called Diu, which standeth in an Island in the kingdome of Cambaia, and is the strongest towne that the Portugales haue in those partes. It is but litle, but well stored with marchandise; for here they lade many great shippes with diuerse commodities for the streits of Mecca, for Ormus, and other places, and these be shippes of the Moores and of Christians. But the Moores cannot passe, except they haue a passeport from the Portugales, Cambaetra is the chiefe citie of that prouince, which is great and very populous, and fairely builded for a towne of the Gentiles: but if there happen any famine, the people will sell their children for very litle. The last king of Cambaia was Sultan Badu, which was killed at the siege of Diu, and shortly after his citie was taken by the great Mogor, which is the king of Agra and of Delli, which are forty dayes iourney from the country of Cambaia. Here the women weare vpon their armes infinite numbers of rings made of Elephants teeth, wherein they take so much delight, that they had rather be without their meate then without their bracelets. Going from Diu we come to Daman the second towne of the Portugales in the countrey of Cambaia which is distant from Diu forty leagues. Here is no trade but of come and rice. They haue many villages vnder them which they quietly possesse in time of peace, but in time of warre the enemy is maister of them. From thence we passed by Basaim, and from Basaim to Tana, at both which places is small trade but only of coyne and rice. The tenth of Nouember we arrived at Chaul which standeth in the firme land. There be two townes, the one belonging to the Portugales, and the other to the Moores. That of the Portugales is neerest to the sea, and commaundeth the bay, and is walled round about. A litle about that is the towne of the Moores which is gouerned by a Moor king called Xa-Maluco. Here is great traffike for all sortes of spices and drugges, silke, and cloth of silke, sandales, Elephants teeth, and much China worke, and much China which is made of the nutte called Gagara: the tree is called the palmer: which is the profitablest tree in the world: it doth alwayes beare fruit, and doth yeeld wine, oyle, sugar, vineger, cordes, coles, of the leaues are made thatch for the houses, sayles for shippes, mats to sit or lie on: of the branches they make their houses, and broomes to sweepe, of the tree wood for shippes. The wine doeth issue out of the toppes of the tree. They cut a branch of a bowe and binde it hard, and hange an earthen pot vpon it, which they emptie euery morning and euery euening, and fill it and put in certaine dried raylins, and it becommeth very strong wine in short time. Whether many shippes come from all partes of India, Ormus, and many from Mecca: heere be manie Moores and Gentiles. They haue a very strange order among them, they worshippe a come, and esteeme much of the colwes bough to paint the walles of their houses. They will kill nothing not so much as a louse: for they holde it a sinne to kill any thing. They eate no flesh, but liue by rootes, and ryce, and milke. And when the husbande dieth his wife is burned with him, if shee be aliu: if shee will not, her head is shauen, and then is neuer any account made of her after. They say if they should be buried, it were a great sinne, for of their bodies there would come many wormes and other vermine, and when their bodies were consumed, those wormes would lacke sustenance, which were a sinne, therefore they will be burned. In Cambaia they will kill nothing, nor haue any thing killed: in the towne they haue hospitals to keepe lame dogs and cats, and for birds. They will giue meat to the Ants.

Goa is the most principall citie which the Portugals haue in India, wherein the Viceroy remaineth with his court. It standeth in an Island, which may be 25, or 30, miles about. It is a fine citie, and for an Indian towne very faire. The Island is very faire, full of orchards and gardens, and many palmer trees, and hath some villages. Here be many marchants of all nations. And the flecte which cometh euery yeere from Portugal, which be foure, siue, or sixe great shippes, cometh first hither. And they come for the most part in September, and remaine there fortie or fiftie dayes; and then goe to Cochín, where they lade their Pepper for Portugall. Oftentimes they lade one in Goa, the rest goe to Cochín which is from Goa an hundred leagues southward. Goa standeth in the countrey of Hidalcan, who lieth in the countrey sixe or seuen dayes iourney. His chiefe citie is called Bisapor. At our comming we were cast into the prison, and examined before the Iustice and demanded for letters, and were charged to be spies, but they could prooue nothing by vs. We continued in prison vntill the two and twentie of December, and then we were set at libertie, putting in sureties for two thousand duckats not to depart the towne; which sureties father Steuens an English Iesuite which we found there, & another religious man a friend of his procured for vs. Our sureties name was Andreas Taborer, to whom we paid 2150. duckats, and still he demanded more: whereupon we made sute to the Viceroy and Iustice to haue our money againe, considering that they had had it in their hands neere siue moneths and could prooue nothing against vs. The Viceroy made vs a very sharpe answer, and sayd wee should be better sitted before it were long, and that they had further matter against vs. Whereupon we presently determined rather to seeke our liberties, then to bee in danger for euer to be slaues in the countrey, for it was told vs we should haue y^e Arapado. Whereupon presently, the first day of April 1585. in the morning we raine from thence. And being set ouer the riuer, we went two dayes on foote not without feare, not knowing the way nor hauing any guide, for we durst trust none. One of the first townes which we came vnto, is called Bellergan, where there is a great market kept of Diamants, Rubies, Sapphires, and many other soft stones. From Bellergan we went to Bisapor which is a very great towne where the king doeth keepe his court. Here hath many Gentiles in his court and they be great idolaters. And they haue their idols standing in the Woods, which they call Pagodes. Some be like a Cowe, some like a Donkie, some like Buffles, some like peacocks, and some like the deuill. Here be very many elephants which they goe to warre withall. Here they haue good store of gold and siluer: their houses are of stone very faire and high. From hence wee went to Gulconda, the king whereof is called Cirup de lachan. Here and in the kingdome of Hidalcan, and in the countrey of the king of Decan be the Diamants found of the olde water. It is a very faire towne, pleasant, with faire houses of bricke and timber, it aboundeth with great store of fruites and fresh water. Here the men and the women do go with a cloth bound about their middles without any more apparell. We found it here very hote.

The winter beginneth here about the last of May. In these partes is a porte or haven called Masulipatan, which standeth eight dayes iourney from hence toward the gulfes of Bengala, whither come many shippes out of India, Pegu, and Sumatra, very richly laden with Pepper, spices, and other commodities. The countrie is very good and fruitfull. From thence I went to Seruidora which is a fine countrey, and the king is called, the king of Brad. The houses here be all thatched and made of lome. Here be many Moores and Gentiles, but there is small religion among them. From thence I went to Bellapore, and so to Barrampore, which is in the countrey of Zelabdim Echebar. In this place their money is made of a kind of siluer round and thicke, to the value of twentie pence, which is very good siluer. It is marueilous great and a populous countrey. In their winter which is in June, July, and August, there is no passing in the streetes but with hoxles, the waters be so high. The houses are made of lome and thatched. Here is great store of cotton cloth made, and painted clothes of cotton wooll: here groweth great store of coyne and Rice. We found mariages great store both in townes and villages in many places where wee passed, of boyes of eight or ten yeeres, and girles of siue or six yeeres old. They both do ride vpon one hoxle very trimly decked, and are caried throught the towne with great piping and playing, and so returne home and eate of a banquet made of Rice and fruites, and there they daunce the most part of the night and so make an ende of the marriage. They lie not together vntill they be ten yeeres old. They say they marry their children so young, because it is an order that when the man dieth, the woman must be burned with him: so that if the father die, yet they may haue a father in lawe to helpe to bying vp the children which bee married: and also that they will not leaue their sonnes without wiues, nor their daughters without husbands. From thence we went to Mandoway, which is a very strong towne. It was besieged twelue yeeres by Zelabdim Echebar befoze hee could winne it. It standeth vpon a very great high rocke as the most part of of their castles doe, and was of a very great circuite. From hence wee went to Vgini and Ser- ringe, where wee ouertooke the ambassadour of Zelabdim Echebar with a maruailous great company of men, elephants, and camels. Here is great trade of cotton and cloth made of cotton, and great store of drugs. From thence we went to Agra passing many riuers, which by reason of the raine were so swollen, that wee waded and swamme oftentimes for our liues. Agra is a very great cite and populous, built with stone, hauing faire and large streetes, with a faire ri- uer running by it, which falleth into the gulf of Bengala. It hath a faire castle and a strong ditch, a very faire ditch. Here bee many Moores and Gentiles, the king is called Zelabdim Echebar: the people for the most part call him The great Mogor. From thence wee went for Fatepore, which is the place where the king kept his court. The towne is greater then Agra, but the hou- ses and streetes be not so faire. Here dwell many people both Moores and Gentiles. The king hath in Agra and Fatepore as they doe credibly reposit 1000. elephants, thirtie thousand horses, 1400. tame Deere, 800. concubines: such store of Dunces, Tigers, Buffles, Cocks & Haukes, that is very strange to see. He kepeth a great court, which they call Dericcan. Agra and Fate- pore are two very great cities, either of them much greater then London and very populous. Be- tweene Agra and Fatepore are 12. miles, and all the way is a market of victuals & other things, as full as though a man were still in a towne, and so many people as if a man were in a market. They haue many fine cartes, and many of them carued and gilded with gold, with two wheel- es which be drawn with two little Bulls about the bignesse of our great dogs in England, and they will runne with any horse, and carie two or thre men in one of these cartes: they are covered with silke or very fine cloth, and be vsed here as our Coches be in England. With is great re- sort of marchants from Persia and out of India, and very much marchandise of silke and cloth, and of precious stones, both Rubies, Diamants, and Pearles. The king is apparelled in a white Cabie made like a shirt tied with strings on the one side, and a little cloth on his head colour- ed oftentimes with red or yealow. None come into his house but his eunuches which keepe his women. Here in Fatepore we staid all thre butill the 28. of September 1585. and then master Iohn Newberie tooke his iourney toward the cite of Lahor, determining from thence to goe for Persia and then for Aleppo or Constantinople, whether hee could get soonest passage vnto, and directed me to goe for Bengala and for Pegu, and did promise me, if it pleased God, to meete me in Bengala within two yeeres with a shippe out of England. I left William Leades the ieweller in seruice with the king Zelabdim Echebar in Fatepore, who did entertaine him ve- ry well, and gaue him an house and five slaues, an horse, and euery day five S. S. in money. I went from Agra to Satagam in Bengala, in the companie of one hundred and fourescore boates laden with Salt, Opium, Hinge, Leab, Carpets, and diuers other commodities downe the riuer Ieme- na. The chiefe marchants are Moores and Gentiles. In these countries they haue many strange ceremonies. The Bramanes which are their priests, come to the water and haue a string about their necks made with great ceremonies, and lade by water with both their hands, and turne the string first with both their hands within, and then one arme after the other out. Though it be ne- uer so cold, they will wash themselves in cold water or in warme. These Gentiles will eate no flesh nor kill any thing. They liue with rice, butter, milke, and fruits. They pray in the water na- ked, and dyesse their meat & eate it naked, and for their penance they lie flat vpon the earth, and rise vp and turne themselves about 30. or 40. times, and vse to heaue by their hands to the sunne, & to kill the earth with their armes and legs stretched along out, and their right leg alwayes befoze the left. Euery time they lie downe, they make a scoze on the ground with their finger to know when their stint is finished. The Bramanes marke themselves in the foreheads, eares and throates with a kind of yelow geare which they grind, & euery morning they do it. And they haue some old men which go in the streetes with a boxe of yelow powder, and marke men on their heads & necks as they meet them. And their wines do come by 10. 20. & 30. together to the water side singing, & there do wash themselves, & then vse their ceremonies, & marke themselves in their foreheads and faces, and carie some with them, and so depart singing. Their daughters be married, at, or befoze the age of 10. yeeres. The men may haue 7. wiues. They be a kind of craftie people, worse then the Iewes. When they salute one another, they heaue by their hands to their heads, and say Rame, Rame. From Agra I came to Prage, where the riuer Iemena entrench into the mightie riuer Gan- ges, and Iemena loofeth his name. Ganges commeth out of the Northwest, & runneth East into the

the gulfe of Bengala. In those parts there are many Tigers and many partridges & turtle-doues, and much other foule. Here be many beggers in these countreies which goe naked, and the people make great account of them: they call them Schesché. Here I sawe one which was a monster among the rest. He would haue nothing vpon him, his beard was very long, and with the haire of his head he couered his priuities. The nailes of some of his fingers were two inches long, for he would cut nothing from him, neither would he speake. He was accompanied with eight or tenne, and they spake for him. When any man spake to him, he would lay his hand vpon his brest and bowe himselfe, but would not speake. Hee would not speake to the king. We went from Prage downe Ganges, the which is here very broad. Here is great store of fish of sundry sorts, & of wild foule, as of swannes, geese, cranes, and many other things. The countrey is very fruitfull and populous. The men for the most part haue their faces shauen, and their heads very long, except some which bee all shauen saue the crowne: and some of them are as though a man should set a dish on their heads, and shauē them round, all but the crowne. In this riuier of Ganges are many Islands. His water is very sweete and pleasant, and the countrey adioyning very fruitfull. From thence wee went to Bannaras which is a great towne, and great store of cloth is made there of cotton, and Shalies for the Moores. In this place they be all Gentiles, and be the greatest idolaters that euer I sawe. To this towne come the Gentiles on pilgrimage out of farre countreys. Here alongst the waters side bee very many faire houses, and in all of them, or for the most part they haue their images standing, which be euill fauoured, made of stone and wood, some like lions, leopards, and monkeis, some like men & women, and peacocks, and some like the deuil with foule armes and 4 hands. They sit crosse legged, some with one thing in their hands, & some another, & by breake of day and before, there are men & women which come out of the towne and wash themselves in Ganges. And there are diuers old men which vpon places of earth made for the purpose, sit praying, and they giue the people three or foure straws, which they take & hold them betweene their fingers when they wash themselves: and some sit to marke them in the foreheads, and they haue in a cloth a litle Rice, Barlie, or money, which, when they haue washed themselves, they giue to the old men which sit there praying. After wards they go to diuers of their images, & giue them of their sacrifices. And when they giue, the old men say certaine prayers, and then is all holy. And in diuers places there standeth a kind of image which in their language they call Ada. And they haue diuers great stones carued, whereon they poure water, & throw therevpon some rice, wheate, barley, and some other things. This Ada hath foure hands with clawes. Moreover, they haue a great place made of stone like to a well with steppes to goe downe; wherein the water standeth very foule and stinketh: for the great quantitie of flowers, which continually they throwe into it, doe make it stinke. There be alwayes many people in it: for they say when they wash themselves in it, that their sinnes be forgiven them, because God, as they say, did wash himselfe in that place. They gather by the land in the bottome of it, and say it is holy. They neuer pray but in the water, and they wash themselves ouer head, and lade by water with both their hands, and turne themselves about, and then they drinke a litle of the water three times, and so goe to their gods which stand in those houses. Some of them will wash a place which is their length, and then will pray vpon the earth with their armes and legs at length out, and will rise vp and lie downe, and kisse the ground twentie or thirtie times, but they will not stirre their right foote. And some of them will make their ceremonies with fiftene or sixteene pots litle and great, and ring a litle bell when they make their mixtures tenne or twelue times: and they make a circle of water round about their pots and pray, and diuers sit by them, and one that reacheth them their pots: and they say diuers things ouer their pots many times, and when they haue done, they goe to their gods, and stroue their sacrifices which they thinke are very holy, and marke many of them which sit by, in the foreheads, which they take as a great gift. There come fittie and sometime an hundred together, to wash them in this well, and to offer to these idols.

They haue in some of these houses their idoles standing, and one sitteth by them in warme weather with a fanne to blowe winde vpon them. And when they see any company comming, they ring a litle bell which hangeth by them, and many giue them their almes, but especially those which come out of the countrey. Many of them are blacke and haue clawes of bzallie with long nayles, and some ride vpon peacocks and other foules which be euill fauoured, with long haukes bills, and some like one thing and some another, but none with a good face. Among the rest there is one which they make great account of: for they say hee giueth them all things both foode and apparell, and one sitteth alwayes by him with a fanne to make wind towards him. Here some bee burned to ashes, some scorched in the fire and throwen into the water, and dogges and fores doe presently eate them. The wiues here doe burne with their husbands when they die, if they will not, their heads be shauen, and neuer any account is made of them afterward.

Bannaras.

A pilgrimage of the Gentiles.

The people goe all naked save a litle cloth bound about their middle. Their women haue their necks, armes and eares decked with rings of silver, copper, tinne, and with round hoopcs made of Turpie, adorned with amber stones, and with many agats, and they are marked with a great spot of red in their foreheads, and a stroke of red by to the crowne, and so it runneth three maner of wayes. In their Winter, which is our May, the men weare quilted gownes of cotton like to our mattresses and quilted caps like to our great Grocers morters, with a slit to looke out at, and so tied downe beneath their eares. If a man or a woman be sicke and like to die, they will lay him befoze their idols all night, and that shall helpe him or make amende of him. And if he do not mend that night, his friends will come and sit with him a litle and cry, and afterwards will cary him to the waters side and set him vpon a litle raft made of reeds, and so let him goe downe the riuer. When they be married the man and the woman come to the water side, and there is an olde man which they call a Bramane, that is, a pyist, a cowe, and a calfe, or a cowe with calfe. Then the man and the woman, cowe and calfe, and the olde man goe into the water together, and they giue the olde man a white cloth of foure yards long, and a basket crosse bound with diuers things in it: the cloth hee laicth vpon the backe of the cowe, and then he taketh the cowe by the ende of the taile, and laicth certaine wordes: and she hath a copper or a brasse pot full of water, and the man doeth hold his hand by the olde mans hand, and the wifes hand by her husbands, and all haue the cowe by the taile, and they poure water out of the pot vpon the cowes taile, and it runneth through all their hands, and they lade vp water with their handes, and then the olde man doeth tie him and her together by their clothes. Which done, they goe round about the cowe and calfe, and then they giue somewhat to the poore which be alwayes there, and to the Bramane or pyist they giue the cowe and calfe, and after ward goe to diuers of their idoles and offer money, and lie downe flat vpon the ground and kisse it diuers times, and then goe their way. Their chiefe idoles bee blacke and euill fauoured, their nouehes monstrous, their eares gilded, and full of iewels, their teeth and eyes of gold, silver, and glasse, some hauing one thing in their handes, and some another. You may not come into the houses where they stand, with your shoes on. They haue continually lampes burning befoze them. From Bahnaras I went to Patenaw downe the riuer of Ganges: where in the way we passed many faire townes, and a countrey very fruitfull: and many very great riuers doe enter into Ganges, and some of them as great as Ganges, which cause Ganges to bee of a great breadth, and so broad that in the time of raine you cannot see from one side to the other. These Indians when they bee scorched and thowen into the water, the men swimme with their faces downewards, the women with their faces upwards, I thought they tied something to them to cause them to doe so: but they say no. There be very many thienes in this countrey, which be like to the Arabians: for they haue no certaine abode, but are sometime in one place and sometime in another. Were the women bee so decked with silver and copper, that it is strange to see, they vse no shoes by reason of the rings of silver and copper which they weare on their toes. Here at Patenaw they finde gold in this maner. They digge deepe pits in the earth, and wash the earth in great bolles, and therein they finde the gold, and they make the pits round about with bzicke, that the earth fall not in. Patenaw is a very long and a great towne. In times past it was a kingdom, but now it is vnder Zelabdim, Echebar the great Mogor. The men are tall and slender, and haue many old folks among them: the houses are simple, made of earth and couered with strawe, the streetes are very large. In this towne there is a trade of cotton, & cloth of cotton, much sugar, which they cary from hence to Bengala and India, very much Opium & other commodities. He that is chiefe here vnder the king is called Tipperdas, and is of great account among the people. Here in Patenaw I saw a dissembling prophet which sat vpon an horse in the market place, and made as though he slept, and many of the people came and touched his feete with their handes, and then killed their handes. They tooke him for a great man, but sure he was a litle lubber. I left him there sleeping. The people of these countries be much giuen to such prating and dissembling by hypocrites.

This tyng of new married folks together by the clothes, was vsed by the Mexicans in old time.

Gold found.

Tanda ill Gouren

From Patenaw I went to Tanda which is in the land of Gouren. It hath in times past bene a kingdom, but now is subdued by Zelabdim Echebar. Great trade and traffique is here of cotton, and of cloth of cotton. The people goe naked with a litle cloth bound about their waste. It standeth in the countrey of Bengala. Here be many Tigers, wild Buis, and great stoze of wilde foule: they are very great idolaters. Tanda standeth from the riuer Ganges a league, because in times past the riuer flowing ouer the bankes, in time of raine did drowne the countrey and many villages, and so they do remaine. And the old way which the riuer Ganges was wont to run, remaineth drie, which is the occasion that the citie doeth stand so farre from the water. From Agra downe the riuer Iemena, and downe the riuer Ganges, I was siue moneths coming to Bengala, but it may be sailed in much shorter time.

I went from Bengala into the countrey of Couche, which lieth 25. dayes iourney Northwards from Tanda. The king is a Gentile, his name is Suckel Counse: his countrey is great, and lieth not far from Cauchin China: for they say they haue pepper from thence. The port is called Cachegate. All the countrey is set with Bambos or Canes made sharpe at both the endes & driuen into the earth, and they can let in the water & drowne the ground about knee deepe, so that men nor horses can passe. They poison all the waters if any wars be. Here they haue much silke & muske, and cloth made of cotton. The people haue eares which be maruailous great of a span long, which they draw out in length by deuises when they be yong. Here they be all Gentiles, and they will kill nothing. They haue hospitals for sheepe, goates, dogs, cats, birds, & for all other liuing creatures. When they be old & lame, they keepe them vntill they die. If a man catch or buy any quicke thing in other places & bring it thither, they wil giue him mony for it or other victuals, & keepe it in their hospitals or let it go. They wil giue meat to the Anes. Their smal mony is almonds, which oftentimes they vse to eat. From thence I returned to Hugeli, which is the place where the Portugals keep in the countrey of Bengala which standeth in 23. degrees of Northerly latitude, and standeth a league from Saragan: they call it Porto Piqueno. We went through the wilderness, because the right way was full of thienes, where we passen the countrey of Gouren, where we found but few villages, but almost all wilderness, & saw many buffes, swine & deere, grasse longer then a man, and very many Tigers. Not far from Porto Piqueno south westward, standeth an haueu which is called Angeli, in the countrey of Orixa. It was a kingdom of it selfe, & the king was a great friend to strangers. Afterwards it was taken by the king of Patan which was their neighbour, but he did not enjoy it long, but was taken by Zelabdim Echebar, which is king of Agra, Delli, & Cambaia. Orixa standeth 6. daies iourney from Saragan south westward. In this place is very much Rice, and cloth made of cotton, & great store of cloth which is made of grasse, which they call Yerva, it is like a silke. They make good cloth of it which they send for India & diuers other places. To this haueu of Angeli come euery yere many ships out of India, Negaparan, Sumatra, Malacca, and diuers other places; & lade from thence great store of Rice, & much cloth of cotton woodd, much sugar, & long pepper, great store of butter & other victuals for India. Satagam is a faire citie for a citie of the Moores, and very plentifull of all things. Here in Bengala they haue euery day in one place or other a great market which they call Chandeau, and they haue many great boats which they call pericofe, where withall they go from place to place and buy Rice and many other things: these boates haue 24. or 26. oares to rowe them, they be great of burthen, but haue no couerture. Here the Gentiles haue the water of Ganges in great estimation, for having good water nere them, yet they will fetch the water of Ganges a great way off, and if they haue not sufficient to drinke, they will sprinkle a litle on them, and then they thinke themselves well. From Saragam I travelled by the countrey of the king of Tippiara or porto Grande, with whom the Mogores or Mogen haue almost continuall warres. The Mogen which be of the kingdom of Recon and Rame, be stronger then the king of Tippiara, so that Chatigan or porto Grande is oftentimes vnder the king of Recon.

There is a countrey 4. daies iourne from Couche or Quichen before mentioned, which is called Bottanter and the citie Bortia, the king is called Dermain; the people whereof are very tall and strong, and there are marchants which come out of China, & they say out of Muscouia or Tartarie. And they come to buy muske, cambrals, agars, silke, pepper and saffron like the saffron of Persia. The countrey is very great, 3. moneths iourney. There are very high mountains in this countrey, & one of them so steep that when a man is 6. daies tourney off it, he may see it perfectly. Upon these mountains are people which haue eares of a spanne long: if their eares be not long, they call them apes. They say that when they be vpon the mountaines, they see ships in the Sea sayling to and fro; but they know not from whence they come, nor whether they go. There are marchants which come out of the East, they say, from vnder the sunne, which is from China, which haue no beards, and they say there it is something warme. But those which come from the other side of the mountains which is from the North, say there it is very cold. These Northen merchants are apparelled with woollen cloth and hats, white hosen close, and bootes which be of Moscouia or Tartarie. They report that in their countrey they haue very good horses, but they be litle: some men haue foure, five, or sixe hundred horses and kine: they liue with milke and fleshe. They cut the taitles of their kine, and sell them very deere, for they bee in great request, and much esteemed in those partes. The haire of them is a yard long, the rumpe is about a spanne long: they vse to hang them for hauerie vpon the heades of their Elephants: they bee much vled in Pegu and China: they buie and sell by scopes vpon the ground. The people be very swiffe on foote.

From Chatigan in Bengala, I came to Bacola; the king whereof is a Gentile, a man

Couche: this seemeth to be Quichen, accounted by some among the provinces of China very well disposed and delighteth much to shoot in a gun. His countrey is very great and fruitful, and hath store of Rice, much cotton cloth, and cloth of silke. The houses be very faire and high builded, the streetes large, the people naked, except a litle cloth about their waste. The women weare great store of siluer hoopes about their neckes and armes, and their legs are ringed with siluer and copper, and rings made of elephants teeth.

Serrepore.

From Bacola I went to Serrepore which standeth vpon the riuer of Ganges, the king is called Chondery. They be all here about rebels against their king Zebaldim Echebar: for here are so many riuers & Islands, that they flee from one to another, whereby his hoysmen cannot peneaile against them. Great store of cotton cloth is made here.

Sinnergan.

Sinnergan is a towne six leagues from Serrepore, where there is the best and finest cloth made of cotton that is in all India. The chiefe king of all these countries is called Isacan, and he is chiefe of all the other kings, and is a great friend to all Christians. The houses here, as they be in the most part of India, are very litle, and couered with strawe, and haue a fewe mats round about the wals, and the dooze to keepe out the Tygers and the Foxes. Many of the people are very rich. Here they will eate no flesh, nor kill no beast: they liue of Rice, milke, and fruits. They goe with a litle cloth before them, and all the rest of their bodies is naked. Great store of Cotton cloth goeth from hence, and much Rice, wherewith they serue all India, Ceilon, Pegu, Malacca, Sumatra, and many other places.

Sundina Island

I went from Serrepore the 28. of Nouember 1586. for Pegu in a small ship of foist of one Albert Caruallos, and so passing downe Ganges, and passing by the Island of Sundina, porto Grande, of the countrie of Tippera, the kingdom of Recon and Mogen, leauing them on our left side with a faire wind at Northwest: our course was South & by East, which brought vs to the barre of Negrais in Pegu: if any contrary wind had come, we had thowen many of our things ouer-board: for we were so pestered with people & goods, that there was scant place to lie in. From Bengala to Pegu is 90. leagues. We entred the barre of Negrais, which is a braue barre & hath 4. sadomes water where it hath least. Thre dayes after we came to Cosmin, which is a very pretie towne, and standeth very pleasantly, very well furnished with all things. The people be very tall & well disposed; the women white, round faced, with litle eyes: the houses are high built, set vpon great high postes, & they go vp to them with long ladders for feare of the Tygers which be very many. The countrey is very fruitful of all things. Here are very great Figs, Oranges, Cocones, and other fruits. The land is very high that we fall withall, but after we be entred the barre, it is very lowe and full of riuers, for they goe all too and fro in boates, which they call paroes, and keepe their houses with wife and childzen in them.

Medon.

From the barre of Nigrais to the citie of Pegu is ten dayes iourney by the riuers. We went from Cosmin to Pegu in Paroes or boates, and passing by the riuers we came to Medon, which is a pretty towne, where there be a wonderfull number of Paroes, for they keepe their houses and their markets in them all vpon the water. They rowe too and fro, and haue all their marchandizes in their boates with a great Sombbrero or shadow ouer their heads to keepe the sunne from them, which is as broad as a great cart wheele made of the leaues of the Coco trees and fig trees, and is very light.

Dela.

From Medon we went to Dela, which is a very faire towne, and hath a faire port into the sea, from whence go many ships to Malacca, Mecca, and many other places. Here are 18. or 20. very great and long houses, where they tane and keep many elephants of the kings: for there about in the wilbernesse they catch the wilde elephants. It is a very fruitfull countrey. From Dela we went to Cirion, which is a good towne, and hath a faire port into the sea, whither come many ships from Mecca, Malacca, Sumatra, and from diuers other places. And there the ships staie and discharge, & send vp their goods in Paroes to Pegu. From Cirion we went to Macao, which is a pretie towne, where we left our boats or Paroes, & in the morning taking Delinge ges, which are a kind of Coches made of coyds & cloth quilted, & caried vpon a stang betweene 3. or 4. men: we came to Pegu the same day. Pegu is a citie very great, strong, and very faire, with walles of stone, and great ditches round about it. There are two townes, the old towne and the newe. In the olde towne are all the marchants strangers, and very many marchants of the countrey. All the goods are sold in the olde towne which is very great, and hath many suburbs round about it, and all the houses are made of Canes which they call Bambos, and bee couered with strawe. In your house you haue a Warehouse which they call Godon, which is made of hycke to put your goods in, for oftentimes they take fire and burne in an houre foure or fife hundred houses: so that if the Godon were not, you should bee in danger to haue all burned, if any winde should rise, at a trice. In the newe towne is the king, and all his Nobilitie and Generie. It is a citie very great and populous, and is made square and with very faire walles, and a great ditch round.

round about it full of water, with many crocodiles in it : it hath twenty gates, and they bee made of stone, for euery square fūe gates. There are also many Turrets for Centinels to watch, made of wood, and gilded with golde very faire. The streets are the fairest that euer I saw, as straight as a line from one gate to the other, and so broad that tenne or twelue men may ride a front thowow them. On both sides of them at euery mans doore is set a palmer tree which is the nut tree, which make a very faire shew and a very commodious shadow, so that a man may walke in the shade all day. The houses be made of wood, and couered with tiles. The kings house is in the middle of the city, and is walled and ditched round about : and the buildings within are made of wood very sumptuously gilded, and great workmanship is vpon the forefront, which is likewise very costly gilded. And the house wherein his Pagode or idole standeth is couered with tiles of siluer, and all the walles are gilded with golde. Within the first gate of the kings house is a great large roome, on both sides whereof are houses made for the kings elephants, which be maruellous great and faire, and are brought by to warres and in seruice of the king. And among the rest he hath foure white elephants, which are very strange and rare : for there is none other king which hath them but he : if any other king hath one, hee will send vnto him for it. When any of these white elephants is brought vnto the king, all the merchants in the city are commanded to see them, and to giue him a present of halfe a ducat, which doth come to a great summe : for that there are many merchants in the city. After that you haue giuen your present you may come and see them at your pleasure, although they stand in the kings house. This king in his title is called the king of the white elephants. If any other king haue one, and will not send it him, he will make warre with him for it : for he had rather lose a great part of his kingdome, then not to conquere him. They do very great seruice vnto these white elephants ; euery one of them standeth in an house gilded with golde, and they doe scede in vessels of siluer and gilt. One of them when he doth go to the riuer to be washed, as euery day they do, goeth vnder a canopy of cloth of golde or of silke carried ouer him by sixe or eight men, and eight or ten men goe before him playing on drummes, shawmes, or other instruments : and when he is washed and cometh out of the riuer, there is a gentelman which doth wash his feet in a siluer basin : which is his office giuen him by the king. There is no such account made of any blacke elephant, be he neuer so great. And surely there be woonderfull faire and great, and some be nine cubites in height. And they do report that the king hath about fūe thousand elephants of warre, besides many other which be not taught to fight. This king hath a very large place wherein he taketh the wilde elephants. It standeth about a mile from Pegu, builded with a faire court within, and is in a great groue of wood : and there be many huntinen, which go into the wildernesse with the elephants : for without the the they are not to be taken. And they be taught for that purpose : and euery hunter hath fūe or sixe of them : and they say that they anoint the the elephants with a certaine ointment, which when the wild elephant doth smell, he will not leaue her. When they haue brought the wilde elephant neere vnto the place, they send word vnto the towne, and many horsemen and footmen come out and cause the the elephant to enter into a strait way which doeth goe to the palace, and the he and he do runne in : for it is like a wood : and when they be in, the gate doth shut. Afterward they get out the female : and when the male seeth that he is left alone, he weepeth and crieth, and runneth against the walles, which be made of so strong trees, that some of them doe breake their teeth with running against them. Then they picke him with sharpe canes, & cause him to go into a strait house, and there they put a rope about his middle and about his feet, and let him stand there thre or foure dayes without eating or drinking : and then they bring a female to him, with meat and drinke, and within few dayes he becommeth tame. The chiefe force of the king is in these elephants. And when they go into the warres they set a frame of wood vpon their backs, bound with great cordes, wherein sit foure or sixe men, which fight with gunnes, bowes and arrowes, darts and other weapons. And they say that their skinned are so thicke that a pellet of an harquebush will scarce pearce them, except it be in some tender place. Their weapons be very badde. They haue gunnes, but shoot very badly in them, darts and swordes short without points. The king keepeth a very great state : when he sitteth abroad as he doth euery day twise, all his noble men which they call Shemines sit on ech side, a good distance off, and a great guard without them. The Court yard is very great. If any man will speake with the king, he is to kneele downe, to heaue vp his hands to his head, and to put his head to the ground thre times, when he enureth in the middle way, and when he cometh neere to the king : and then he sitteth downe and talketh with the king : if the king like well of him, he sitteth neere him within thre or foure paces : if he thinke not well of him, he sitteth further off. When he goeth to warre, he goeth very strong. At my being there he went to Odia in the countrey of Siam with thre hundred thousand men, and fūe thousand elephants. Thirety thousand men were his guard. These people do eate roots, herbs, leaues, dogs, cats, rats, serpents, and snakes; they refuse almost nothing. When the king rideth abroad, he rideth with a great guard, and many noblemen, often-times vpon an elephant with a fine castle vpon him very fairely gilded with gold; and sometimes vpon a great frame like an houslitter, which hath a little house vpon it couered ouer head, but open on the sides, which is all gilded with golde, & set with many rubies & sapphires, wherof he hath infinite store in his country, and is caried vpon sixteen or eighteen mens shoulders. This coach in their language is called Serrion. Very great feasting and triumphing is many times befoze the king both of men and women. This king hath little force by Sea, because hee hath but very few ships. He hath houses full of golde and silver, and bringeth in often, but spendeth very little, and hath the mines of rubies and sapphires, and spinelles. Heere vnto the palace of the king, there is a treasure woonderfull rich; the which because it is so neere, he doth not account of it: and it standeth open for all men to see in a great walled court with two gates, which be alwayes open. There are foure houses gilded very richly, and couered with leade: in every one of them are Idagodes or images of huge stature and great value. In the first is the picture of a king in golde with a crowne of golde on his head full of great rubies and sapphires, and about him there stand foure chilszen of golde. In the second house is the picture of a man in silver woonderfull great, as high as an house; his foot is as long as a man, and he is made sitting, with a crowne on his head very rich with stones. In the third house is the picture of a man greater then the other, made of bzasse, with a rich crowne on his head. In the fourth and last house doth stand another, made of bzasse, greater then the other, with a crowne also on his head very rich with stones. In another court not farre from this stand foure other Idagodes, or idoles, maruellous great, of copper, made in the same place where they do stand; for they be so great that they be not to be remooued: they stand in foure houses gilded very faire, and are themselves gilded all ouer saue their heads, and they shew like a blacke Mozian. Their expences in gilding of their images are woonderfull. The king hath one wife and about thre hundred concubines, by which they say he hath fourefcore or fourefcore and ten children. He sitteth in iudgement almost every day. They vse no speech, but giue vp their supplications written in the leaues of a tree with the point of an yron bigger then a bodkin. These leaues are an elle long, and about two inches broad; they are also double. He which giueth in his supplication, doth stand in a place a little distance off with a present. If his matter be liked of, the king accepteth of his present, and granteth his request: if his sute be not liked of, he returneth with his present; for the king will not take it.

In India there are few commodities which serue for Pegu, except Opium of Cambaia, painted cloth of S. Thome, or of Masulipatan, and white cloth of Bengala, which is spent there in great quantity. They bring thither also much cotton, yarne red coloured with a root which they call Saia, which will neuer lose his colour: it is very wel sold here, and very much of it commeth yere to Pegu. By your mony you lose much. The ships which come from Bengala, S. Thome, and Masulipatan, come to the bar of Nigraia and to Cosmin. To Martauan a port of the sea in the kingdome of Pegu come many ships from Malacca laden with Sandall, Porcelanes, and other wares of China, and with Camphora of Borneo, and Pepper from Achen in Sumatra. To Cicion a port of Pegu come ships from Mecca with woollen cloth, Scarlets, Veluets, Opium, and such like. There are in Pegu eight Brokers, whom they call Tareghe, which are bound to sell your goods at the price which they be woorth, and you giue them for their labour two in the hundred: and they be bound to make your debt good, because you sell your merchandises vpon their word. If the Broker pay you not at his day, you may take him home, and keepe him in your house: which is a great shame for him. And if he pay you not presently, you may take his wife and children and his slaues, and binde them at your doore, and set them in the Sunne; for that is the law of the country. Their current mony in these parts is a kinde of bzasse which they call Gansa, wherewith you may buy golde, silver, rubies, muske, and all other things. The golde and silver is merchandise, and is worth sometimes more, and sometimes lesse, as other wares be. This bzassen mony doeth goe by a weight which they call a biza; and commonly this biza after our account is worth about halfe a crowne or somewhat lesse. The merchandise which be in Pegu, are golde, silver, rubies, sapphires, spinelles, muske, beniamin or frankincense, long pepper, rinae, leade, copper, lacca wherof they make hard ware, rice, and wine made of rice, and some sugar. The elephants doe eate the sugar canes, or els they would make very much. And they consume many canes likewise in making of their Dorellaes or Idole temples, which are in great number both great and small. They be made round like a sugar loafe, some are as high as a Church, very broad beneath, some a quarter of a mile in compass: within they be all earth done about with stone. They consume in these Dorellaes great quantity of golde; for that they be all gilded aloft: and many of them from the top to the bottome: and euery ten or twelue yeeres they must be new gilded, because the raine consumeth off the golde: for they stand open abroad. If they did not consume their golde in these vanities, it would be very plentiful and good cheape in Pegu. About two dayes journey from Pegu there is a Varelle or Pagode, which is the pilgrimage of the Pegues: it is called Dogonne, and is of a wonderfull bignesse, and all gilded from the foot to the topp. And there is an house by it wherein the Tallipoies which are their Priests doe preach. This house is five and fifty paces in length, and hath three pawnes or walks in it, and forty great pillars gilded, which stand betwene the walks; and it is open on all sides with a number of small pillars, which be likewise gilded: it is gilded with golde within and without. There are houses very faire round about for the pilgrims to lie in: and many goodly houses for the Tallipoies to preach in, which are full of images both of men and women, which are all gilded ouer with golde. It is the fairest place, as I suppose, that is in the world: it standeth very high, and there are foure wayes to it, which all along are set with trees of fruits, in such wise that a man may goe in the shade about two miles in length. And when their feast day is, a man can hardly passe by water or by land for the great presse of people; for they come from all places of the kingdom of Pegu thither at their feast. In Pegu they haue many Tallipoies or priests, which preach against all abuses. Many men resort vnto them. When they enter into their kiack, that is to say, their holy place or temple, at the doore there is a great farr of water with a cocke or a fable in it, and there they wash their feet; and then they enter in, and lift by their hands to their heads first to their preacher, and then to the Sunne, and so sit downe. The Tallipoies go very strangely apparelled with one camboline or thinne cloth next to their body of a browne colour, another of yellow doubled many times vpon their shoulter: and those two be girded to them with a broad girdle: and they haue a skinne of leather hanging on a string about their necks, whereupon they sit, bare headed & bare footed; for none of them weareth shooes; with their right armes bare and a great broad sombrero or shadow in their hands to defend them in the Summer from the Sunne, and in the Winter from the raine. When the Tallipoies or priests take their Orders first they go to schoole vntill they be twenty yeres olde or more, and then they come before a Tallipoie appointed for that purpose, whom they call Rowli: he is of the chiefest and most learned, and he opposeth them, and after ward examineth them many times, whether they will leaue their friends, and the company of all women, and take vpon them the habit of a Tallipoie. If any be content, then he rideth vpon a horse about the streets very richly apparelled, with drummes and pipes, to shew that he leauech the riches of the world to be a Tallipoie. In few dayes after, he is caried vpon a thing like an horliliter, which they call a serion, vpon ten or twelue mens shoulders in the apparell of a Tallipoie, with pipes and drummes, and many Tallipoies with him, and all his friends, and so they go with him to his house, which standeth without the towne, and there they leaue him. Euery one of them hath his house, which is very little, set vpon six or eight posts, and they go vp to them with a ladder of twelue or fouretee stauces. Their houses be for the most part by the hye wayes side, and among the trees, and in the woods. And they go with a great pot made of wood or fine earth, and couered, tied with a broad girdle vpon their shoulter, which connecth vnder their arme, wherewith they go to begge their victuals which they eate, which is rice, fish, and herbs. They demand nothing, but come to the doore, and the people presently doe giue them, some one thing, and some another: and they put all together in their pottle: for they say they must eate of their almes, and therewith content themselves. They keepe their feasts by the Poone: and when it is new Poone they keepe their greatest feast: and then the people send rice and other things to that kiack or church of which they be; and there all the Tallipoies doe meete which be of that Church, and eate the victuals which are sent them. When the Tallipoies do preach, many of the people carry them gifts into the pulpit where they sit and preach. And there is one which sitteth by them to take that which the people bring. It is diuided among them. They haue none other ceremonies nor seruice that I could see, but onely preaching.

I went from Pegu to Iamahey, which is in the countrey of the Langeiannes, whom we call Jangomes; it is five and twenty dayes journey North-east from Pegu. In which journey I passed many fruitfull and pleasant countreys. The countrey is very lowe, and hath many faire riuers. The houses are very bad, made of canes, and couered with straw. There are many wilde buffes and elephants. Iamahey is a very faire and great towne, with faire houses of stone, well peopled, the streets are very large, the men very well set and strong, with a cloth about them, bare headed and bare footed: for in all these countreys they weare no shooes. The women be much fairer then those of Pegu. There in all these countreys they haue no wheat. They make some cakes of rice. Wither to Iamahey come many marchants out of China, and bring great store of muske, golde, siluer, and many other things of China worke. There is great store of victuals: they haue such plenty that they will not milke the buffes, as they doe in all other places.

Here is great store of copper and beniamin. In these countreys when the people be sicke they make a bow to offer meat vnto the diuell, if they escape: and when they be recovered they make a banquet with many pipes & drummes and other instruments, and dancing all the night, and their friends come and bring gifts, cocos, figges, arreceas, and other fruits, and with great dauncing and reioycing they offer to the diuell, and say, they giue the diuell to eat, and giue him out. When they be dancing and playing they will cry & hallow very loud; and in this sort they say they daine him away. And when they be sicke a Tallipoy or two euery night doth sit by them & sing, to please the diuell that he should not hurt them. And if any die he is caried vpon a great frame made like a tower, with a couering all gilded with golde made of canes caried with foureteene or sixteen men, with drummes and pipes and other instruments playing before him to a place out of the towne and there is burned. He is accompanied with all his friends and neighbours, all men: and they giue to the tallipoies or priests many mats and clorb: and then they returne to the house and there make a feast for two dayes: and then the wife with all the neighbours wiues & her friends go to the place where he was burned, and there they sit a certaine time add cry and gather the pieces of bones which be left vnburned and bury them, and then returne to their houses and make an end of all mourning. And the men and women which be neere of kin do haue their heads, which they do not vse except it be for the death of a friend: for they much esteeme of their haire.

place where the rubies and other precious stones are found.

Caplan is the place where they finde the rubies, saphires, and spinelles: it standeth six dayes journey from Aua in the kingdom of Pegu. There are many great high hills out of which they digge them. None may go to the pits but onely those which digge them.

In Pegu, and in all the countreys of Aua, Langeiannes, Siam, and the Bramas, the men weare bunches of little round balles in their priuy members: some of them weare two and some three. They cut the skin and so put them in, one into one side and another into the other side; which they do when they be 25 or 30 yeeres olde, and at their pleasure they take one or more of them out as they thinke good. When they be married the husband is for euery child which his wife hath, to put in one vntill he come to three and then no more: for they say the women doe desire them. They were inuented because they should not abuse the male sexe. For in times past all those countries were so giuen to that villany, that they were very scarce of people. It was also ordained that the women should not haue past three cubits of cloth in their nether clothes, which they binde about them; which are so strait, that when they go in the streets, they shew one side of the leg bare about the knee. The bunches aforesayd be of diuers sortes: the least be as big as a little walnut, and very round: the greatest are as big as a little hennes egge: some are of brasse and some of siluer: but those of siluer be for the king and his noble men. These are gilded and made with great cunning, and ring like a little bell. There are some made of leade, which they call Selwy because they ring but little: and these be of lesser price for the poorer sort. The king sometimes taketh his out, and giueth them to his noblemen as a great gift: and because he hath vsed them, they esteeme them greatly. They will put one in, and heale up the place in seven or eight dayes.

Anthony Galun-
no witnesseth of these balles.

The Bramas which be of the kings countrey (for the king is a Brama) haue their legs or bel- lies, or some part of their body, as they thinke good themselves, made black with certaine things which they haue: they vse to picke the skinne, and to put on it a kinde of anile or blacking, which doth continue alwayes. And this is counted an honour among them: but none may haue it but the Bramas which are of the kings kindred.

The people of
beards.

These people weare no beards: they pull out the haire on their faces with little pinsons made for that purpose. Some of them will let 16 or 20 haires grow together, some in one place of his face and some in another, and pulleth out all the rest: for he carrieth his pinsons alwayes with him to pull the haire out as soone as they appeare. If they see a man with a beard they wonder at him. They haue their teeth blacked both men and women, for they say a dogge hath his teeth white, therefore they will blacke theirs.

The Pegues if they haue a sute in the law which is so doubtfull that they cannot well deter- mine it, put two long canes into the water where it is very deepe: and both the parties go into the water by the poles, and there sit men to iudge, and they both do diue vnder the water, and he which remaineth longest vnder the water doth winne the sute.

Malacca.

The 10 of January I went from Pegu to Malacca, passing by many of the ports of Pegu, as Martauan, the Island of Taui, from whence commeth great store of tinne which seructh all India, the Islands of Tanaferi, Iunsalaon, and many others; and so came to Malacca the 8 of February, where the Portugals haue a castle which standeth nere the sea. And the countrey fast without the towne belongeth to the Malayos, which is a kinde of proud people. They go naked with a cloth about their middle, and a little roll of cloth about their heads. Whither come many ships from Chi- na & from the Malucos, Banda, Timor, and from many other Islands of the Iauas, which bring great great store of spices and drugs, and diamonds and other iewels. The voyages into many of these Islands belong vnto the captaine of Malacca : so that none may goe thither without his licence : which yeeld him great summies of money euery yeere. The Portugals heere haue often times warres with the king of Achem which standeth in the Island of Sumatra : from whence commeth great store of pepper and other spices euery yeere to Pegu and Mecca within the Red sea, and other places.

When the Portugals go from Macao in China to Iapan, they carry much white silke, golde, muske, and porcelanes : and they bring from thence nothing but siluer. They haue a great caracke which goeth thither euery yere, and she bringeth from thence euery yere aboute fife hundred thousand crusadoes : and all this siluer of Iapan, and two hundred thousand crusadoes moze in siluer which they bring yere out of India, they imploy to their great aduantage in China : and they bring from thence golde, muske, silke, copper, porcelanes, and many other things very costly and gilded. When the Portugals come to Canton in China to traffike, they must remaine there but certaine dayes : and when they come in at the gate of the city, they must enter their names in a booke, and when they goe out at night they must put out their names. They may not lie in the towne all night, but must lie in their boats without the towne. And their dayes being expired, if any man remaine there, they are euillblessed and imprisoned. The Chinians are very suspicious, and doe not trust strangers. It is thought that the king doth not know that any strangers come into his countrey. And further it is credibly reported that the common people see their king very seldom or not at all, nor may not looke vp to that place where he sitteth. And when he rideth abroad he is caried vpon a great chaire or serryon gilded very faire, wherein there is made a little house with a latise to looke out at : so that he may see them, but they may not looke vp at him : and all the time that he passeth by them, they heaue vp their hands to their heads, & lay their heads on the ground, and looke not vp vntill he be passed. The order of China is when they mourne, that they weare white thred shoes, and hats of straw. The man doth mourne for his wife two yeeres, the wife for her husband thre yeeres : the sonne for his father a yeere, and for his mother two yeeres. And all the time which they mourne they keepe the dead in the house, the bowels being taken out and filled with chownam or lime, and coffined : and when the time is expired they carry them out playing and piping, and burne them. And when they returne they pull off their mourning weeds, and marry at their pleasure. A man may keepe as many concubines as he will, but one wife onely. All the Chineans, Iaponians, and Cauchin Chineans do write right downwards, and they do write with a fine pensill made of dogs or cats haire.

Laban is an Island among the Iauas from whence come the diamonds of the New water. And they finde them in the riuers : for the king will not suffer them to digge the rocke.

Laban. Diamonds.

Iambas an Island among the Iauas also, from whence come diamonds. And the king hath a masse of earth which is golde : it groweth in the middle of a riuer : and when the king doth lacke gold, they cut part of the earth and melt it, whereof commeth golde. This masse of earth doth appeare but once in a yere : which is when the water is low : and this is in the moneth of April.

Bima is another Island among the Iauas, where the women travell and labour as our men do in England, and the men keepe house and go where they will.

Bima.

The 29 of March 1588, I returned from Malacca to Martauan, and so to Pegu, where I remained the second time vntill the 17 of September, and then I went to Cosmini, and there tooke shipping : and passing many dangers by reason of contrary windes, it pleased God that we arrived in Bengala in November following : where I stayed for want of passage vntill the third of February 1589, and then I shipped my selfe for Cochin. In which voyage we endured great extremity for lacke of fresh water : for the weather was extreme hote, and we were many merchants and passengers, and we had very many calmes, and hote weather. Yet it pleased God that we arrived in Ceylon the first of March, where we stayed fife dayes to water, and to furnish our selues with other necessary provision. This Ceylon is a braue Island, very fruitful & faire : but by reason of continuall warres with the king thereof, all things are very deare : for he will not suffer any thing to be brought to the castle where the Portugals be : wherefore often times they haue great want of victuals. Their provision of victuals commeth out of Bengala euery yere. The king is called Raia, and is of great force : for he commeth to Columbo, which is the place where the Portugals haue their fort, with an hundred thousand men, and many elephants. But they be naked people all of them ; yet many of them be good with their pieces which be muskets. When the king talketh with any man, he standeth vpon one legge, and setteth the other foot vpon his knee with his sword in his hand : it is not their order for the king to sit but to stand. His apparell is a fine painted cloth made of cotton wooll about his middle : his haire is long and bound vp with a little fine cloth about his head : all the rest of his body is naked. His guard are a thousand thousand men, which stand round about him, and he in the middle; and when he marcheth, many of them goe before him, and the rest come after him. They are of the race of the Chingalapes, which they say are the best kinde of all the Malabars. Their eares are very large; for the greater they are, the more honourable they are accounted. Some of them are a spanne long. The wood which they burne is Cinamom wood, and it smelleth very sweet. There is great store of rubies, sapphires, and spinelles in this Island: the best kinde of all be here; but the king will not suffer the inhabitants to digge for them, lest his enemies should know of them, and make warres against him, and so drue him out of his countrey for them. They haue no horses in all the countrey. The elephants be not so great as those of Pegu, which be monstrous huge: but they say all other elephants do feare them, and none dare fight with them, though they be very small. Their women haue a cloth bound about them from their middle to their knee: and all the rest is bare.

The eleuenth of March we sailed from Ceylon, and so doubled the cape of Comori. Not far from thence, betwene Ceylon and the maine land of Negaparan, they fish for prarles. And there is fished euer yere very much; which both serue all India, Cambaia, and Bengala, it is not so oziend as the pearle of Baharim in the gulf of Persia. From cape de Comori we passed by Coulam, which is a fort of the Portugals: from whence commeth great store of pepper, which commeth for Portugall: for oftentimes there lodeth one of the caracks of Portugall. Thus passing the coast we arrived in Cochin the 22 of March, where we found the weather warme, but scarcity of victuals: for here groweth neither corne nor rice: and the greatest part commeth from Bengala. They haue here very bad water, for the riuer is farre off. This bad water causeth many of the people to be like lepers, and many of them haue their legs swollen as bigge as a man in the waste, & many of them are scant able to go. These people here be Malabars, and of the race of the Naires of Calicut: and they differ much from the other Malabars. These haue their heads very full of haire, and bound up with a string: and there doth appeare a bush without the band wherewith it is bound. The men be tall and strong, and good archers with a long bow and a long arrow, which is their best weapon: yet there be some caluers among them, but they handle them badly.

Peere groweth the pepper; and it springeth by by a tree or a pole, and is like our iuy berry, but something longer like the wheat eare: and at the first the bunches are Greene, and as they waxe ripe they cut them off and dry them. The lease is much lesser then the iuy leaf and thinner. All the inhabitants here haue very little houses couered with the leaues of the coco-trees. The men be of a reasonable stature; the women litle; all blacke, with a cloth bound about their middle hanging downe to their hammes: all the rest of their bodies be naked: they haue horrible great eares with many rings set with pearles and stones in them. The king goeth incathed, as they do all; he doth not remaine in a place about fure or five dayes: he hath many houses, but they be but litle: his guard is but small: he remooueth from one house to another according to their order. All the pepper of Calicut and course cinamom groweth here in this countrey. The best cinamom doth come from Ceylon, and is pilled from fine poong trees. Here are very many palmer or coco trees, which is their chiefe food: for it is their meat and drinke: and yeldeth many other necessary things, as I haue declared before.

The Naires which be vnder the king of Samorin, which be Malabars, haue alwayes wars with the Portugals. The king hath alwayes peace with them; but his people goe to the sea to robbe & steale. Their chiefe captaine is called Cogi Alli; he hath three castles vnder him. When the Portugals complaine to the king, he sayth he doth not send them out: but he consenteth that they go. They range all the coast from Ceylon to Goa, and go by foure or five parowes or boats together; and haue in euery one of them fifty or threescore men, and boord presently. They do much harme on that coast, and take euer yere many foists and boats of the Portugals. Many of these people be Idolaters. This kings countrey beginneth twelue leagues from Cochin, and reacheth nere vnto Goa. I remained in Cochin untill the second of Nouember, which was eight moneths; for that there was no passage that went away in all that time: if I had come two dayes sooner I had found a passage presently. From Cochin I went to Goa, where I remained three dayes. From Cochin to Goa is an hundred leagues. From Goa I went to Chaul, which is threescore leagues, where I remained three and twenty dayes: and there making my prouision of things necessary for the shippe, from thence I departed to Ormus; where I stayed for a passage to Ballara fifty dayes. From Goa to Ormus is foure hundred leagues.

Here I thought good, before I make an end of this my booke, to declare some things which India and the countrey farther Eastward do bring forth.

The

The pepper groweth in many parts of India, especially about Cochin: and much of it doeth grow in the fields among the bushes without any labour: and when it is ripe they go and gather it. The shrubbe is like unto our ivy tree: and if it did not run about some tree or pole, it would fall downe and rot. When they first gather it, it is greene; and then they lay it in the Sun, and it becommeth blacke.

The white sandol is wood very sweet & in great request among the Indians; for they grinde it with a litle water, and anoynt their bodies therewith: it commeth from the Isle of Timor.

Camphora is a precious thing among the Indians, and is solde dearer then golde. I thinke none of it commeth for Christendome. That which is compounded commeth from China: but that which groweth in canes and is the best, commeth from the great Isle of Borneo.

The muske commeth out of Tartarie, and is made after this order, by report of the marchants which bring it to Pegu to sell; In Tartarie there is a litle beast like unto a yong roe, which they take in snares, and beat him to death with the blood: after that they cut out the bones, and beat the flesh with the blood very small, and fill the skin with it: and hereof commeth the muske.

Now to returne to my voyage; from Ormus I went to Balsara or Basora, and from Basora to Babylon: and we passed the most part of the way by the strength of men by halling the boat vpon the riuer with a long cord. From Babylon I came by land to Mosul, which standeth nere to Ninieue, which is all ruinated and destroyed; it standeth fast by the riuer of Tigris. From Mosul I went to Merdin, which is in the countrey of the Armenians; but now there dwell in that place a people which they call Cordies, or Curdi. From Merdin I went to Orsa, which is a very faire towne, and it hath a goodly fountaine ful of fish; where the Moores hold many great ceremonies and opinions concerning Abraham: for they say he did once dwell there. From thence I went to Bir, & so passed the riuer of Euphrates. From Bir I went to Aleppo, where I stayed certaine moneths for company; and then I went to Tripolis; where finding English shipping, I came with a prosperous voyage to London, where by Gods assistance I safely arrived the 29 of April 1591, hauing bene eight yeeres out of my native countrey.

The report of Iohn Huighen van Linschoten concerning M. Newberies and M. Fitches imprisonment, and of their escape, which happened while he was in Goa.

In the moneth of December, Anno 1583, there arrived in the towne and Island of Ormus foure English men, which came from Aleppo in the countrey of Syria, hauing sailed out of England, & passed thorow the straights of Gibraltar to Tripoli a towne and haue lying on the coast of Syria, where all the ships discharge their wares & merchandise, & from thence are caried by land vnto Aleppo, which is nine dayes iourny. In Aleppo there are resident diuers marchants & factours of all nations, as Italians, French men, English men, Armenians, Turks and Moores, euery man hauing his religion apart, paying tribute vnto the great Turke. In that towne there is great traffique, for that from thence euery yeere twise, there trauell two Caffys, that is, companies of people and camels, which trauell vnto India, Persia, Arabia, and all the countreys bordering on the same, and deale in all sortes of merchandise, chandise, both to and from those countreys, as I in another place haue already declared. Three of the sayd English men aforesayd, were sent by the company of English men that are resident in Aleppo, to see if in Ormus they might keepe any factours, and so traffique in that place, like as also the Italians do, that is to say, the Venetians which in Ormus, Goa, and Malacca haue their factours, and traffique there, as well for stones and pearles, as for other wares and spices of those countreys, which from thence are caried over land into Venice. One of these English men had bene once before in the sayd towne of Ormus, and there had taken good information of the trade, and vpon his aduise and aduertisement, the other were as then come thither with him, bringing great store of marchandises with them, as Clothes, Saffron, all kinde of drinking glasses, and Haberdashers wares, as looking glasses, knives, and such like stuffe: and to conclude, brought with them all kinde of small wares that may be deuised. And although those wares amounted vnto great summes of money, notwithstanding it was but onely a shadow or colour, thereby to giue no occasion to be mistrusted, or scene into: for that their principall intent was to buy great quantities of precious stones, as Diamants, Pearles, Rubies, &c. to the which end they brought with them a great summe of money and golde, and that very secretly, not to be deceiued or robbed thereof, or to ruine into any danger for the same. They being thus arrived in Ormus, hired a shoppe, and beganne to sell their wares: which the Italians perceiuing, whose factours continue there (as I sayd before) and fearing that those English men finding good vent for their commodities in that place, would be resident therein, and so daily increase, which would be no small losse and hinderance vnto them, did presently inuent all the subtille meanes they could to hinder them: and to that end they went vnto the Captaine of Ormus, as then called Don Gonzalo de Meneles, telling him that there were certaine English men come into Ormus, that were sent onely to spie the countrey; and sayd further, that they were heretikes: and therefore they sayd it was conuenient they should not be suffered so to depart, without being examined, and punished as enemies, to the example of others. The Captaine being a friend vnto the English men, by reason that one of them which had bene there before, had giuen him certaine presents, would not be perswaded to trouble them, but shipped them with all their wares in a shippe that was to saile for Goa, and sent them to the Viceroy, that he might examine and trie them, as he thought good: where when they were arrived, they were cast into prison, and first examined whether they were good Christians or no: and because they could speake but badde Portugall, onely two of them spake good Dutch, as hauing bene certaine yeres in the Low countreys, and there trafficked, there was a Dutch Iesuite bozne in the towne of Bruges in Flanders, that had bene resident in the Indies for the space of thirty yers, sent vnto them, to vndermine and examine them: wherein they behaued themselves so well, that they were holden and esteemed for good and Catholike Christians: yet still suspected, because they were strangers, and specially English men. The Iesuites still tolde them that they should be sent prisoners into Portugall, wishing them to leaue off their trade of marchandise, and to become Iesuites, promising them thereby to defend them from all trouble. The cause why they sayd so, and perswaded them in that earnest manner, was, for that the Dutch Iesuite had secretly bene aduertised of great summes of money which they had about them, and sought to get the same into their fingers, for that the first bozne and promise they make at their entrance into their Order, is, to procure the welfare of their sayd Order, by what meanes soeuer it be. But although the English men denied them, and refused the Order, saying, that they were unfit for such places; neuertheless they proceeded so farre, that one of them, being a Painter (that came with the other three for company, to see the countreys, and to seeke his fortune, and was not sent thither by the English merchants) partly for feare, and partly for want of meanes to relieue himselfe, promised them to become a Iesuite: and although they knew and well perceiued he was not any of those that had the treasure, yet because he was a Painter, wherof there are but few in India, and that they had great need of him to paint their Church, which otherwise would cost them great charges, to bring one from Portugall, they were very glad thereof, hoping in time to get the rest of them with all their money into their fellowship: so that to conclude, they made this Painter a Iesuite, where he continued certaine dayes, giuing him good store of worke to doe, and entertaining him with all the fauour and friendship they could deuise, and all to winne the rest, to be a pray for them: but the other three continued still in prison, being in great feare, because they vnderstood no man that came to them, nor any man almost knew what they sayd: till in the end it was tolde them that certaine Dutch men dwelt in the Archbishops house, and counsell giuen them to send vnto them, wherat they much reioyced, and sent to me and an other Dutch man, desiring vs once to come and speake with them, which we presently did, and they with teares in their eyes made complaint vnto vs of their hard vsage, shewing vs from point to point (as it is sayd before) why they were come into into the countrey, withall desiring vs for Gods cause, if we might by any meanes, to helpe them, that they might be set at libertie vpon sureties, being ready to endure what iustice should ordaine for them, saying, that if it were found contrarie, and that they were other then traouelling marchants, and sought to finde out further benefit by their wares, they would be content to be punished. With that we departed from them, promising them to do our best: and in the end we obtained so much of the Archbishop, that he went vnto the Viceroy to deliuer our petition, and perswaded him so well, that he was content to set them at libertie, and that their goods should be deliuered vnto them againe, vpon condition they should put in sureties for two thousand pardawes, not to depart the countrey before other order should be taken with them. Thereupon they presently found a Citizen of the towne that was their surety for two thousand pardawes, to whom they payed in hand one thousand and three hundred pardawes, and because they sayd they had no moze ready money, he gaue them credit, seeing what store of marchandise they had, whereby at all times if need were, he might be satisfied: and by that meanes they were deliuered out of prison, and hired themselves an house, and beganne to set open shoppe: so that they vntered much ware, and were presently well knowne among all the marchants, because they alwayes respected gentlemen, specially such as bought their wares, shewing great courtelie and honour vnto them, whereby they woon much credit, and were beloved of all men, so that euery man fauoured them, and was willing to doe them pleasure. To vs they shewed great friendship, for whose sake the Archbishop fauoured them much, and shewed them very good countenance, which they knew well how to increase, by offering him many presents, although he would not receiue them, neither would euer take gift or present at any mans hands. Likewise they behaued themselves so discreetly that no man caried an euill eye; no, nor an euill thought towards them. Which liked not the Iesuites, because it hindered them from that they hoped for, so that they ceased not still by this Dutch Iesuite to put them in feare, that they should be sent into Portugall to the King, counselling them to yeeld themselves Iesuites into their Cloister, which if they did, he sayd they would defend them from all troubles, saying further, that he counselled them therein as a friend, & one that knew for certaine that it was so determined by the Viceroyes Priuy councill: which to effect he sayd they staye but for shipping that should saile for Portugall, with diuers other perswasions, to put them in some feare, and so to effect their purpose. The English men to the contrary, durst not say any thing to them, but answered, that as yet they would stay a while, and consider thereof, thereby putting the Iesuites in comfort, as one among them, being the principall of them (called Iohn Newbery) complained vnto me often times, saying that he knew not what to say or thinke therein, or which way he might be ridde of those troubles: but in the end they determined with themselves to depart from thence, and secretly by meanes of other friends they imploied their money in precious stones; which the better to effect, one of them was a Jeweller, and for the same purpose came with them. Which being concluded among them, they durst not make knowne to any man, neither did they credit vs so much, as to shew vs their mindes therein, although they tolde vs all whatsoever they knew. But on a Whit Sunday they went abroad to sport themselves about three miles from Goa, in the mouth of the river in a countrey called Bardes, hauing with them good store of meate and drinke. And because they should not be suspected, they left their house and shoppe, with some wares therein vsolde, in custody of a Dutch boy, by vs prouided for them, that looked vnto it. This boy was in the house not knowing their intent, and being in Bardes, they had with them a Patamar, which is one of the Indian postes, which in the Winter times carrieth letters from one place to the other, whom they had hired to guide them: and because that betwene Bardes and the firme land there is but a little river, in a manner halfe drie, they passed ouer it on foot, and so trauelled by land, being neuer heard of againe: but it is thought they arrived in Aleppo, as some say, but they know not certainly. Their greatest hope was that Iohn Newbery could speake the Arabian tongue, which is vsed in all those countreys, or at the least vnderstood; for it is very common in all places thereabouts, as French with vs. Jewes being come to Goa, there was a great stirre and murmuring among the people, and we much woondered at it: for many were of opinion, that we had giuen them counsell so to do; and presently their surety seised vpon the goods remaining, which might amount vnto aboue two hundred pardawes; and with that and the money he had receiued of the English men, he went vnto the Viceroy, and deliuered it vnto him: which the Viceroy hauing receiued, forgane him the rest. This flight of the English men grieved the Iesuites most, because they had lost such a pryze, which they made sure account of: wherupon the Dutch Iesuite came to vs to aske vs if we knew thereof, saying, that if he had suspected so much, he would haue dealt otherwise, for that he sayd, he once had in his hands of theirs a bagge wherein was forty thousand venseanders (each venseander being two pardawes) which was when they were in prison. And that they had alwayes put him in comfort to accomplish his desire : vpon the which promise he gaue them their money againe, which otherwise they should not so lightly haue come by, or peradventure neuer, as he openly sayd : and in the end he called them hereticks, and spies, with a thousand other railing speeches, which he vttered against them. The English man that was become a Iesuite, hearing that his companions were gone, and perceiving that the Iesuites shewed him not so great fauour, neither bled him so well as they did at the first, repented himselfe; and seeing he had not as then made any sollemne promise, and being counselled to leane the house, and tolde that he could not want a living in the towne, as also that the Iesuites could not keepe him there without he were willing to stay, so they could not accuse him of anything, he tolde them flatly that he had no desire to stay within the Cloister. And although they bled all the meanes they could to keepe him there, yet he would not stay, but hired an house without the Cloister, and opened shoppe, where he had good store of worke : and in the end married a Melizos daughter of the towne, so that he made his account to stay there while he liued. By this English man I was instructed of all the wayes, trades, and voyages of the countrey, betweene Aleppo and Ormus, and of all the ordinances and common customes which they vsually holde during their voyage ouer the land, as also of the places and townes where they passed. And since those English mens departures from Goa, there neuer arriued any strangers, either English or others, by land, in the sayd countrey, but onely Italians which daily traffique ouer land, and vse continuall trade going and coming that way.

The voyage of M. John Eldred to Tripolis in Syria by sea, and from thence by land and riuer to Babylon and Bassara. 1583.

Departed out of London in the ship called the Tiger, in the company of M. John Newbery, M. Ralph Fitch, and six or seuen other honest marchants vpon Shrove munday 1583, and arriued in Tripolis of Syria the first day of May next ensuing : at our landing we went on Maying vpon S. Georges Island, a place where Christians dying aboard the ships, are wont to be buried. In this city our English marchants haue a Consull, and our nation abide together in one house with him, called Fondoghi Ingles, builded of stone, square, in maner like a Cloister, & euery man hath his seuerall chamber, as it is the vse of all other Christians of seuerall nations. This towne standeth vnder a part of the mountaine of Libanus two English miles distant from the port : on the side of which port, trending in some of an halfe Doone, stand five blockhouses or small forts, wherein is some very good artillery, and the forts are kept with about an hundred Janisaries. Right before this towne from the seaward is a banke of mouing sand, which gathereth and increaseth with the Westerne winds, in such sort, that, according to an olde prophesie among them, this banke is like to swallow vp & ouerwhelme the towne : for euery yere it increaseth and eateth vp many gardens, although they vse all policy to diminish the same, and to make it firme ground. The city is about the bignesse of Bilow, and walled about, though the walles be of no great force. The chiefe strength of the place is in a Citadel, which standeth on the South side within the walles, and ouerlooketh the whole towne, and is strongly kept with two hundred Janisaries and good artillery. A riuer passeth thorow the midst of the city, where with they water their gardens and mulberry trees, on which there grow abundance of silke wormes, where with they make great quantity of very white silke, which is the chiefe naturall commodity to be found in and about this place. This rode is more frequented with Christian marchants, to wit, Venetians, Genouois, Florentines, Parisians, Sicilians, Raguses, and lately with English men, then any other port of the Turks dominions. From Tripolis I departed the 14 of May with a carauan, passing three dayes ouer the ridge of mount Libanus, at the end whereof we arriued in a city called Hammah, which standeth on a goodly plaine replenished with corne & cotton wooll. On these mountaines which we passed grow great quantity of gall trees, which are somewhat like our oaks, but lesser and more crooked : on the best tree a man shall not finde aboue a pound of galles. This towne of Hammah is fallen and falleth more and more to decay, and at this day there is scarce one halfe of the wall standing, which hath bene very strong and faire : but because it cost many mens liues to win it, the Turke will not haue it repaired ; and hath written in the Arabian tongue ouer the castle gate, which standeth in the midst of the towne, these words : Cursed be the father and the sonne that shall lay their hands to the repairing hereof. Refreshing our selues one day here, we passed forward with camels three dayes more untill we came to Aleppo, where we arriued the 21 of May. This is the greatest place of traffique for a dry towne that is in all those parts : for hither resort Iewes, Tartarians, Persians, Armenians, Armenians, Egyptians, Indians, and many sorts of Christians, and injoy freedome of their consciences, and bring thither many kinds of rich marchandises. In the midst of this towne also standeth a goodly castle raised on high, with a garison of foure or five hundred Janisaries. With in foure miles round about are goodly gardens and vineyards and trees, which beare goodly fruit nere vnto the riuers side, which is but small; the walles are about three English miles in compasse, but the suburbs are almost as much more. The towne is greatly peopled. We departed from thence with our camels the last of May with M. John Newbery and his company, and came to Birrah in three dayes, being a small towne situated vpon the riuer Euphrates, where it beginneth first to take his name, being here gathered into one chanell, whereas before it cometh downe in manifold branches, and therefore is called by the people of the countrey by a name which signifieth a thousand heads. Here is plenty of victuals, wherof we all furnished our selues for a long iourney downe the aforesayd riuer. And according to the maner of those that trauell downe by water, we prepared a small barke for the conueyance of our selues and of our goods. These boats are flat bottomed, because the riuer is shallow in many places: and when men trauell in the moneth of Iuly, August, and September, the water being then at the lowest, they are constrained to cary with them a spare boat or two to lighten their owne boats, if they chance to fall on the sholds. We were eight and twenty dayes vpon the water betweene Birrah and Felugia, where we disimbarcked our selues and our goods. Euery night after the Sunn setteth, we tie our barke to a stake, go on land to gather sticks, and set on our pot with rice or brused wheat, and hauing supped, the marchants lie aboord the barke, and the mariners vpon the shores side as nere as they can vnto the same. In many places vpon the riuers side we met with troops of Arabians, of whom we bought milke, butter, egges, and lambs, and gaue them in barter, (for they care not for money) glasses, combes, corall, amber, to hang about their armes and necks, and for churmed milke we gaue them bread and pomegranat peeles, wherewith they vse to tanne their goats skinnes which they churme withall. Their haire, apparell, and colour are altogether like to those vagabond Egyptians, which heretofore haue gone about in England. Their women all without exception ware a great round ring in one of their nostrils, of golde, silver, or yron, according to their ability, and about their armes and smalles of their legs they haue hoops of golde, silver or yron. All of them as wel women and childzen as men, are very great swimmers, and often times swimming they brought vs milke to our barke in vessels vpon their heads. These people are very theuish, which I proued to my cost: for they stole a casket of mine, with things of good value in the same, from vnder my mans head as he was asleepe: and therefore travellers keepe good watch as they passe downe the riuer. Euphrates at Birrah is about the breadth of the Thames at Lambeth, and in some places narrower, in some broader: it runneth very swiftly, almost as fast as the riuer of Trent: it hath diuers sorts of fish in it, but all are scaled, some as bigge as salmons, like barbits. We landed at Felugia the eight and twentieth of Iune, where we made our abode seven dayes, for lacke of camels to cary our goods to Babylon: the heat at that time of the yere is such in those parts, that men are loth to let out their camels to trauell. This Felugia is a village of some hundred houses, and a place appointed for discharging of such goods as come downe the riuer: the inhabitants are Arabians. Not finding camels here, we were constrained to vnlade our goods, and hired an hundred asses to cary our English marchandises onely to New Babylon ouer a short desert, in crossing whereof we spent eightene hours traueilling by night, and part of the morning, to auoid the great heat.

The ruines of olde Babylon.

New Babylon. The riuer Tigris.

In this place which we crossed ouer, stood the olde mighty city of Babylon, many olde ruines wherof are easily to be seene by day-light, which I John Eldred haue often beheld at my good leasure, hauing made three voyages betweene the new city of Babylon and Aleppo ouer this desert. Here also are yet standing the ruines of the olde tower of Babel, which being vpon a plaine ground seemeth a faire offery great, but the nerer you come to it, the lesser and lesser it appeareth: sundry times I haue gone thither to see it, and found the remnants yet standing about a quarter of a mile in compasse, and almost as high as the stone-woke of Pauls steeple in London, but it sheweth much bigger. The bricks remaining in this most ancient monument be halfe a yard thicke, and three quarters of a yard long, being dyed in the Sunne onely, and betweene euery course of bricks there lieth a course of mattes made of canes, which remaine sound and not perished, as though they had bene layed within one yere. The city of New Babylon liyeth vpon the aforesayd small desert where the Olde city was, and the riuer of Tigris runneth close vnder the wall, and they may if they will open a sluice, and let the water of the same riuer round about the towne. It is about two English miles in compasse, and the inhabitants generally speake three languages, to wit, the Persian, Arabian and Turkish tongues: the people are of the Spaniards complexion: and the women generally weare in one of the grilles of their noses a ring like a wedding ring, but somewhat greater, with a pearle and a Turkish stone set therein: and this they do be they neuer so poore.

This is a place of very great traffique, and a very great showfare from the East Indies to Aleppo. The towne is very well furnished with victuals which come downe the riuer of Tigris from Mosul which was called Ninue in olde time. They bring these victuals and diuers sorts of marchandises upon rafts bozne upon goats skins blowne by ful of wind in maner of bladders. And when they haue discharged their goods, they set the rafts for fire, and let the wind out of their goats skins, and carry them home againe upon their asses by land, to make other voyages downe the riuer. The building here is most of bricke dried in the Sun, and very little or no stone is to be found: their houses are all flat-roofed and low. They haue no rain for eight moneths together, nor almost any clouds in the skie, night nor day. Their Winter is in Nouember, December, Ianuary and February, which is as warme as our Summer in England in a maner. This I know by good experience, because my abode at seuerall times in this city of Babylon hath bene at the least the space of two yeres. As we come to the city, we passe over the riuer of Tigris on a great bridge made with boats chained together with two mighty chaines of yron. From thence we departed in flat bottomed barks more strong & greater then those of Euphrates, and were eight and twenty dayes also in passing downe this riuer to Balsara, but we might haue done it in eightene or lesse, if the water had bene higher. Upon the waters side stand by the way diuers townes resembling much the names of the olde prophets: the first towne they call Ozeah, & another Zecchiah. Before we come to Balsara by one dayes iourney, the two riuers of Tigris and Euphrates meet, and there standeth a castle called Curna, kept by the Turks, where all marchants pay a small custome. Here the two riuers ioyned together begin to be eight or nine miles broad: here also it beginneth to ebbe and flow, and the water overflowing maketh the countrey all about very fertile of coigne, rice, pulse, and dates. The towne of Balsara is a mile and an halfe in circuit: all the buildings, castle and wals are made of bricke dried in the Sun. The Turke hath here five hundred Janisaries, besides other souldiers continually in garison and pay, but his chiefe strength is of gallies which are about five and twenty or thirty very faire and furnished with goodly ordinance. To this port of Balsara come monethly diuers ships from Ormuz, laden with all sorts of Indian marchandise, as spices, drugs, Indico, and Calcut cloth. These ships are usually from forty to theefscore tonnes, hauing their planks sowed together with coide made of the barke of Date trees, and in stead of Decau they vse the shuerings of the barke of the sayd trees, and of the same they also make their tackling. They haue no kinde of yron worke belonging to these vessels, save only their ankers. From this place six dayes sailing downe the gulfes, they go to a place called Baharem in the mid way to Ormus; there they fish for pearles foure moneths in the yere, to wit, in Iune, Iuly, August, and September. My abode in Balsara was iust six moneths, during which time I receiued diuers letters from M. Iohn Newbery from Ormus, who as he passed that way with her Maiesties letters to Zelabdim Echebar king of Cambaia, & vnto the mighty emperour of China, was traitorously there arrested, and all his company, by the Portugals, and afterward sent prisoner to Goa: where after a long and cruell imprisonment he and his companions were deliuered upon sureties, not to depart the towne without leaue, at the sute of one father Thomas Steuens an English religious man, which they found there: but shortly after thzee of them escaped, whereof one, to wit, M. Ralph Fitch, is since come into England. The fourth, which was a painter called Iohn Story, became religious in the college of S. Paul in Goa, as we vnderstood by their letters. I and my companion William Shales hauing dispatched our businesse at Balsara, imbarked our selues in company of seuentie barks all laden with marchandise, hauing euery barke 14 men to draw them, like our Westerne bargemen on the Thames, and we were forty foure dayes coming by against the streame to Babylon, where arriuing and paying our custome, we with all other sorts of marchants bought vs camels, hired vs men to lade and driue them, furnished our selues with rice, butter, bisket, hony made of dates, onions and dates: and euery marchant bought a proportion of liue muttons, and hired certaine shepheards to driue them with vs: we also bought vs tents to lie in, and to put our goods vnder: and in this our carauan were foure thousand camels laden with spices and other rich marchandises. These camels will liue very well two or thzee dayes without water: their feeding is on thistles, worme-wood, magralue, and other strong weeds which they finde vpon the way. The gouernment and deciding of all quarels and dueties to be payed, the whole carauan committeth to one speciall rich marchant of the company, of whose honesty they conceiue best. In passing from Babylon to Aleppo, we spent forty dayes, traouelling twenty, or foure and twenty miles a day, resting our selues commonly from two of the clocke in the afternoone, vntil thzee in the moyning, at which time we begin to take our iourney. towne called Heir, as we crosse the riuer Euphrates by boates, about 3. miles from the town there is a balley wherein are many springs throwing out abundantly at great mouths, a kind of blacke substance like unto tarre, which serueth all the countrey to make stanch their barks and boates: euery one of these springs maketh a noise like unto a Smiths forge in the blowing & puffing out of this matter, which neuer ceaseth night nor day, and the noise may be heard a mile off continually. This vale swalloweth vp all beauiie things that come vpon it. The people of the countrey call it in their language Babil gehenham, that is to say, Hell dooze. As we passed through these deserts, we saw certaine wild beasts, as wild asses all white, Roebucks, wolves, leopards, fores, and many hares, whereof we chased and killed many. Aborise the king of the wandring Arabians in these deserts, hath a dutie of 40. s. sterling, vpon euery Camels lode, which he sendeth his officers to receiue of the Carauans, and in consideration hereof, he taketh vpon him to conduct the sayd Carauans if they need his helpe, and to defend them against certaine prowling thieues. I and my companion William Shales came to Aleppo with the Carauan the eleuenth of June, 1584. where we were ioyfully receiued 20. miles distant from the town by M. William Barret our Consull, accompanied with his people and Janissaries, who fell sicke immediately and departed this life within 8. dayes after, and elected before his death M. Anthonie Bare Consul of our English nation in his place, who laudably supplied the same roome 3. yeeres. In which meane time, I made two voyages more vnto Babylon, and returned by the way aforesayd, ouer the deserts of Arabia. And afterwards, as one desirous to see other parts of the countrey, I went from Aleppo to Antioch, which is thence 60. English miles, and from thence went downe to Tripolis, where going aboard a small vessel, I arriued at Ioppe, and trauelled to Rama, Lyeia, Gaza, Jerusalem, Bethleem, to the riuer of Jordan, and the sea or lake of Zedome, and returned backe to Ioppe, & from thence by sea to Tripolis, of which places because many others haue published large discourses, I surcease to write. Within few dayes after imbarcking my selfe at Tripolis the 22. of December, I arriued (God be thanked) in safety here in the riuer of Thames with diuers English marchants, the 26. of March, 1588. in the Hercules of London, which was the richest ship of English marchants goods that euer was knowen to come into this realme.

The money and measures of Babylon, Balsara, and the Indies, with the customes, &c. written from Aleppo in Syria, An. 1584. by M. Will. Barret.

BABYLON:

The weight, measure, and money currant there, and the customes of merchandize.

Amana of Babylon is of Aleppo 1 route 5 ounces and a halfe: and 68 manas and thre seuenth parts, make a quintall of Aleppo, which is 494 li. 8 ounces of London: and 100 manas is a quintall of Babylon, which maketh in Aleppo 146 routes, and of London 722 li. and so much is the sayd quintall: but the marchants accord is by so much the mana, and in the sayd place they bate the tare in all sorts of commodities, according to the order of Aleppo touching the tare.

The measure of Babylon is greater then that of Aleppo 21 in y 100. If oz bringing 100 pikes of any measurable ware from Aleppo thither, there is found but 82 pikes in Babylon, so that the 100 pikes of Babylon is of Aleppo 121 pikes, very little lesse.

The currant mony of Babylon are Sales, which Say is 5 medines, as in Aleppo, and 40 medines being 8 Sales make a duckat currant, and 47 medines passe in value as the duckat of gold of Venice, and the dollars of the best sort are worth 33 medines. The roials of plate are sold by the 100 drams at prise, according as they be in request: but amongst the marchants they bargain by the 100 metrais, which are 150 drams of Aleppo, which 150 drams are 135 single roials of plate: but in the mint of castile, they take the by the 100 drams, which is 90 roials of plate, and those of the mint giue 5 medines lesse in each 100 drams then they are woorth to be sold among the marchants, and make payment at the terme of 40 dayes in Sayes.

The custome in Babylon, as wel inward as outward, is in this manner: Small wares at 6 per 100, Cozal and amber at 5 and a halfe per 100, Venice cloth, English cloth, Kerlies, Hockars, Chamblets, Silks, Veluets, Damasks, Sattins & such like at 5 per 100: & they rate the goods without reason as they lust themselves. The Coaso, Doabo, and other exactions 6 medines per bale, all which they pay presently in ready mony, according to the custome and vse of the emperor.

To the Ermin of the mine y ordinarie vse is to giue 30 Sales in curtessie, otherwise he would by authoritie of his office come aboard, & for despight make such search in the barke, that he would turne all things topsie turvie.

BALSARA:

The weight, measure, and money in the citie of Balsara.

A Mana of Balsara answereth 5 rouses 2 ounces & a halfe of Aleppo weight, & 19 manas and one 4 part of Balsara, answereth the quintall of Aleppo, which is 494 reues, 8 ounces English, and 20 manas is the quintall of Balsara, which is 104 Alepine, and of London 514 li. 8 ounces, and so much is the sayd quintall, but the marchants bargaine at so much the mana or wolsene (which is all one) and they abate the tare in euery mana, as the sort of spice is, and the order taken therefore in that place.

The measure of Balsara is called a pike, which is iust as the measure of Babylon, to say, 100 pikes of Balsara make of Aleppo 121 pikes, vt supra in the rate of Babylon.

The currant mony of Balsara is as foloweth. There is a sort of flusses of copper called Estiui, whercof 12 make a mamedine, which is the value of one medine Aleppine, the said mamedine is of siluer, hauing the Hoysesco stampe on both sides, and two of these make a danine, which is 2 medines Aleppine.

The said danine is of siluer, hauing the Turkesco stampe on both sides, & 2 and a halfe of these make a Saie, which is in value as the Saie of Aleppo.

The said Saie is of the similitude and stampe of Aleppo, bring (as appeares) 60 estiuies. Also one Say and 20 estiuies make a larine, which is of Aleppo money 6 medines and a halfe.

The sayd larine is a strange piece of money, not being round as all other currant money in Christianitie, but is a small rod of siluer of the greatnesse of the pen of a goose feather, wherewith we vse to write, and in length about one eight part thereof, which is wrested, so that the two ends meet at the iust halfe part, and in the head thereof is a stampe Turkesco, and these be the best currant money in all the Indias, and 6 of these larines make a duckat, which is 40 medines or eight Saies of Aleppo.

The duckat of gold is woorth there 7 larines, and one danine, which is of Aleppo money 48 medines and a halfe.

The Venetian money is woorth larines 88 per 100 meticals, which is 150 drams of Aleppo, vt supra.

The roials of plate are woorth 88 larines by the 100 meticals, & albeit among the marchants they sel by the 100 meticals, yet in the mint or caille, they sel by the 100 drams, hauing there lesse then the woorth 5 medines in each hundred drams, and haue their payment in 40 dayes made them in Saies or larines.

The custome of the said places, as well in ward as out ward, are alike of all sorts of goods, to say 6 by the 100, and Toaso, Boabo, & scruian medines 6 by the bale in ward & out ward, to say, 3 in ward, and as much out ward: but who so leaueth his goods in the custome house paieeth nothing, where otherwise at the taking thereof away, he should pay 3 med. by the bale, and of the said goods there is no other duty to pay, and this commeth to passe whē the customers esteeme the goods too high. For in such a case they may be diuē to take so much commoditie as the custome amounteth to, and not to pay them in money, for such is the order from the Grand Signior.

Hauing paid the custome, it behoueth to haue a quittance or cocket sealed and firmē with the customers hand, in confirmatiō of the dispatch and clearing, and before departure thence, to cause the sayd customer to cause search to be made, to the end that at the voyages returne there be no cāuillation made, as it oftentimes happeneth.

Note that 100 meticals of Balsara weigh 17 ounces and a halfe sottile Venetian, and of Aleppo drams 150, vt supra.

The freight of the barkes from Ormuz to Balsara, I would say from Balsara to Ormuz, they pay according to the greatnesse thereof. To say, for cariage of 10 cares 180 larines, those of 15 cares 270 larines, those of 20 cares 360 larines, those of 30 cares 540 larines. Note that a care is 4 quintals of Balsara. They pay also to the pilot of the barke for his owne cariage one care, and to all the rest of the mariners amongst them 3 cares freight, which is in the whole 4 cares, and paying the abovesayd pyses and freights, they are at no charges of victuals with them, but it is requisite that the same be declared in the charter partie, with the condition that they lade not aboord one rottilo more then the freight, vnder paines that finding more in Ormuz, it is forfeit, and besides that to pay the freight of that which they haue laden.

And in this accord it behoueth to deale warilie, and in the presence of the Ermin or some other honest man (whercof there are but few) for they are the worst people in all Arabia. And this diligence must be put in executiō, to the end the barks may not be ouerladen, because they are to passe many sands betwixt Balsara and Ormuz,

ORMVZ:

The weight, measure, and money currant in the kingdom of Ormuz:

Spices and drugs they weigh by the bar, and of euery sort of goods the weight is different. To say, of some drugs 3 quintals, and 3 erubi or roues, and other some 4 quintals 25 rottiloes, and yet both is called a barre, which barre, as well great as litle, is 20 frafoli, and euery frafoli is 10 manas, and euery mana 23 chianli, and euery chianli 10 meticals and a halfe. Note that euery quintall maketh 4 erubi or roues, and euery roue 32 rottiloes, & euery rottilo 16 ounces, and euery ounce 7 meticals, so that the quintall commeth to be 128 rottiloes, which is Aleppine 26 rottiloes and one third part, which is 132 li. english weight. And contrarywise 1 quintal of Aleppo (which is 494 rottiloes 8 ounces english) maketh 477 rottiloes and a halfe of Ormuz, which is 3 quintals 2 roues, 29 rottiloes and a halfe.

What a rottilo is.

Note that there are bars of diuers weights, vt supra, of which they bargain simply, according to the sort of commoditie, but if they bargain of the great barre, the same is 7 quintals and 24 rottiloes, which is 958 li. 9 ounces of London weight, and of Aleppo 193 rottiloes and a halfe.

Touching the money of Ormuz, they bargain in marchandize at so many leches by the barre, which lech is 100 Alaries, and maketh laries 100 & a halfe, which maketh pardaos 38, & laries one halfe, at laries 5 by the pardao. One alarie is sadines 10, and euery sadine is 100. danatic.

The larine is worth 5 sadines and one fourth part, so that the sadine is worth of Aleppo money 1 medine and 1 fourth part, & the larine as in Balsara worth of Aleppo money 6 medines & a half.

The pardao is 5 laries of Balsara.

There is also stamped in Ormuz a seraphine of gold, which is litle and round, and is worth 24 sadines, which maketh 30 medunes of Aleppo.

The Venetian money is worth in Ormuz laries 88 per 100 meticals, & the roials are worth laries 86 lesse one sadine, which is euery thousand meticals, 382 asures: but those that will not sel them, vse to melt them, and make them so many laries in the king of Ormuz his mint, where by they cleare 2 per 100, and somewhat more: and this they doe because neither Venetian money nor roials run as currant in Ormuz, per aduise.

The measure of Ormuz is of 2 sorts, the one called codo which increaseth vpon the measure of Aleppo 3 per 100, for bringing 100 pikes of any measurable wares from Aleppo to Ormuz, it is found in Ormuz to be 103 codes. Also these measures of Ormuz increafe vpon those of Balsara and Babylon 25 and two third parts per 100: for bringing 100 pikes of any measurable wares from Balsara or Babylon, there is found in Ormuz 125 codes and two third parts.

The other measure is called a vare, which was sent from the king of Portugall to the India, by which they sell things of small value, which measure is of 5 palmes or spans, and is one code and two third parts, so that buying 100 codes of any measurable wares, and returning to measure it by the sayd vare, there are found but 60 vares, contrarywise 100 vares make 166 codes and two third parts.

Note that al such ships as lade hozes in Ormuz for Goa or any other place of India, lading 10 hozes or vponwards, in what places soeuer the said hozes be taken a hozie in the India, the marchandize which is to be discharged out of that ship wherein the said hozes come, are bound to pay no custome at all, but if they lade one hozie lesse then ten, then the goods are bound to pay the whole custome. And this law was made by Don Emanuel king of Portugall, but it is to be diligently forseeene, whither all those hozes laden be bound to pay the king his custome: for many times by the king of Portugall his commandement, there is fauour shewed to the king of Cochin his brother in armes, so that his hozes that come in the same ship, are not to answere custome. As for example: If there were 4 hozes laden in one ship, all which were to pay custome to the king, and one other of the king of Cochins which were not to pay any custome, the same cauleth all the marchandize of that ship to be subiect to pay custome, per aduise. But if they lade ten hozes vpon purpose to pay the king his custome in Goa, and in the voyage any of them should die in that case, if they bring the taile of the dead hozie to the custome in Goa, then the marchandize is free from all custome, because they were laden in Ormuz to pay custome in Goa. Moreover, if the hozes should die before the midst of the voyage, they pay no custome at all, and if they die in the mids of the voyage, then they pay halfe custome, but if any hozie die after the mid voyage, they pay custome no lesse then if they arrive safe. Notwithstanding, the marchandize (whether the said hozes die before or in the mid voyage or after the mid voyage) are free from all custome.

The custome of Ormuz is eleuen in the 100, to say, 10 for the king, and 1 for the arming of the foists: but for small wares as glasses, and looking glasses of all sorts, and such like, made for apparell, pay no custome. But cloth of Wooll, Karkies, Hockaires, Chamlets, and all sortes of Silke, Silke, Saffron, and such like, pay custome, being esteemed reasonably.

There is also another custome, which they call caida, which is, that one bringing his goods into Ormuz, with purpose to send y^e same further into India, the same are bound to pay 3 by the 100, but none other are bound to pay this custome, except the Armenians, Moores, and Iewes: for the Portugals and Venerians pay nothing thereof.

Note y^e in Ormuz they abate tace of all sorts of commodities, by an order obserued of custome. The freight from Ormuz to Chaul, Goa, and Cochin, is as followeth: Pokaires larines 6 per table of 60 pikes, Aquariosa 8 larines by ordinarie chist, ratlins 10 by chist, which is a quintall of rouses 128. Ruuia of Chalangi larines 10 per quintall, glasses larines 8 per chist, of 4 foote and a halfe, glasses in great chists 14 & 15 larines by chist. Small wares larines 12 by chist of five foot. Tamaris for Palchat ladines 2 and a half, and 3 by the fardle. Tamaris for Diu and Chaul 4 ladines, and 4 and a halfe by bale. Other drugs and things which come from Persia pay according to the greatnesse of the bales.

The freight mentioned, they pay as appeareth, when they ship the sayd goods in ships where horses goe: otherwise, not hauing horses, they pay somewhat lesse, because of the custome which they are to pay.

The vse of the India ships is, that the patrones thereof are not at any charge neither with any passenger, nor yet with any mariner in the ship, but that euery one at the beginning of the voyage doe furnish to maintaine his owne table (if he will eate) and for drinke they haue a great iarre of water, which is garded with great custodie.

GOA.

The weight, measure, and money currant in Goa.

The quintall of Goa is 5 manas, and 8 larines, & the mana is 24 rotulos, so that the quintall of Goa is 128 rot. and euery rot. is 16 ounces, which is of Venice weight 1 li. and a halfe, so that the quintall of Goa is 192 li. foule Venice, which is 26 rotulos 8 ounces Aleppine, and of London weight 132 li. English, as the weight of Ormuz.

All the marchandize, spices and drugs, are sold by this quintal, except some drugs, as lignū de China, Galanga, & others, whereof they bargain at so much per candill, aduertising that there be two sorts of candill, one of 16 manas, the other of 20 manas, that of 16 manas commeth to be iust 3 quintals, and that of 20 manas, 3 quintals, 3 rouses. Note that 4 rouses make a quintall, and the rouse is 32 rotulos, as in Ormuz.

There is also another weight which they call Barco, which is eight ounces or halfe a rotulo of Goa, & 9 ounces of Venice foule: with this they weigh amber, corail, muske, ambacan, ciuet, and other fine wares.

There is also another sort of weight called Hangiallino, which is 5 graines of Venice weight and therewith they weigh diamants and other iewels.

Note that in Goa they vse not to abate any tare of any goods, except of sacks or wraps, & therefore it requireth great aduilement in buying of the goods, especially in the muske of Tartaria which commeth by way of China in bladders, and so weigh it without any tare rebating.

The measure of Goa is called a code, which encreaseth vpon the measure of Babylon & Balsara after the rate of 17 & one eight part by the 100, so that bringing 100 pikes of any measurable ware from thence to Goa, it is found 117 pikes 7 eight parts, and bringing 100 codes from Ormuz to Goa, there is found but 93 codes and one fourth part.

There is also the vare in Goa, which is iust as the vare of Ormuz, and therewith they measure onely things that are of small value.

For the mony of Goa, there is a kind of mony made of lead and tin mingled, being thicke and round, and stamped on the one side with the sphere or globe of the world, and on the other side two arrowes & 5 rounds: and this kind of mony is called Basaruchi, and 15 of these make a vinton of naughty mony, and 5 vintons make a tanga, and 4 vintenas make a tanga of bale money: so that the tanga of bale money is 60 basaruchies, and the tanga of good mony 75 basaruchies, & 5 tangas make a seraphine of gold, which in marchandize is worth 5 tangas good mony: but if one would change them into basaruchies, he may haue 5 tangas, and 16 basaruchies, which ouerplus they call ceratagio, & when they bargain of the pardaw of gold, each pardaw is ment to be 6 tangas good mony, but in marchandize they vse not to demaund pardawes of gold in Goa, except it be for iewels and horses, for all the rest they take of seraphins of silver, per aduiso.

The roials of plate, I say, the roial of 8 are worth per custome & commandement of the king of Portugall 400 reies, and euery rey is one basaruchie & one fourth part, which maketh tangas 6, and and 53 bazaruchies as their iust value, but for that the said roials are excellent silver and currant in diuers places of the India, and chiefly in Malacca, where the ships are to depart at their due times (called Monsons) every one to haue the said roials pay more then they are worth, & the ouerplus, as is aboue said they call serafagio. And first they giue $\frac{1}{2}$ iust value of the 100 roials of 8, at 5 tangas 50 bazaruchies a piece, which done, they giue seraphins 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 15, untill 22 by the 100, according as they are in request.

Note that 4 rouses make a quintall.

Shinke of Tartaria by y^e way of China.

The duckat of gold is worth 9 tangas and a halfe good money, and yet not stable in price, for that when the ships depart from Goa to Cochim, they pay them at 9 tangas and 3 fourth partes, and 10 tangas, and that is the most that they are worth.

The larines are worth by iust value bazaruchies 93 and 3 fourth partes, and 4 larines make a seraphine of silver, which is 5 tangas of good money, and these also haue serafagio of 6, 7, 8, 10, untill 16, by the 100, for when the ships depart for the North, to say, for Chaul, Diu, Cambaia, or Bassaim, all carry of the same, because it is money more currant then any other.

There is also a sort of seraphins of gold of the stampe of Ormuz, whereof there are but fewe in Goa, but being there, they are worth such larines and somewhat more, according as they are in request.

There is also another litle sort of money, round, hauing on the one side a crosse, and on the other side a crowne, which is worth one halfe a tanga of good money, and another of the same stampe lesse then that which they call Imicuo de buona moneda, which is worth 18 bazaruchies 3 fourth partes a piece.

Note that if a man bargain in marchandize, it behooueth to demaund tangas of good money: for by nominating tangas onely, is vnderstood to be base money of 60 bazaruchies, which wanteth of the good money vt supra.

The custome of Goa is 8 in the 100 inward, and as much outward, and the goods are esteemed iustly rather to the merchants aduantage then the kings. The custome they pay in this order. Comming with a ship from Ormuz to Goa without horses, they pay 8 in the 100 whether they sell part or all, but if they would carie of the sayd marchandize to any other place, they pay none other custome, except others buy it and carie it forth of the countrey, and then they pay it 8 in the 100. And if one hauing paid the custome should sell to another with composition to passe it forth as for his proper accounts to saue the custome, this may not be, because the seller is put to his oth, whether he send the goods for his owne account, or for the account of any others that haue bought the same, and being found to the contrary, they pay custome as aboue said. And in this order the merchants pay of all the goods which come from any part of the Indies. But if they come from Ormuz to Goa with horses, they are not subiect to pay any custome inward, notwithstanding if they send all or any part thereof for any other place, or returne it to Ormuz, they pay the custome outward, although they could not sell.

They vse also in Goa amongst the common sort to bargain for coales, wood, lime & such like, at so many bzaganines, accounting 24 bazaruchies for one bzaganine, albeit there is no such money stamped. The custome of the Portugals is, that any Moore or Gentile, of what condition or state soeuer he be, may not depart from Goa to go within the land, without licence of certaine deputies deputed for that office, who (if they be Moores or Gentiles) doe set a scale vpon the arme, hauing thereon the armes of Portugal, to be knowen of the porters of the citie, whether they haue the said licence or no.

COCHIN.

The weight, measure, and money, currant in Cochim.

ALl the marchandize which is sold or buy within the sayd citie, they bargain for it at so many serafines per quintal, which is 128, rottilos of iust weight with $\frac{1}{2}$ quintall & rottilos of Goa and Ormuz: aduertising that there are diuers sorts of bars according to the sorts of commodities, and in traffiquing, they reason at so much the bar. Note that there are bars of 3 quintals & 3 quintals and halfe, and 4 quintals. They abate a vled tare of all marchandize, according to the sort of goods, and order taken for the same.

The measure of Goa and Cochim are all one.

The money of Cochim are all the same sorts which are currant in Goa, but the duckat of gold in value is 10 tangas of good money.

The custome of Cochim as wel inward as outward for all strangers, is eight in the hundred, but those that haue bene married foure yeere in the countrey pay but foure in the hundred, per aduiso.

MALACCA.

The weight, measure, and money of Malacca.

For the marchandise bought and sold in the citie they reckon at so much the barre, which barre is of diuers sorts, great and small, according to the ancient custome of the said citie, & diuer sortie of the goods. But for the cloues they bargain at so much the barre, which barre is 3 quintals, 2 rouses and 10 rotilos. As I haue aboue said, all kind of drugs haue their sorts of barres limited. Note that euery quintal is 4 rouses, and euery rouse 32 rotilos, which is 128 rotilos the quintal, the which answereth to Aleppo 95 rotilos, and to London 472 li. per quintal.

The measures of Malacca are as the measures of Goa. In Malacca they abate tare according to their distinction and agreement, for that there is no iust tare limited.

For the money of Malacca, the least money currant is of tinne stamped with the armes of Portugall, and 12 of these make a Chazza.

The Chazza is also of tinne with the said armes, and 2 of these make a challaine.

The Challaine is of tinne with the said armes, and 40 of these make a tanga of Goa good money, but not stamped in Malacca.

There is also a sort of siluer money which they call Parachines, and is worth 6 tangas of good money, which is 360 reyes, and is stamped with two letters, S. T. which is S. Thomas on the one side, and the armes of Portugall on the other side.

There is also a kind of money called cruzados stamped with the armes of Portugall, & is worth 6 tangas good money, the farines are euery 9 of them worth 2 cruzados, which is 12 tangas good money, and these farines be of those which are stamped in Bassara and Ormuz.

The roials of 8 they call Pardaos de Reales, and are worth 7 tangas of good money.

The custome of Malacca is 10 in the 100 as wel inward as outward, and those which pay the custome inwards, if in case they send the same goods for any other place within terme of a yeere and a day, pay no custome for the same.

The times or seasonable windes called Monfons, wherein the ships depart from place to place in the East Indies.

NOte, that the Citie of Goa is the principall place of all the Orientall India, and the winter there beginneth the 15 of May with very great raine, and so continueth till the first of August, so that during that space, no shippe can passe over the barre of Goa, because through the continuall houres of raine all the sandes ioyne together neere unto a mountaine called Oghane, and all these sandes being ioynd together, runne into the shoales of the barre and port of Goa, and can haue no other issue, but to remaine in that port, and therefore it is shut vp untill the first of August, but at the 10 of August it openeth by reason of the raine which ceaseth, and the sea doeth then scoure the lands away againe.

The monson from Goa to the Northward, to say, for Chaul, Diu, Cambaia, Daman, Basaim, and other places.

The ships depart betwixt the tenth and 24 of August, for the Northward places aboue sayde, and to these places they may saile all times of the yeere, except in the winter, which beginneth and endeth at the times abovesaid.

The monson from the North parts, for Goa.

The ships depart from Chaul, Diu, Cambaia, and other places Northwards for Goa, betwixt the 8 and 15 of Januarie, and come to Goa about the end of Februarie.

The first monson from Diu for the straight of Mecca.

The ships depart from Diu about the 15 of Januarie, and returne from the straights to Diu in the moneth of August.

The second monson from Diu for the straight of Mecca.

The ships depart betwixt the 25 and first of September, and returne from the straights to Diu, the first and 15 of May.

The monson from Secutra for Ormus.

The ships depart about the tenth of August for Ormus: albeit Secutra is an Island and hath but few ships, which depart as abovesaid.

The monson wherein the Moores of the firme land come to Goa.

About the fifteenth of September the Moores of the firme land beginne to come to Goa, and they come from all parts, as well from Balaguete, Bezenegar, as also from Sudalcan, and other places.

The monson wherein the Moores of the firme land depart from Goa.

They depart from Goa betwixt the 10 and 15 day of November. Note that by going for the North is ment the departing from Goa, for Chaul, Diu, Cambaia, Daman, Basaim, Ghassain, and other places unto Zindi: and by the South is understood, departing from Goa, for Cochin, and all that coast unto Cape Comori.

The first monson from Goa for Ormus.

The shippes depart in the moneth of October from Goa, for Ormus, passing with Easterly windes along the coast of Persia.

The second monson from Goa to Ormus.

The ships depart about the 20 of Januarie passing by the like navigation and windes as in the first monson, and this is called of the Portugals and Indians Entremonson.

The third monson from Goa to Ormus.

The ships depart betwixt the 25 of March, and 6 of Aprill, hauing Easterly windes, till they passe Secutra, and then they find Westerly windes, and therefore they set their course ouer for the coast of Arabia, till they come to Cape Rasalgate and the straight of Ormus, and this monson is almost troublesome of all: for they make two navigations in the height of Seylan, which is 6 degrees and somewhat lower.

The first monson from Ormus for Chaul and Goa.

The ships depart from Ormus for Chaul, and Goa in the month of September, with North, and Northeast windes.

The second monson from Ormus for Chaul and Goa.

The second monson is betwixt the five and twentieth and last of December, with like winds as the former monson.

The third monson from Ormus for Chaul, and Goa.

The third monson the ships depart from Ormus, for Chaul and Goa, betwixt the first and 15 of April, and they saile with Southeast windes, East and Northeast windes, coasting upon the Arabia side from Cape Mosandon unto Cape Rasalgate, and having lost the sight of Cape Rasalgate, they haue Westerly windes, and so come for Chaul and Goa, and if the said ships depart not before the 25 of April, they are not then to depart that monson, but to winter in Ormus because of the winter.

The ships depart for Ormus betwixt the 15 and 20 of April.

The second monson from Ormus for Zindi.

The ships depart betwixt the 10 and 20 of October for Zindi from Ormus.

The monson from Ormus for the red sea.

The ships depart from Ormus betwixt the first and last of Januarie.

Hitherto I haue noted the monsons of the ships departing from Goa to the Northward: Now follow the monsons wherein the ships depart from Goa to the Southward.

¶ The monson from Goa for Calicut, Cochin, Seilan, and all that coast.

The ships depart from those places betwixt the 1 and 15 of August, and there they find it navigable all the yeere except in the winter, which continueth as is aforesaid, from the 15 of May till the 10 of August. In like manner the ships come from these places for Goa at euery time in the yeere except in the winter, but of all other the best time is to come in Nouember, December and Iannary. Note.

The first monson from Goa, for Pegu.

The ships depart from Goa, betwixt the 15 and 20 of April, and winter at S. Thomas, and after the 5 of August, they depart from S. Thomas for Pegu.

The second monson from Goa for Pegu.

• The ships depart from Goa betwixt the 8 and 24 of August, going straight for Pegu, and if they passe the 24 of August, they cannot passe that monson, neither is there any more monsons till April as is aforesaid. Note that the chiefest trade is, to take money of S. Thomas rials, and patachoni, and to goe to S. Thomas, and there to buy Tellami, which is fine cloth of India, whereof there is great quantitie made in Coromandel, and brought thither, and other marchandise are not good for that place except some dozen of very faire Emeraulds orientall. For of golde, silver, and Rubies, there is sufficient store in Pegu.

The monson from Pegu for the Indies.

• The ships depart from Pegu betwixt the 15 and 25 of Januarie, and come to Goa about the 25 of March, or in the beginning of April. Note, that if it passe the 10 of May before the sayde ships be arriued in Goa, they cannot come thither that monson, and if they haue not then set the coast of India, they shall with great perill fetch S. Thomas.

The first monson from Goa for Malacca.

• The ships depart betwixt the 15 and last of September, and arriue in Malacca about the end of October.

The second monson from Goa to Malacca.

• The ships depart about the 5 of May from Goa, and arriue in Malacca about the 15 of June.

The first monson from Malacca to Goa.

The ships depart about the 10 of September, and come to Goa about the end of October.

The second monson from Malacca to Goa.

The ships depart from Malacca about the 10 of February, and come to Goa about the end of March. But if the said ships should stay till the 10 of May, they cannot enter into Goa, and if at that time also they should not be arrived at Cochin, they are forced to returne to Malacca, because the winter and contrary windes then come upon them.

The monson from Goa for China.

The ships depart from Goa in the moneth of April.

The monson from China for Goa.

The ships depart to be the 10 of May in Goa, and being not then arrived, they turne backe to Cochin, and if they cannot fetch Cochin, they returne to Malacca.

The monson from Goa to the Moluccaes.

The ships depart about the 10 or 15 of May, which time being past, the shippes can not passe over the barre of Goa for the cause abovesaid.

The monson of the ships of the Moluccaes arrivall in Goa.

The ships which come from the Moluccaes arrive upon the bar of Goa about the 15 of April.

The monsons of the Portugall ships for the Indies.

The ships which come from Portugall depart thence ordinarily betwixt the tenth & fifteenth of March, comming the straight way during the moneth of July to the coast of Melinde, and Mosambique, and from thence goe straight for Goa, and if in the moneth of July they should not be at the coast of Melinde, they can in no wise that yeere fetch Melinde, but returne to the Isle of Saint Helena, and so are not able, that time being past, to fetch the coast of Inoia, and to come straight for Goa. Therefore (as is abovesaid) they returne to the Island of Saint Helena, and if they cannot make the said Island, then they runne as lost upon the coast of Guinea: but if the said ships be arrived in time upon the coast of Melinde, they set forwardes for Goa, and if by the fifteenth of September they cannot fetch Goa, they then goe for Cochin, but if they see they cannot fetch Cochin, they returne to Mosambique to winter there upon the sayd coast. Albeit in the yeere of our Lord 1580 there arrived the ship called San Lorenzo, being wonderfull soze sea-beaten, the eight of October, which was accounted as a myracle for that the like had not bene seene before.

The shippes depart from Cochin betweene the fifteenth and last of January, going on till they have sight of Capo de buona speranza, and the Isle of Saint Helena, which Islande is about the midway, being in sixtene degrees to the South. And it is a little Island being fruitfull of all things which a man can imagine, with great store of fruit: and this Island is a great succour to the shipping which returne for Portugall. And not long since the said Island was found by the Portugales, and was discovered by a shippe that came from the Indies in a great storme, in which they found such abundance of wilde beastes, and boares, and all sort of fruite, that by meanes thereof that poore ship which had bene foure moneths at sea, refreshed themselves both with water and meate very well, and this Island they callen S. Helena, because it was discovered upon S. Helens day. And undoubtedly this Island is a great succour, and so great an ayde to the ships of Portugall, that many would surely perish if that helpe wanted. And therefore the king of Portugall caused a Church to be made there for devotion of S. Helena: where there are onely resident Eremites, and all other are forbidden to inhabite there by the kings commaundement, to the ende that the ships may be the more sufficiently furnished with victuals, because the ships which come from India come but slenderly victualled, because there groweth no corne there, neither make they any wine: but the ships which come from Portugall to the Indies touch not in the sayd Island, because they set out being sufficiently furnished with bread and water from Portugall for eight moneths voyage. Any other people then the two Eremites abovesaid, cannot inhabite this Island, excepte some sicke man that may be set there a shope to remaine in the Eremites companie, for his helpe and recovery.

The monson from Goa to Mosambique.

The ships depart betwixt the 10 and 15 of Januarie.

The monson from Mosambique to Goa.

The ships depart betweene the 8 and last of August, and arrive in Chaul or Goa in the moneth of October, till the 15 of November.

The monson from Ormus to Bengala.

The ships depart betwixt the 15 and 20 of June, and goe to winter at Teue and depart thence about the 15 of August for Bengala.

The voyage passed by sea into Aegypt, by John Euesham Gentleman. Anno 1586.

He 5 of December 1586 we departed from Grauesend in the Tiger of London, wherein was Master under God for the voyage Robert Rickman, and the 21. day at night we came to the Isle of Wight: departing from thence in the morning following we had a faire winde, so that on the 27 day wee came in sight of the rocke of Lisbone, and so sayling along we came in sight of the South Cape, the 29 of the same, and on the morrowe with a Westerly winde we entered the straighes: and the second of January being as high as Cape de Gare, we departed from our flecte towards Argier. And the 4 day we arrived at the port of Argier aforesaid, where we staid till the first of March. At which time we set saile towards a place called Tunis, to the Eastward of Argier 100 leagues, where we arrived the 8 of the same. This Tunis is a small citie up 12 miles from the sea, and at the port of rode where shipping doe ride, is a castle of foze called Goleira, sometimes in the hands of the Christians, but now of the Turkes: at which place we remained till the thirde of Aprill: at which time wee set saile towards Alexandria, and hauing sometime faire winde, sometime contrary, we passed on the 12 day betwene Sicilia and Malta (where neere adioyning hath beene the fort and holde of the knights of the Rhodes) and so the 19 day we fell with the Isle of Candy, and from thence to Alexandria, where we arrived the 27 of Aprill, and there continued till the 5 of October.

Tunis.

The said citie of Alexandria is an old thing decayed or ruinated, hauing bene a faire and great citie neere two miles in length, being all vaulted underneath for prouision of fresh water, which water cometh thither but once euery yeere, out of one of the foure riuers of paradise (as it is termed) called Nilus, which in September floweth neere eightene foote vpright higher then his accustomed manner, and so the banke being cut, as it were a sluice, about thirty miles from Alexandria, at a towne called Rosseto, it doth so come to the saide Citie, with such abundance, that barkes of twelue tunne doe come vpon the same water, which water doth fill all the vaults, cisternes, and wells in the said Citie, with very good water, and doth so continue good, till the next yeere following: for they haue there very litle raine or none at all, yet haue they exceeding great dewes. Also they haue very good corne, and very plentifull: all the Countrey is very hot, especially in the moneths of August, September, and October. Also within the saide Citie there is a pillar of Marble, called by the Turkes, King Pharaoes neede, & it is foure square, euery square is twelue foote, and it is in height 90 foote. Also there is without the wals of the said Citie, about twentie score paces, another marble pillar, being round, called Pompey his pillar: this pillar standeth vpon a great square stone, euery square is fiftene foote, and the same stone is fiftene foote high, and the compasse of the pillar is 37 foote, and the heighth of it is 101 feete, which is a wonder to thinke how euer it was possible to set the said pillar vpon the said square stone. The port of the said Citie is strongly fortified with two strong Castles, and one other Castle within the citie, being all very well planted with munition: and there is to the Eastward of this Citie, about thre dayes iourney the citie of Grand Cayro, other wise called Memphis: it hath in it by report of the registers booke which we did see, to the number of 2400 Churches, and is wonderfully populous, and is one dayes iourney about the wals, which was iourneyed by one of our Harreners for triall thereof. Also neere to the saide citie there is a place called the Pyramides, being, as I may well terme it, one of the nine wonders of the world: that is, seuen seuerall places of flint and marble stone, foure square, the wals thereof are seuen yards thicke in those places that we did see: the squarenes is in length about twentie score euery square, being built as it were a pointed diamond, broad at the foote, and small or narrow at the toppe: the heighth of them, to our iudgement, doth surmount twise the heighth of Pauls steeple: within the saide Pyramides, no man doth know what there is, for that they haue no entrance but in the one of them, there is a hole where the wall is broken, and so we went in there, hauing torch-light with vs, for that it hath no light to it, and within the same, is as it were a great hall, in the which there is a costly tombe, which tombe they say, was made for king Pharaon in his life time, but he was not buried there, being drowned in the red sea: also there are certaine vaults or dungeons, which goe downe verie deepe under those Pyramides with faire staires, but no man dare venter to goe downe into them, by reason that they can carry no light with them, for the damp of the earth doth put out the light: the red sea is but thre dayes iourney from this place, and Ierusalem about seuen dayes iourney from thence: but to returne to Cayro. There is a Castle wherein is the house that Pharaoes wines were kept in, and in the Palace or Court thereof stande 55 marble pillars, in such order, as our Exchange standeth in London: the said pillars are in height 60 foote, and in compasse 14

foote: also in the said Citie is the castle where Ioseph was in prison, where to this day they put in rich men, when the king would haue any summe of monney of them: there are seuen gates to the sayd prison, and it goeth neere fiftie yardes downe right: also, the water that serueth this castle, cometh out of the foresaide riuer of Nilus, vpon a wall made with arches, fise miles long, and it is twelue foote thicke. Also there are in old Cayro two Monasteries, the one called S. Georges, the other S. Maries: & in the Courts where the Churches be, was the house of king Pharao. In this Citie is great store of marchandise, especially pepper, and nutmegs, which come thither by land, out of the East India: and it is very plentifull of all maner of victuals, especially of bread, rootes, and hearbes: to the Eastward of Cayro, there is a Well, fise miles off, called Matria, and as they say, when the Virgin Marie fled from Bethleem, and came into Egypt, and being there, had neither water, nor any other thing to sustaine them, by the prouidence of God, an Angell came from heauen, and strake the ground with his wings, where presently issued out a fountaine of water: and the wall did open where the Israelites did hide themselves, which fountaine or well is walled foure square till this day. Also we were at an old Citie, all ruinated and destroyed, called in olde time, the great Citie of Carthage where Hannibal and Queene Dido dwelt: this Citie was but narrow, but was very long: for there was, and is yet to bee seene, one streete three mile long, to which Citie fresh water was brought vpon arches (as afoze) aboue 25 miles, of which arches some are standing to this day. Also we were at diuers other places on the coast, as we came from Cayro, but of other antiquities we saw but few. The towne of Argier which was our first and last port, within the streights standeth vpon the side of an hill, close vpon the sea shore: it is very strong both by sea and land, and it is very well victualed with all manner of fruites, bread and fish good store, and very cheape. It is inhabited with Turkes, Moores, and Iewes, and so are Alexandria and Cayro. In this towne are a great number of Christian captiues, whereof there are of Englishmen onely fiftene, from which port we set sayle towards England, the seueneth of Ianuarie, Anno 1587, and the 30 day of the sayd moneth, we arriued at Dartmouth on the coast of England.

The second voyage of M. Laurence Aldersey, to the Cities of Alexandria, and Cayro in Aegypt. Anno 1586.

Embarked my selfe at Bristol, in the Hercules, a good ship of London, and set saile the 21 day of Februarie, about ten of the clocke in the morning, hauing a merry winde: but the 23 day, there arose a very great storme, and in the mids of it we descried a small boate of the burden of ten tunnes, with foure men in her, in very great danger, who called a maine for our helpe. Whereupon our Master made towardes them, and tooke them into our ship, and let the boate, which was laden with timber, and appertained to Cheshow, to runne a drift. The same night about midnight arose another great storme, but the winde was large with vs, vntill the 27 of the same moneth, which then grew somewhat contrary: yet not withstanding we held on our course, and the tenth day of March, we descried a saile about Cape Sprar, which is a litle on this side the streight of Gibraltar, but we spake not with her. The next day we descried twelue saile more, with whom we thought to haue spoken, to haue learned what they were, but they made very fast away, and we gaue them ouer.

Thursday the 16 of March, we had sight of the streights, and of the coast of Barbary. The 18 day we passed them, and sailed towards Patras. Upon the 23 of March, we met with the Centurion of London which came from Genoa, by whom we sent letters to England, and the foure men also which we tooke in, vpon the coast of England, before mentioned.

The 29 of March we came to Goleta a small Island, and had sight of two shippes, which we iudged to be of England.

Tuesday the fourth of Aprill, we were before Malta, and being there becalmed, our Master caused the two ship boates to be had out, and they towed the ship, till we were out of sight of the Castle of Malta. The 9 day of Aprill we came to Zante, and being before the towne, William Aldridge, seruant to Master Thomas Cordall of London, came aboard vs, with whom our Master and twelue more of our company, thought to haue gone on shoare, but they could not be permitted: so we all came aboard againe, and went to Patras, where we arriued vpon good Friday, and lay there with good entertainment at the English house, where was the Consull Master Grimes, Ralph Ashley, and Iohn Doddington, who very kindly went with vs, and shewed vs the pleasures of the towne.

They brought vs to the house of the Cady, who was made then to vnderstand of the 20 Turkes that that wee had aboard, which were to goe to Constantinople, being redeemed out of captiuitie, by sir Francis Drake in the West Indies, and brought with him into England, and by order of the Queenes Maiestie sent now into their Countrey. Whereupon the Cady commaunded them to be brought befoze him, that he might see them: and when he had talked with them, and understood howe strangely they were deliuered, hee marvelled much, and admired the Queenes Maiestie of England, who being but a woman, is notwithstanding of such power and renowne amongst all the princes of Christendome, with many other honourable wordes of commending her Maiestie. So he tooke the names of those 20. Turkes, and recorded them in their great bookes, to remaine in perpetuall memozy. After this, our foresaid countrey men brought mee to the Chappel of S. Andrew, where his tombe or sepulchre is, and the boord vpon which hee was beheaded, which boord is now so rotten, that if any man offer to cut it, it falleth to powder, yet I brought some of it away with me.

Upon Tuesday in Easter weeke, wee set out towards Zante againe, and the 24. of April with much ado, wee were all permitted to come on shoare, and I was caried to the English house in Zante, where I was very well entertained. The commodities of Zante are Currans and oyle: the situation of the Towne is vnder a very great hill, vpon which standeth a very strong Castle, which commaundeth the Towne. At Zante wee tooke in a Captaine and 16. souldiers, with other passengers. Wee departed from Zante vpon Tuesday the 15. of April, and the next day we ankered at a small Island, called Serualia, which is desolate of people, saving a fewe religious men, who entertained vs well, without taking any money: but of courtesie we bestowed somewhat vpon them for their maintenance, and then they gaue vs a couple of leane sheepe, which we caried aboard. The last day of April, wee arrived at Candie, at a Castle, called Sowday, where wee set the Captaine, Souldiers, and Mariners aboard, which wee tooke in at Zante, with all their carriage.

Serualia.

Candie.

The second day of May wee set saile againe, and the fourth day came to the Islands of Milo, where we ankered, and found the people there very courteous, and tooke in such necessaries as we wanted. The Islands are in my iudgement a hundred in number, and all within the compasse of a hundred miles.

May.
The Islands of Milo, in olds time called Sporades.

The 11. day, the Chaus, which is the greatest man there in authoritie, for certaine offences done in a little Chappell by the water side, which they saide one of our shippe had done, and imputed it to mee, because I was seene goe into it three dayes befoze, came to vs, and made much a doe, so that we were faine to come out of our shippe armed: but by three pieces of golde the bhabling was ended, and we came to our shippe. This day wee also set saile, and the next day passed by the Castle of Serpeto, which is an old ruinated thing, and standeth vnder a hills side.

The 13. day, we passed by the Island of Paris, and the Island of the bankes of Helicon, and the Island called Ditter, where are many boares, and the women bee witches. The same day also wee passed by the Castle of Tino, standing vpon a very high mountaine, and nere vnto it is the Island of Diana.

The 15. of May, wee came to Sio, where I stayed thirtie and three dayes. In it is a very proper Towne, after the building of that Countrey, and the people are ciuill: and while we were here, there came in six Gallies, which had bene at Alexandria, and one of them which was the Admirall, had a Prince of the Moores prisoner, whom they tooke about Alexandria, and they meant to present him to the Turke. The towne standeth in a valley, and a long the water side pleasantly. There are about 26. winde-mills about it, and the commodities of it are cotton wooll, cotton yarne, make, and some other drugs.

Sio.

As we remained at Sio, there grew a great controuersie betwene the mariners of the Hercules, and the Greekes of the Towne of Sio, about the bringing home of the Turkes, which the Greekes tooke in ill part, and the boyes cried out, Viue el Re Philippe: whereupon our men beate the boyes, and threwe stones, and so a boyle beganne, and some of our men were hurt: but the Greekes were fetcht out of their houses, and manacled together with yrons, and threwn to the Gallies: about fourtie of them were sent to the prison, and what became of them, when we were gone, we know not, for we went thence within two dayes after, which was the 19. of June.

The 20. day wee passed by the Island of Singonina, an Island risen by the casting of stones in that place: the substance of the ground there is brimstone, and burneth sometimes so much, that it bloweth by the rocks.

Singonina.

The 24. of June wee came to Cyprus, and had sight in the way of the aforesaid six Gallies, that came from Alexandria, one whereof came vnto vs, and required a present for himselfe, and for two of the other Gallies, which we for quietnesse sake gaue them.

The 27. of June, wee came to Tripolie, where I stayed till the fift of July, and then tooke passage passage in a small barke called a Caramusalin, which was a passage boat, and was bound for Bichieri, thirtene miles on this side Alexandria, which boate was freighted with Turkes, Moores, and Jewes.

The 20. day of July, this barke which I passed in ranne vpon a rocke, and was in very great danger, so that we all began some to be ready to swimme, some to leape into the shippe boate, but it pleased God to set vs quickly off the rocke, and without much harme.

Bichieri.

The 28. of July I came to Bichieri, where I was well entertained of a Jewe which was the Customer there, giuing me Puscadine, and drinkeing water himselfe: hauing broken my fast with him, he prouided mee a Camell for my carriage, and a Mule for mee to ride vpon, and a Moore to runne by me to the City of Alexandria, who had charge to set mee safe in the English house, whither I came, but found no Englishmen there: but then my guide brought mee aboard a ship of Alderman Martins, called the Tyger of London, where I was well receiued of the Master of the said ship, whose name was Thomas Rickman, and of all the company.

The English house in Alexandria.

The said Master hauing made me good cheere, and made me also to drinke of the water of Nilus, hauing the keyes of the English house, went thither with me himselfe, & appointed mee a faire chamber, and left a man with me to prouide me all things that I needed, and euery day came himselfe to me, and caried me into the City, and shewed me the monuments thereof, which be these.

The monuments of Alexandria.

He brought mee first to Pompey his pillar, which is a mighty thing of gray marble, and all of one stone, in height by estimation aboue 52 yards, and the compasse about five sadome.

The City hath thre gates, one called the gate of Barbaria, the other of Merina, and the thirde of Rosseto.

He brought me to a stone in the streete of the Citie, whereupon S. Marke was beheaded: to the place where S. Katherine died, hauing there hid herselfe, because she would not marry: also to the Bath of S. Katherine.

I saw there also Pharaos needle, which is a thing in height almost equall with Pompeys pillar, and is in compasse five sadome, and a halfe, and all of one stone.

I was brought also to a most bzauie and daintie Bath, where we washed our selues: the Bath being of marble, and of very curious workmanship.

The Citie standeth vpon great arches, or vaultes, like vnto Churches, with mightie pillars of marble, to holde vp the foundation: which arches are built to receiue the water of the riuer of Nilus, which is for the vse of the Citie. It hath thre Castles, and a hundred Churches: but the part that is destroyed of it, is five times more then that part which standeth.

Rosseto.

The last day of July, I departed from Alexandria towards Cayro in a passage boate, wherein first I went to Rosseto, standing by the riuer side, hauing 13. or 14. great churches in it, their building there is of stone and brick, but as for lodging, there is little, except we bring it with vs.

From Rosseto we passed along the riuer of Nilus, which is so famous in the world, to rise as broad as the Thames at London: on both sides grow date trees in great abundance. The people be rude, in so much that a man cannot traueile without a launizary to conuocit him.

The Turkes Lent.

The time that I stayed in Egypt was the Turkes and Moores Lent, in all which time they burne lamps in their churches, as many as may hang in them: their Lent endureth 40. dayes, and they haue thre Lents in the yere: during which time they neither eate nor drinke in the day time, but all the night they do nothing else.

Between Rosseto and Cayro there are along the water side thre hundred cities and townes, and the length of the way is not aboue thre hundred miles.

Cayro.

To this famous Citie of Cayro I came the fift day of August, where I found M. William Alday, and William Caesar, who entertained me in very good sort. M. Caesar brought mee to see the Pyramides which are thre in number, one whereof king Pharaos made for his owne tombe, the tombe it selfe is almost in the top of it: the monuments be high and in forme 4. square, and euery of the squares is as long as a man may shoote a rousing arrowe, and as high as a Church, I sawe also the ruines of the Citie of Memphis hard by those Pyramides.

The house of Ioseph is yet standing in Cayro, which is a sumptuous thing, hauing a place to walke in of 56. mighty pillars, all gilt with gold, but I saw it not, being then lame.

The 11. day of August the lande was cut at Cayro, to let in the water of the riuer of Nilus, which was done with great ioy and triumph.

The 12. of August I set from Cayro towards Alexandria againe, and came thither the 14. of August. The 26. day there was kept a great feast of the Turkes and Moores, which lasted two dayes, and for a day they neuer ceased shooting off of great Ordnance.

The English Consull at Argier.

From Alexandria I sailed to Argier, where I lay with M. Typton Consull of the English nation, who vsed me most kindly, and at his owne charge. Hee brought mee to the kings Court, and and into the presence of the King, to see him, and the manners of the Court: the King doeth onely beare the name of a King, but the greatest government is in the hands of the souldiers.

The king of Potanca is prisoner in Argier, who comming to Constantinople, to acknowledge a duety to the great Turke, was betrayed by his owne nephew, who wrote to the Turke, that hee went onely as a spy, by that meanes to get his kingdome. I heard at Argier of seuen Gallies that were at that time cast away at a towne called Forinenera: thye of them were of Argier, the other foure were the Christians.

We found here also 13. Englishmen, which were by force of weather put into the bay of Tunis, where they were very ill vsed by the Moores, who forced them to leaue their barke: whereupon they went to the Councell of Argier, to require a redresse and remedy for the iniurie. They were all belonging to the shippe, called the Golden Noble of London, whereof Master Birde is owner. The Master was Stephen Haselwood, and the Captaine Edmond Bence.

The thirde day of December, the pinnesse called the Mooneshine of London, came to Argier with a prize, which they tooke vpon the coast of Spaine, laden with sugar, hides, and ginger: the pinnesse also belonging to the Golden Noble: and at Argier they made sale both of shippe and goods, where wee left them at our comming away, which was the seuenth day of Januarie: and the first day of February, I landed at Dartmouth, and the seuenth day came to London, with humble thanks to Almighty God, for my safe arriuall.

A true report of a worthy fight, performed in the voyage from Turkie, by five Ships of London, against 11. Gallies, and two Frigats of the King of Spaines, at Pantalarea within the Streights, Anno, 1586. Written by Philip Iones.

The Marchants of London, being of the incorporation of the Turkey trade, hauing receiued intelligences, and aduertisements, from time to time, that the King of Spaine grudging at the prosperitie of this kingdome, had not onely of late arrested all English ships, bodie, and goods, in Spaine, but also maligning the quiet trafique which they vsed to and in the dominions, and prouinces, vnder the obedience of the Great Turke, had giuen order to the Captaines of his gallies in the Leuant, to hinder the passage of all English ships, and to endeavour by their best meanes, to intercept, take, and spoile them, their persons, and goods: they hereupon thought it their best course to set out their fleete for Turkie, in such strength and abilitie for their defence, that the purpose of their Spanish enemy might the better be prevented, and the voyage accomplished with greater securitie to the men and shippes. For which cause, five tall, and stout shippes, appertaining to London, and intending onely a Marchants voyage, were prouided and furnished with all things belonging to the Seas; The names whereof were these:

1. The Marchant Royall, a very braue and good shippe, and of great report.
2. The Tobie.
3. The Edward Bonauenture.
4. The William, and Iohn.
5. The Susan.

These five departing from the coast of England, in the moneth of November 1585, kept together as one fleete, til they came as high as the Isle of Sicile, within the Leuant. And there, according to the order and direction of the voyage, each shippe began to take leaue of the rest, and to separate himselfe, setting his course for the particular port, whereunto hee was bounde: one for Tripolie in Syria, another for Constantinople, the chiefe Citie of the Turkes Empire, situated vpon the coast of Romania, called of olde, Thracia, and the rest to those places, whereunto they were priuately appointed. But befoze they diuided themselves, they altogether consulted, of and about a certaine and speciall place for their meeting againe after the lading of their goods at their severall portes. And in conclusion, the generall agreement was to meete at Zante, an Island nere to the maine continent of the West part of Morea, well knownen of all the Pilots, & thought to be the fittest place of their Rendezous. Concerning which meeting, it was also covenanted on eche side, and promised, that whatsoeuer ship of these 5, should first arrive at Zante, should there stay and expect the comming of the rest of the fleete, for the space of twentie dayes. This being done, ecy man made his best hast according as winde and weether would serue him to fulfill his course, and to dispatch his businesse; and no neede was there to admonish or incourage any man, seeing no time was ill spent, nor opportunitie omitted on any side, in the performance of ech mans duetie, according to his place.

It fell out that the Tobie which was bound for Constantinople had made such good speede, and gotten such good weather, that the first of all the rest came back to the appointed place of Zante, and not forgetting the former conclusion, did there cast ancre, attending the arrivall of the rest of the fleet, which accordingly (their business first performed) failed not to keepe promise. The first next after the Tobie was the Royal Marchant, which together with the William and Iohn came from Tripolie in Syria, and arrived at Zante within the compasse of the foresaide time limited. These ships in token of the joy on all parts conceived for their happy meeting, spared not the discharging of their Ordnance, the sounding of drums & trumpets, the spreading of Ensignes with other warlike and ioyfull behaviours, expelling by these outward signes, the inward gladnesse of their mindes, being all as ready to ioyne together in mutuall consent to resist the cruel enemy, as now in sporting mance they made myzt and pastime among themselves. These three had not bene long in the haven, but the Edward Bonaventure also, together with the Susan her consort, were come from Venice with their lading, the sight of whom increased the joy of the rest, and they no lesse glad of the presence of the others, saluted them in most friendly and kinde sort, according to the manner of the Seas: and whereas some of these ships stood at that instant in some want of victuals, they were all content to stay in the port, till the necessities of each shippe were supplied, and nothing wanted to set out for their returne.

In this port of Zante the newes was fresh and currant, of two severall armies and fleets provided by the king of Spaine, and lying in waite to intercept them: the one consisting of 30. strong Gallies, so well appointed in all respects for the warre, that no necessary thing wanted: and this fleet hovered about the Streights of Gibraltar. The other armie had in it 20. Gallies, whereof some were of Sicilie, and some of the Island of Malta, under the charge and government of Iohn Andrea Dorea, a Captaine of name serving the king of Spaine. These two divers and strong fleets waited and attended in the Seas for none, but the English shippes, and no doubt made their accompt and sure reckoning that not a shippe should escape their furie. And the opinion also of the inhabitants of the Isle of Zante was, that in respect of the number of Gallies in both these armies, having received such streight commandement from the king, our ships and men being but few, and little in comparifon of them, it was a thing in humane reason impossible, that we should passe either without spoiling, if we resisted, or without composition at the least, and acknowledgement of duetie to the Spanish king.

But it was neither the report of the attendance of these armies, nor the opinions of the people, nor any thing else, that could daunt or dismay the courages of our men, who grounding themselves upon the goodnesse of their cause, and the promise of God, to bee deliuered from such as without reason sought their destruction, carried resolute mindes, notwithstanding all impediments to adventure through the Seas, and to finish their Navigation, maugre the beards of the Spanish Souldiers. But least they should seeme too carelesse, and too secure of their estate, and by laying the whole and entire burden of their safetie upon Gods providence, should foolishly presume altogether of his helpe, and neglect the meanes which was put into their handes, they failed not to enter into counsell among themselves, and to deliberate advisedly for their best defence. And in the end with generall consent, the Marchant Royall was appointed Admirall of the fleet, and the Tobie Viceadmirall, by whose orders the rest promised to be directed, and each shippe vowed not to breake from another, whatsoever extremitie should fall out, but to stand to it to the death, for the honour of their Countrey, and the frustrating of the hope of the ambitious and proud enemy.

Thus in good order they left Zante and the Castle of Gracia, and committed themselves againe to the Seas, and proceeded in their course and voyage in quietnes, without sight of any enemy, till they came neere to Pantalarea, an Island so called, betwixt Sicilie, and the coast of Africke: into sight whereof they came the 13. day of July 1586. And the same day in the morning about 7. of the clocke they descried 13. sailes in number, which were of the Gallies, lying in waite of purpose for them, in and about that place. As soone as the English ships had spied them, they by and by according to a common order, made themselves ready for a fight, layed out their Ordnance, scoured, charged, and primed them, displayed their ensignes, and left nothing undone to arme themselves thoroughly. In the meane time, the Gallies moe and moe approached the ships, and in their banners there appeared the armes of the Isles of Sicilie, and Malta, being all as then in the service and pay of the Spaniard. Immediately, both the Admirals of the Gallies sent from each of them a frigate, to the Admirall of our English ships, which being come neere them, the Sicilian frigate first hailed them, and demanded of them whence they were: They answered that they were of England, the armes whereof appeared in their colours. Whereupon the saide frigate expostulated with them, and asked why they delayed to sende or come with their Captaines and pursers to Don Pedro de Leiva their Generall, to acknowledge their duty and obedience to him in the name of the Spanish king, Lord of those seas: Our men replied, and said, that they owed no such due tie nor obedience to him, and therefore would acknowledge none, but commanded the frigate to depart with that answer, and not to stay longer a babling, vpon her perill. With that away she went, and vpon comes toward them the other frigate of Malca, and there in like sort hailed the Admirall, and would needs know whence they were, and where they had bene. Our Englishmen in the Admirall, not disdainning an answer, tolde them that they were of England, Marchants of London, had bene at Turkie, and were now returning home: and to be requited in this case, they also demanded of the frigate whence she and the rest of the Gallies were: the messenger answered, we are of Malca, and for mine owne part my name is Cauallero. These Gallies are in seruice and pay to the king of Spaine, vnder the conduct of Don Pedro de Leiva a noble man of Spaine, who hath bene commanded hither by the King with this present force and armie, of purpose to intercept you. You shall therefore (quoth he) do well to repaire to him, to know his pleasure, he is a noble man of good behauiour and courtesie, and meanes you no ill. The Captaine of the English Admirall, whose name was M. Edward Wilkinson, replied and said. We purpose not at this time to make triall of Don Pedro his courtesie, whereof we are suspitious and doubtful, and not without good cause: vsing wit hall good words to the messenger, and willing him to come aboard him, promising securitie and good vllage, that thereby he might the better knowe the Spaniards minde: whereupon he indeed left his frigate, and came aboard him, whom hee intertained in friendly sort, and caused a cuppe of wine to be drawne for him, which he tooke and beganne, with his cap in his hand, and with reuerend termes to drinke to the health of the Queene of England, speaking very honourably of her Maestie, and giuing good speeches of the courteous vllage and intertainment that he himselfe had receiued in London, at the time that the duke of Alençon, brother to the late French king was last in England: and after he had well drunke, hee tooke his leaue, speaking well of the sufficiencie and goodnesse of our shippes, and especially of the Marchant Royal, which he confessed to haue seene before, riding in the Thames neere London. He was no sooner come to Don Pedro de Leiva the Spanish general, but he was sent off againe, and returned to the English Admirall, saying that the pleasure of the Generall was this, that either their Captaines, Masters and Puruers should come to him with speed, or else hee would set vpon them, and either take them or sinke them. The reply was made by M. Wilkinson aforesaid, that not a man should come to him: and for the bragge and threat of Don Pedro, it was not that Spanish brauado that should make them yeeld a tot to their hinderance, but they were as ready to make resistance, as he to offer an iniurie. Whereupon Cauallero the messenger left bragging, and began to perswade them in quiet sort, and with many wordes, but all his labour was to no purpose, and as his threat did nothing terrifie them, so his perswasion did nothing moue them to doe that which hee required. At the last he intreated to haue the Marchant of the Admirall caried by him as a messenger to the Generall, that so he might be satisfied, and assured of their mindes by one of their owne company. But M. Wilkinson would agree to no such thing, although Richard Rowie the marchant himselfe seemed willing to bee employed in that message, and laboured by reasonable perswasions to induce M. Wilkinson to graunt it, as hoping to be an occasion by his presence and discrete answers to satisfie the Generall, and thereby to saue the effusion of Christian blood, if it should grow to a battell. And he seemed so much the more willing to be sent, by how much deeper the othes and protestations of this Cauallero were, that he would (as hee was a true knight and a souldier) deliuer him backe againe in safetie to his company. Albeit, M. Wilkinson, which by his long experience had receiued sufficient triall of Spanish inconstancie and periturie, wished him in no case to put his life and libertie in hazard vpon a Spaniards othe. But at last, vpon much intreatie, hee yeelded to let him go to the General, thinking in deed, that good speeches and answers of reason would haue contented him, where as otherwise refusal to do so, might peraduenture haue prouoked the more discontentment.

M. Rowie therefore passing to the Spanish Generall, the rest of the Gallies hauing espied him, thought in deed that the English were rather determined to yeelde, then to fight, and therefore came flocking about the frigate, euery man crying out, Que nueuas, que nueuas, Haue these English men yeelded: the frigate answered, Not so, they neither haue, nor purpose to yeeld, onely they haue sent a man of their company to speake with our Generall: and being come to the Gallie wherein he was, he shewed himselfe to M. Rowie in his armour, his guard of souldiers attending vpon him in armour also, and began to speake very proudly in this sort: Thou Englishman, from whence is your fiere, why stand ye aloofe off, knowe ye not your due tie to the Catholique King, whose person I here represent: Where are your billes of lading, your letters, passports, and the chiefe of your men: Thinke ye my attendance in these seas to be in vaine, or my person to no purpose: Let all these things be done out of hand as I command, vpon paine of my further displeasure and the spoyle of you all: These wordes of the Spanish Generall were not so outragiously pronounced, as they were mildly answered by M. Rowie, who tolde him that they were al Marchants, using traffique in honest sort, and seeking to passe quietly, if they were not vzzed further then reason. As for the king of Spaine, he thought (for his part) that there was amitie betwixt him and his soueraigne the Queene of England, so that neither he nor his officers should goe about to offer any such iniurie to English Marchants, who as they were farre from giuing offence to any man, so they would be loath to take an abuse at the handes of any, or sit downe to their losse, where their abilitie was able to make defence. And as touching his commandement aforesaid, for the acknowledging of dutie, in such particular sort, he told him, that where there was no dutie owing, there none should be perfozmed, assuring him that their whole company and shippes in generall, stood resolutely vpon the negatiue, and would not yeeld to any such vnreasonable demaund, topped with such imperious and absolute maner of commanding. Why then, said he, if they wil neither come to yeeld, nor shew obedience to me in the name of my king, I wil either sinke them or bring them to harbor, and so tell them from me. With that the frigate came away with M. Rowie, and brought him aboord the English Admirall againe according to promise: who was no sooner entered in, but by and by defiance was sounded on both sides: the Spaniards heued off the noses of the Gallies, that nothing might hinder the leuell of the shot, and the English on the other side courageously prepared themselves to the combat, euery man according to his roome, bent to perfozme his office with alacritie and diligence. In the meane time a Cannon was discharged from the Admirall of the gallies, which being the onfet of the fight, was presently answered by the English Admirall with a Culuering: so the skirmish began, and grew hot and terrible, there was no powder nor shot spared: ech English ship matched it selfe in good order against two Spanish Gallies, besides the inequality of the frigates on the Spaniards side: and although our men perfozmed their parts with singular valure, according to their strength, insomuch that the enemy as amased therewith would oftentimes pause and stay, and consult what was best to be done, yet they ceased not in the midst of their businesse to make prayer to Almighty God the reutnger of al euils, and the giuer of victories, that it would please him to assist them in that good quarrell of theirs, in defending themselves against so proud a tyrant, to teach their handes to warre, and their fingers to fight, that the glory of the victory might rebound to his Name, and to the honor of true Religion, which the insolent enemy sought so much to ouerthrowe. Contrarily, the idolish Spaniards cried out according to their maner, not to God, but to our Lady (as they terme the virgin Mary) saying, O Lady helpe, O blessed Lady giue vs the victory, and the honor thereof shalbe thine. Thus with blowes & prayers on both sides the fight continued furious and sharpe, and doubtful a long time to which part the victory would incline: til at the last the Admirall of the Gallies of Sicilie began to warpe from the fight, and to holde by her side for feare of sinking, and after her went also two others in like case, whom al the sort of them inclosed, labouring by all their meanes to keepe them aboute water, being ready by the force of English shot which they had receiued, to perish in the seas: & what slaughter was done among the Spaniards themselves, the English were vnertaine, but by a probable coniecture apparant afar off, they supposed their losse was so great, that they wanted men to continue the charging of their pieces: whereupon with shame and dishonor, after 5. houres spent in the battel, they withdrew themselves: and the English contented in respect of their deepe lading, rather to continue their voyage then to follow the chase, ceased from further blowes, with the losse onely of two men slaine amongst them all, and another hurt in his arme, whom M. Wilkinson with his good wordes and friendly promises did so comfort, that he nothing esteemed the smart of his wound in respect of the honour of the victory, and the shamefull repulse of the enemy.

the fight of five houres,

Thus with dueitiful thanks to the mercy of God for his gracious assistance in that danger, the English ships proceeded in their Nauigation, and comming as high as Alger, a port towne vpon the coast of Barbary, they fell with it, of purpose to refresh themselves after their wearinesse, and to take in such supply of fresh water & victuals, as they needed: they were no sooner entered into the port, but immediately the king thereof sent a messenger to the ships to knowe what they were, with which messenger the chiefe master of ech shippe repaired to the king, and acquainted him not onely with the state of their ships, in respect of marchandize, but with the late fight which they had passed with the Spanish Gallies, repozting euery particular circumstance in word as it fell out in action: wherof the said king shewed himselfe marueilous glad, intertaining them in the best sort, and promising abundant reliefe of all their wants, making generall proclamation in the city vpon paine of death, that no man of what degree or state soeuer he were, should presume either to hinder them in their affaires, or to offer them any maner of iniury in body or goods. By vertue whereof they dispatched al things in excellent good sort, with al fauor & peaceablenesse: only such prisoners and captiues of the Spaniards as were in the Citie, seeing the good vantage which they receiued, and bearing also what seruice they had performed against the foresaide Gallies, grudget exceedingly against them, and sought as much as they could to practise some mischief against them: and one amongst the rest seeing an Englishman alone in a certaine lane of the Citie, came vpon him suddenly, and with his knife thrust him in the side, yet made no such great wound, but that it was easily recovered. The English company hearing of it, acquainted the king with the fact, who immediately sent both for the party that had receiued the wound, and the offender also, and caused an executioner in the presence of himselfe and the English, to chastise the slave euen to death, which was performed to the ende that no man should presume to commit the like part, or to doe any thing in contempt of his roial commandement.

The English hauing receiued this good iustice at the kings hands, and al other things that they wanted, or could craue for the furnishing of their shippes, tooke their leaue of him, and of the rest of their friendes, that were resident in Alger, and put out to Sea, looking to meeete with the second army of the Spanish king, which waited for them about the mouth of the Straighes of Gibraltar, which they were of necessitie to passe. But comming neere to the said Streight, it pleased God to raise at that instant a very darke and mistie fogge, so that one ship coulde not discern another, if it were 40. paces off: by meanes whereof, together with the notable faire Easterne winds that then blew most fit for their course, they passed with great speed through the Streight, and might haue passed with that good gale, had there bene 500. Gallies to withstand them, and the aire neuer so cleare for euery ship to be seene. But yet the Spanish Gallies had a sight of them when they were come within 3. English miles of the towne, and made after them in all possible haste, and although they saw that they were farre out of their reach, yet in a vaine fury and foolish pride, they shot off their Ordnance, and made a stirre in the Sea as if they had bene in the midst of them, which vanitie of theirs ministered to our men notable matter of pleasure and mirth, seeing men to fight with shadows, and to take so great paines to so small purpose.

But thus it pleased God to deride, and delude all the forces of that proud Spanish king, which he had prouided of purpose to distresse the English, who notwithstanding passed through both his Armies, in the one, little hurt, and in the other nothing touched, to the glory of his immortall Name, the honour of our Prince and Countrey, and the iust commendation of ech mans seruice performed in that voyage.

Departed from Constantinople with 30. persons of my suit and family the 3. of August. Passing through the Countreies of Thracia, now called Romania the great, Valachia & Moldauia, where arriving the 5. of September I was according to the Grand Signior his commandement very courteously interceined by Peter his politiue prince, a Greeke by profession, with whom was concluded that her Maiesties subiects there trafficking should pay but three vpon the hundred, which as well his owne subiects as all other nations answered: whose letters to her Maiestie be extant. Whence I proceeded into Poland, where the high Chanceler sent for mee the 27. of the same moneth. And after most honorable intertainment imparted with me in secret maner the late passed and present occurrents of that kingdome, & also he writ to her Maiestie.

Thence I hasted unto Elbing, where the 12. of October I was most friendly welcomed by the Senate of that City, whom I finde and iudge to be faithfully deuoted to her Maiesties seruice, whose letters likewise vnto the same were presented me. No lesse at Dantzick the 27. of that moneth I was courteously receiued by one of the Burroughmasters accompanied with two others of the Senate, & a Ciuil doctoer their Secretarie. After going through the land of Pomer I rested one day at Scerin, where, for that Duke was absent, nothing ensued. At Rostoke I passed through the Citie without any stay, and at Wismar receiued like friendly greeting as in the other places: but at Lubeck, for that I came late and departed early in the morning, I was not visited. At Hamburg the 19. of Nouember, and at Stoad the ninth of December in like maner I was saluted by a Burroughmaster and the Secretarie, and in all these places they presented mee sundry sorts of their best wine and fresh fish, euery of them with a long discourse, congratulating, in the names of their whole Senate, her Maiesties victorie ouer the Spaniard, and my safe returne, concluding with offer of their ready seruice to her future disposing. Yet the Dantzicks after my departure thence caused the Marchants to pay custome for the goods they brought with them in my company, which none other towne neither Infidels nor Christians on any way euer demanded. And notwithstanding the premises, I was most certainly informed of sundry of our nation there resident that most of the Hanse-towns vpon the sea coasts, especially Dantzik, Lubeck, and Hamborough haue laden and were shipping for Spaine, great pꝛouision of coine, cables, ropes, powder, saltpeter, hargubusses, armour, iron, leade, copper, and all other munition seruing for the warre. Whereupon I gather their fained courtellie pꝛoceeded rather for feare then of any good affection vnto her Maiesties seruice; Elbing and Stoad onely excepted, which of ouertie for their commoditie I esteemed well affected.

The priuilege of Peter the Prince of Moldauia graunted to the English Marchants.

Petrus Dei gratia princeps Valachia & Moldauia; significamus presentibus, vniuersis & singulis quorum interest ac intererit; quod cum magnifico domino Guilielmo Hareborne oratore Serenissimæ ac potentissimæ dominæ, dominæ Elizabethæ Dei gratia Angliæ, Franciæ, ac Hiberniæ Reginæ apud Serenissimum ac potentissimum Turcarum Imperatorem hanc constitutionem fecerimus: Nimirum vt dehinc sue Serenitatis subditis, omnibusque mercatoribus integrum sit hic in prouincia nostra commorandi, conuersandi, mercandi, vendendi, contrahendi que, imo omnia exercendi, quæ mercaturæ ac vitæ humanæ societas vsusque requirit, sine vlla alicuius contradictione, aut inhibitione: saluo ac integro tamen iure Telonij nostri; hoc est, vt a singulis rebus centum ducatorum pretij, tres numerent. Quod ratum ac firmum constitutione nostra haberi volumus. In cuius rei firmitus testimonium, sigillum nostrum appressum est. Actum in castris nostris die 27. mensis Augusti, anno Domini 1588.

The same in English.

Peter by the grace of God prince of Valachia and Moldauia; we signifie by these presents to all and singular persons, whom it doth or shall concerne, that we haue made this agreement with the worshipfull gentleman William Hareborne Ambassador of the right high and mighty prince, the Lady Elizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, France and Ireland, with the most puissant and mighty Emperour of the Turkes: To witte, that from hence forth it shall be lawfull for her highnesse subiects and all her Marchantes, to remaine, conuerse, buy, sel, bargain and exercise all such things, as the trade of marchandise, and humane societie and vse requireth, without any hinderance or let: the right of our Custome alwayes reserued; That is, that they pay three ducats vpon all such things as amount to the price of one hundred ducats. Which by this our ordinance we command to be surely and firmly obserued; For the more assured testimony whereof, our seale is hereunto annexed. Given in our Campe the 27. of the moneth of August in the yeere of our Lord 1588.

A briefe extract specifying the certaine dayly paiments, answered quarterly in time of peace, by the Grand Signior, out of his Treasurie, to the Officers of his Seraglio or Court, successiue in degrees: collected in a yeerely totall summe, as followeth.

The his owne diet every day, one thousand and one aspers, according to a former custome receiued from his aunccestors: notwithstanding that otherwise his diurnall expence is very much, and not certainly knowen, which summe maketh sterling money by the pere, two thousand, one hundred, 92. pounds, three shillings, eight pence. The five and fourtie thousand Ianizaries dispersed in sundry places of his dominions, at five aspers the day, amounteth by the yeere to five hundred, fourescore and eleuen thousand, and three hundred pounds.

The Azamogians, tribute children, farre surmount that number, for that they are collected from among the Christians, from whom betweene the yeeres of five and twelue, they are pulled away yeerely perforce: whereof I suppose those in seruice may be equall in number with the Ianizaries abovesaid, at three aspers a day, one with another, which is two hundred, fourescore and fiftene thousand, five hundred and fiftie pounds.

The five Bassas, whereof the Viceroy is supreme, at one thousand aspers the day, besides their yeerely reuenues, amounteth sterling by the yeere to ten thousand, nine hundred and fiftie pounds.

The five Beglerbeks, chiefe presidents of Greece, Hungary and Sclauonia, being in Europe, in Nacolia, and Caramania of Asia, at one thousand aspers the day: as also to eightene other gouernours of Prouinces, at five hundred aspers the day, amounteth by the yeere, to thirtie thousand five hundred, and threescore pounds.

The Bassa, Admirall of the Sea, one thousand aspers the day, two thousand, one hundred, four score and ten thousand pounds.

The Aga of the Janizaries, generall of the footemen, five hundred aspers the day, and maketh by the peere in sterling money, one thousand, four score and fifteene pounds.

The Imbrahur Bassa, Master of his horse, one hundred and fiftie aspers the day, is sterling money, three hundred and eight and twenty pounds.

The chiefe Esquire under him, one hundred and fiftie aspers, is three hundred and eight and twenty pounds.

The Agas of the Spahi, Captaines of the horsemen, five, at one hundred and fiftie aspers to either of them, maketh sterling, one thousand, nine hundred, three score and cleuen pounds.

The Capagi Bassas head porters four, one hundred and fiftie aspers to each, and maketh out in sterling money by the peere, one thousand, three hundred, and fourteene pounds.

The Turkes yeerely reuenue.

The Grand Signiors annual reuenue is said to be foureteene Millions and an halfe of golden ducats, which is sterling five millions, eight score thousand pounds.

The tribute payd by the Christians his Subiects is one gold ducat yeerely for the redemption of euery head, which may amount vnto not so little as one Million of golden ducats, which is sterling three hundred threescore thousand pounds.

Howeuer, in time of warre he exacteth manifold summes for maintenance of his Armie and Raue of the said Christians.

The Emperour payeth him yeerely tribute for Hungary, threescore thousand dollars, which is sterling thirtie thousand pound, besides presents to the Viceroy and Baslas, which are said to surmount to twentie thousand dollars.

Ambassadors allowances.

The Ambassadors of the Emperour is allowed one thousand Aspers the day.

The Ambassadors of the French king heretofore enjoyed the like: but of late yeeres by means of displeasure conceiued by Mahumet then Viceroy, it was reduced to five crownes the day, beside the provision of his Esquier of his stable.

The Ambassadors of Poland, and for the state of Venice are not Ligiers as these two abouesaid. The said Polack is allowed 12. French crownes the day during his abode, which may be for a moneth. Very seldome do the state of Venice send any Ambassador otherwise, then enforced of urgent necessity: but in stead thereof keepe there their Agent, president ouer other Marchants, of them termed a bailife, who hath none allowance of the Grand Signior, although his port & state is in manner as magnifical as the other aforesaid ambassadors. The Spanish Ambassador was equall with others in Ianizaries: but for so much as he would not according to custome follow the list of other ambassadors in making presents to the Grand Signior, he had none allowance. His abode there was 3. yeeres, at the end whereof, hauing concluded a truce for 6. yeeres, taking place fro his first coming in Nouember last past 1580, he was not admitted to the presence of the Grand Signior.

The letters of Sinan Bassa chiefe counsellour to Sultan Murad Can the Grand Signior, to the sacred Maiestie of Elizabeth Queene of England, shewing that vpon her request, and for her sake especially, hee graunted peace vnto the King and kingdome of Poland.

The same in English.

Most glorious, and the most resplendent of women, most select Princess, most gracious Elizabeth Queene of the valiant followers of Iesus in the famous kingdom of England; most wise gouernesse of all the affaires and busineses of the people and family of the Nazarens, most sweet fountaine of brightnesse and glory, most acceptable cloud of raine, inheritesse & Ladie of the blessednesse and glory of the renowned kingdome of England, to whom in humble wise all men offer their petitions: wishing of the almightie Creator most happie increase and prosperous successe vnto all your Maiesties affaires and actions, and offering vp mutuall & perpetuall bowes worthie of our familiarity, with eternall prayes: In most friendly manner we signifie vnto your princely Highnesse, that certaine yeeres past the most mightie Cesarlike maiestie of the Grand Signor waged vspeakeable warres with Casul-bas the Prince of the Persians, in regarde of which warres he would not goe in battell against any other places; and for that cause certaine cheeuies in the partes of Polonia called Cosacks, and other notozious persons liuing in the same partes ceased not to trouble and molest the subiects of our most mightie Emperour. But now hauing finished and brought to some good issue his affaires in Persia, determining to punish the saide malefactorz of Poland, and for that purpose committing an army vnto the Beglerbeg of Grecia, and the yeere last past, sending his imperiall commaundement vnto the Prince of the Tartars, he hath foraged, molested, and layed waste some part of the kingdome of Poland, and the Cosacks and other notozious offenders haue receiued condigne punishment. Whith the king of Poland perceiuing sent two Embassadours to his imperiall Highnesse signifying; that he would hunt out the saide malefactorz, and inflict most seuerer punishments vpon them, and also that he would better his gift, which he hath for many yeeres heretofore ordinarily sent vnto the porch of his imperiall Highnesse. Howbeit his imperiall maiestie (vpon whom the almightie creator hath bestowed so great power, and who vouchsafeth to giue eare vnto all humble suppliants) reiecting the supplication of the King of Poland, determined againe to send his armie against the saide king, and by the helpe of the Almighty creator, utterly to subuert and overthrow his kingdome. But your Maiesties Embassadour resident in the blessed and glorious porch of his imperiall Highnesse interposing himselfe as a mediatur, signifying that from the partes of Poland you were furnished with coine, gun-powder, masses of ships, guns, and other necessaries, and crauing peace on the behalfe of the kingdome and king of Poland, and making intercession, that the saide king might not be molested nor troubled by the meanes of the Grand Signor, & declaring that this was your Maiesties most earnest desire; so soone as the report and intercession of your Maiesties Embassadour was signified vnto the Grand Signor, for your sake, vnto whom all honour and fauourable regard is due; vpon the condition aforesaid, namely, that the wicked Cosacks might be sought out and grieuouly punished, or that their offences might be remitted for the value of some small gift, vpon this condiction (I say) the letters of his imperiall Highnesse were sent vnto the king of Poland. Howbeit had not this conclusion of league and amitie bene solicited on the behalfe of your Maiestie, his imperiall Highnesse would neuer haue vouchsafed the same vnto the kingdome of Poland. But for your Maiesties sake his imperiall Highnesse hath exhibited this so singular a fauour vnto the saide king and kingdome of Poland. And hercof your Maiestie and the king of Poland ought certainly to be perswaded. We wish your Maiestie most happily and well to fare. Given at Constantinople in the ende of the moneth called Sabau, in the yeare of our sacred prophet Mahomet 998, and in the yeere of Iesus 1590, the 12 of June.

to the Right worshipfull companie of the English Marchants for the Leuant, the seuenth of Ianuarie 1592.

Lizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, France, and Irelande, defender of the faith &c. To all our Officers, ministers and subiects, and to all other people aswell within this our Realme of England, as else where under our obexance and iurisdiction or otherwise vnto whom these our letters shalbe scene, shewed, or read, greeting,

Where our welbeloued subiects Edward Osborne knight Alderman of our citie of London, William Hareborne Esquire, and Richard Scaper of our saide citie Marchant, haue by great aduicature and industrie with their great cost and charges ges by the space of sunny late yeeres trauelled, and caused trauell to be taken aswell by secrete and good meanes, as by dangerous weapes and passages both by lande and sea to finde out and set open a trade of marchandize and traffike into the landes, Ilandes, Dominions, and territories of the great Turke, commonly called the Grand Signor, not before that time in the memoire of any man now living knownen to be commonly used and frequented by way of marchandize by any the marchantes or other subiectes of vs or our progenitoys: And also haue by their like good meanes and industrie and great charges procured of the sayde Grand Signor in our name, amitie, safetie and freedom for trade and traffike of marchandize to be used and continued by our subiects within his sayd dominions, whereby we perceiue and finde that both many good actions haue bene done and performed, and hereafter are likely continually to be done and performed for the peace of Christendome: Namely by the reliefe and discharge of many Christians which haue bene, and which hereafter may happen to be in chaldome and bondage vnder the sayde Grand Signor and his vassals or subiects, And also good and profitable bent and vterance of the commodities of our Realme, and sundry other great benefites to the auancement of our honour and dignitie Royall, the maintenance of our Naue, the encrease of our customes, and the reuenues of our Crowne, and generally the great wealth of our whole Realme.

And whereas we are enformed of the sayd Edward Osborne knight, William Hareborne, and Richard Staper, that George Barne, Richard Marrine, Iohn Harte knights, and other marchants of our sayd Citie of London haue by the space of eight or nine yeeres past ioyned themselves in companie, trade and traffike with them the sayd Edward Osborne knight, William Hareborne and Richard Staper, into the sayde dominions of the sayd great Turke, to the furtherance thereof and the good of the Realme.

And whereas further it is made knownen vnto vs, that within fewe yeeres now past our louing and good subiects Thomas Cordall, Edward Holmeden, William Garraway and Paul Banning, and sundry other marchants of our said Citie of London, haue likewise at their great costes and charges, builded and furnished diuerse good and seruicable shippes and therewith to their like costs and charges haue traded and frequented, and from time to time doe trade and frequent and traffike by sea with the commodities of our Realme to Venice, Zante, Candie, and Zephalonia and other the dominions of the Segniorie and State of Venice, and thereby haue made and mainteyned, and doe make and continually maintaine diuers good shippes with mariners skilfull and fite and necessarie for our seruice: and doe vent out of our Realme into those partes diuerse commodities of our Realme, and returne hither into our sayde Realme many good and necessarie commodities for the common wealth thereof: All which traffike, as well inward as outward until it hath bene otherwise brought to passe by the sayde endeuours, costs, and charges of our sayde subiects, was in effect by our subiectes wholly discontinued.

Knowe yee, that hereupon we greatly tennying the wealch of our people and the encouragement of them and other our louing subiects in their good enterprises for the auancement of lawfull traffike to the benefite of our common wealth, haue of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion giuen and graunted, and by these presents for vs, our heyres, and successours, doe giue and graunt vnto our sayd trustie and welbeloued subiectes Edward Osborne Knight, George Barne Knight, George Bonde knight, Richard Marrine knight, Iohn Harte knight, Iohn Hawkins knight, William Massam, Iohn Spencer, Richard Saltonstall, Nicholas Mosley Aldermen of our sayde Citie of London, William Hareborne, Edward Barton, William Borrough Esquires, Richard Staper, Thomas Cordall, Henrie Paruis, Thomas Laurence, Edward Holmeden, William Garraway, Robert Dowe, Paul Banning, Roger Clarke, Henrie Anderson, Robert Offley, Philip Grimies, Andrewe Banning, James Staper, Robert Sadler, Leonarde Power, George Salter, Nicholas Leate, Iohn Eldred, William Shales, Richard May, William Wilkes, Andrewe Fones, Arthur Jackson, Edmund Ansell, Ralph Ashley, Thomas Farrington, Robert Sandie, Thomas Garraway, Edward Lethlande, Thomas Dalkins, Thomas Norden, Robert Bare, Edward Sadler, Richard Darfall, Richard Martine Junior, Ralph Fitch, Nicholas Pearde, Thomas Simons, and Francis Dorrington, that they and euery of them by the name of Gouernour and companie of Marchants of the Leuant shall from hence forth for the terme of twelue yeeres next ensuing the date hereof bee one bodie, fellowshippe and companie of themselves both in deede and in name: And then by the name of Gouernour and companie of marchantes of the Leuant wee doe ordeyne, incorporate, name, and declare by these presentes, and that the same fellowshippe and companie from hence forth shall and may haue one Gouernour. And in consideration that the sayde Edward Osborne Knight hath bene of the

A privilege for the East Indies.

And that the sayde Gouvernour and companie of Marchantes of the Leuant, or the greater part of them for the better gouernement of the sayde fellowshippe and companie, shall and may within fortie dayes next and immediatly following after the date hereof, and so from thence forth yeerely during the continuance of this our graunt, assemble themselves in some convenient place, and that they or the greater parte of them being so assembled, shall and may elect, ordaine, nominate, and appoint twelue discrete and honest persons of the sayde companie to be assistants to the sayde Gouvernour, and to continue in the sayde office of assistants, untill they shall die or bee remooued by the sayde Gouvernour and companie or the greater part of them. And if it happen the sayde assistants or any of them to die, or be remooued from their sayde office at anye time during the continuance of this our graunt: that then and so often it shall and may bee lawfull to and for the sayde Gouvernour and companie of marchantes of the Leuant, or the greater part of them to elect and chuse one or moze other persons of the sayd companie into the place or places of euery such person or persons so dying or happening to be remooued, as is aforesayde. And wee will and ordaine that the same person or persons so as is aforesayde to be elected shall be of the sayd number of assistants of the sayde companie. And this to be done so often as the case shall so require. And that it shall and may be lawfull to and for the sayde Edwarde Osborne Knight, George Barne Knight, George Bonde knight, Richard Martine knight, Iohn Hart knight, Iohn Hawkins knight, William Massam, Iohn Spencer, Richard Saltonstall, Nicholas Mosley, William Hareborne, Edwarde Barron, William Borrough, Richard Staper, Thomas Cordall, Henrie Paruis, Thomas Laurence, Edwarde Holmeden, William Garraway, Robert Dowe, Paul Banning, Roger Clarke, Henrie Anderson, Robert Offley, Philip Grimes, Andrew Banning, James Staper, Robert Sadler, Leonarde Power, George Salter, Nicholas Leate, Iohn Eldred, William Shales, Richard May, William Wilkes, Andrew Fones, Arthur Iackion, Edmund Ansell, Ralph Ashley, Thomas Farrington, Robert Sandie, Thomas Garraway, Edwarde Lethlande, Thomas Dalkins, Thomas Norden, Robert Bare, Edward Sadler, Richard Darfall, Richard Martine Junior, Ralph Fitch, Nicholas Pearde, Thomas Simons, and Francis Dorrington aforesayde, or any of them to assemble themselves for or about any the matters, causes or affaires or busineses of the sayde trade in any place or places for the same convenient from time to time during the sayde terme of twelue yeeres within our dominions or else where. And that also it shall and may bee lawfull for them or the moze part of them to make, ordaine and constitute reasonable lawes and orders for the good gouernement of the sayde companie, and for the better aduancement and continuance of the sayde trade and traffike: the same lawes and ordinances not being contrarie or repugnant to the lawes, statutes or customes of our Realme: And the same lawes and ordinances so made to put in vze, and execute accordingly, and at their pleasures to reuoke and altee the same lawes and ordinances or any of them as occasion shall require.

And we doe also for vs, our heires and successors of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion graunt to and with the sayd Gouvernour and companie of marchantes of the Leuant, that when and as often at any time during the sayde terme and space of twelue yeeres as any custome, pondage, subsidie or other duetie shall be due and payable vnto vs, our heires, or successors for any goods or marchandize whatsoeuer, to be carried or transported out of this our port of London into any the dominions aforesayde, or out of or from any the sayde dominions vnto our sayde port of London, that our Customs, and all other our Officers for receites of custome, pondage, subsidie or other duetie vnto whom it shall appertaine, shall vpon the request of the sayde Gouvernour for the time being, giue vnto the sayde companie three monethes time for the payment of the one halfe, and other three monethes for the payment of the other halfe of their sayde custome, pondage, or other subsidie or duetie for the same, receiuing good and sufficient boude and securitie to our vse for the payment of the same accordingly. And vpon receipt of the sayde boude to giue them out their cockets or other warrants to lade out and receiue in the same their goods by vertue hereof without any disturbance. And that also as often as at any time during the sayde terme of twelue yeeres any goods or marchandize of any of the sayde companie laden from this our port of London in any the dominions beforesayde shall happen to miscarie befoze their safe discharge in the partes for and to the which they be sent: That then and so often so much custome, pondage, and other subsidie as they answered vs for the same, shall after due prooue made befoze the Tresourour of England for the time being of the sayde losse, and the iust quantitie thereof, be by the bectue hereof allowed vnto them, by warrant of the sayde Tresourour to the sayde Customs in the next marchandize that they shall or may shippe for those partes, according to the true rates of the customes, pondage, or subsidies heretofore payde for the goods so lost or any part or parcell thereof.

And for that the sayde companie are like continually to bring into this our Realme a much greater quantitie of fozen commodities from the fozen Countreyes, places, or territories aforesayde, then here can be spent for the necessarie vse of the same, which of necessitie must be transported into other countreyes, and there vented, we for vs, our heires and successors of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion doe graunt to and with the sayd Gouvernour and companie that at all times from time to time during the space of thirteene moneths next after the discharge of any the sayde goods so brought in, and the subsidies, pondage, customes and other duties for the same being befoze hande payde or compounded for as aforesayd, it shall be lawfull for them or any of them or any other person or persons whatsoeuer being naturall subiects of the Realme which may or shall buy the same of them or any of them to transport the same in English bottomes freely out of this Realme without payment of any further custome, pondage, or other subsidie to vs, our heires or successors for the same, whereof the sayde subsidies, pondage, or customes or other duties shall be so forweyld payde and compounded for, as aforesayd, and so proued. And the sayd customer by vertue hereof shall vpon due and sufficient prooue thereof made in the custome house giue them sufficient cocket or certificate for the safe passing out thereof accordingly. And to the ende no deceit be vled herein to vs our heires, and successors, certificate shall be brought from our collector of custome inwards to our customer outwards that the sayd marchandizes haue within the time limited answered their due custome, subsidie, pondage and other duties for the same inwards.

And furthermore we of our ample and abundant grace, meere motion, and certaine knowledge haue graunted, and by these presents for vs our heires and successours doe graunt vnto the said Gouvernours and companie of marchantes of the Leuant, that they and such onely as be and shall be of that companie, shall for the sayd terme of twelue yeeres haue, vse, and enioy the whole and ouely trade and traffike, and the whole entire and onely libertie, vse, and priuiledge of crabling and traffiking, and vsing seate of marchandise by and throught the Leuant seas otherwise called the Mediterran seas into and from the sayd dominions of the Grand Signor, and dominions of the state of Venice; and by and throught the sayd Grand Signiors dominions to and from such other places in the East Indies discovered as aforesayd. And that they the sayd Gouvernour and companie of marchantes of the Leuant and euery particular and seuerall person of that companie their and euery one of their seruants, factors, and deputies shall haue full and free authoritie, libertie, facultie, licence, and power to trade and trafficke by and throught the sayd Leuant seas into and from all and euery the sayd dominions of the sayde Grand Signor, and the dominions of the state of Venice, and the sayde Indies, and into and from all places where by occasion of the sayd trade they shall happen to arrive or come, whither they be Christians, Turkes, Gentiles, or others: And by and through the sayd Leuant Seas into and from all other seas, riuers, portes, regions, territories, dominions, coastes and places with their ships, barkes, pinases and other vessels, and with such mariners and men as they will leade or haue with them, or sende for the sayde trade as they shall thinke good at their owne proper costes and expences.

And for that the shippes sayling into the sayde Countreies must take their due and proper times to proceede in these voyages, which otherwise as wee well perceiue can not be performed in the rest of the yeere following: Therefore we of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and mere motion for vs our heires and successors doe graunt to and with the sayd Gouvernour and companie of Marchantes of the Leuant, that foure good shippes well furnished with ordnance and other munition for their defence, and two hundred mariners English men to guide and sayle in the same foure shippes at all times during the sayde twelue yeeres shall quietly bee permitted and suffered to depart and goe in the sayde voyages, according to the purpose of these presents, without any stay or contradiction by vs our heires and successors, or by the Lord high Admirall or any other officer or subiect of vs, our heires or successors in any wise: Any restraint, lawe, statute, vlage or matter whatsoener to the contrarie notwithstanding.

Provided neuerthelesse, that if wee shall at any time within the sayde twelue yeeres haue iust cause to arme our Naue in warrelke manner in defence of our Realme, or for offence of our enemies: and that it shall be founde needefull and conuenient for vs to toyne to our Naue the shippes of our subiects to be also armed for warres to such number as cannot bee supplied if the sayd foure shippes should be permitted to depart as aboue is mentioned; then vpon knowledge giuen by vs or our Admirall to the sayde Gouvernour or companie about the fifteenth day of the moneth of March, or thye monethes before the saide companie shall beginne to make ready the same foure shippes that we may not spare the sayd foure ships and the mariners requisite for them to be out of our Realme during the time that our Naue shall be vpon the seas, that then the sayde companie shall forbear to send such foure shippes for their trade of marchandise untill that we shall retake our sayd Naue from the sayd seruice.

And further our will and pleasure is, and wee doe by these presentes graunt that it shall be lawfull to and for the sayd Gouvernour and companie of Marchantes of the Leuant to haue and vse in and about the affaires of the sayde companie a common seale for matters concerning the sayde companie and trade. And that also it shall be lawfull for the Marchants, Mariners, and Sea-men, which shall be vsed and employed in the sayde trade and voyage to set and place in the toppes of their ships or other vessels the Armes of England with the redde-crosse in white ouer the same as heretofore they haue vsed.

And we of our further Royall fauour and of our especiall grace, certaine knowledge, and mere motion haue granted and by these presents for vs our heires and successors doe graunt to the sayd Gouvernour and companie of Marchants of the Leuant, that the sayde landes, territories, and dominions of the sayde Grand Signor, or the dominions of the Signiorie of Venice, or any of them within the sayde Leuant or Meditteran sea shall not be visited, frequented, or haunted by the sayde Leuant sea by way of marchandize by any other our subiects during the saide terme of twelue yeeres contrarie to the true meaning of these presents. And by vertue of our prerogatiue Royall, which wee will not in that behalfe haue argued or brought in question, wee straightly charge, commaunde and prohibite for vs our heires and successors all our subiects of what degree or qualitie soeuer they bee, that none of them directly or indirectly doe visite, haunt, frequent, trade, trafike or aduventure by way of marchandise into or from any of the sayd dominions of the sayd Grand Signor, or the dominions of the saide Segniorie of Venice, by or through the sayde Leuant sea other then the sayd Gouvernour and companie of marchants of the Leuant, and such particular persons as be or shall be of that companie, their factors, agents, seruants and assignes. And further for that wee plainly vnderstande that the States and Governours of the citie and Segniorie of Venice haue of late time set and rayled a newe impost and charge ouer and besides their auncient impost, custome, and charge of and vpon all manner of marchandize of our Realme brought into their dominions, and also of and vpon all marchandise caried or laden from their sayd Countrey or dominions by our subiects or in the ships or bottomis of any of our subiectes to the great and incoletable charge and hinderance of our sayd subiects trading thither; wee therefore minding the redresse thereof, doe also by these presents for vs, our heires and successors further straightly prohibite prohibite and forbid not onely the subiects of the sayde State and Segniorie of Venice, but also of all other Nations of Countreies whatsoever other then the sayd Gouvernour and companie of marchants of the Leuant, and such onely as be or shall be of that companie, their factors, agents, seruantes, and assignes: That they or any of them during the sayde terme of twelue peeres, shall bring or cause to be brought into this our Realme of Englande, or any part thereof anie manner of small fruities called cozrants, being the raplins of Corinth, or wine of Candie, vnllesse it be by and with the licence, consent, and agreement of the sayde Gouvernour and companie in writing vnder their sayd common seale first had and obteyned vpon paine vnto every such person and persons that shall trade and traffike into any the sayde dominions of the State and Segniorie of Venice by sea, or that shall bring or cause to be brought into our saide Realme any of the said cozrants being the raplins of Corinth, or wines of Candia, other then the sayd companie in paine of our indignation, and of forfeiture and losse aswell of the shippe and ships with the furniture thereof, as also of the goods, marchandize, and thinges whatsoever they be of those which shall attempt or presume to commit or doe any matter or thing contrarie to the prohibition aforesayd. The one halfe of all the saide forfeitures to be to vs, our heires and successours, and the other halfe of all and every the sayde forfeitures we doe by these presents, of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion clearely and wholie for vs, our heires and successours, giue and graunt vnto the saide Gouvernour and companie of marchantes of the Leuant,

And further all and enery the sayde offendours for their sayde contempt to suffer imprisonment during our pleasures, and such other punishment as to vs for so high a contempt shall seeme meete and conuenient, and not to be in any wise deliuered untill they and every of them shall be come bounde vnto the sayd Gouvernour for the time being in the summe of one thousand poundes or lesse at no time, then after to saile or traffike by sea into any the dominions aforesaide, or to bring or cause to be brought from any the places aforesayde any cozrants, raplins of Corinth, or wines of Candia contrarie to our expresse commaundement in that behalfe hercin set downe and published.

Provided alwayes, and our expresse will is notwithstanding the premises that if our sayde subiectes shall at any time hereafter be recompensed of and for all such newe imposts and charges as they and every of them shall pay, and likewise be freely discharged of and from the payment of all manner of newe imposte or taxe for any of their marchandise which they hereafter shall bring into or from any the dominions of the sayde State or Segniorie of Venice, and from all bondes and other assurances by them or any of them to be made for or in that behalfe, that then immediatly from and after such recompence and discharge made as aforesayde our sayde prohibition and restraint in these presents mentioned, shall not be of any strength or force against the sayde Citie or State of Venice, or any the subiects thereof, but for and during such time onely and in such case when hereafter the sayde State of Venice shall againe beginne to rare or leuie any manner of newe imposte within the sayde dominions vpon any the goods or marchandizes of our sayde subiectes hereafter to be brought into any the dominions of the said State or Segniorie of Venice. Any thing in these our letters Patents contained to the contrarie thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

And further wee straightly charge and commaunde, and by these presents prohibite all and singular Customers and Collectors of our Customes, pondage, and subsidies, and all other Officers within our Port and Citie of London and else where, to whom it shall appertaine and every of them, That they or any of them by themselves, their clerkes, or substitutes shall not receiue or take, or suffer to be receiued or taken for vs or in our name, or to our vse, or in the name, or vnto the vse of our heires or successours of any person or persons, any summe or summes of money, or other consideration during the sayde terme of twelue yerres for any custome, pondage, taxe or subsidie of any cozrants, raplins of Corinth, or wines of Candie aforesayd saue onely of and in the name of the sayde Gouvernour and companie of marchantes of the Leuant, or of some of that companie without the consent of the sayde Gouvernour and companie in writing vnder their sayd common seale, first had and obteyned, and vnto them shewed for the testifying their sayd consent. And for the better and more sure obseruation thereof wee will and graunt for vs, our heires or successours by these presents, that our Treasurer and Barons of the Exchequer for the time being by force of these presents, and the inrollment thereof in the sayde Court of our Exchequer, at all and every time and times during the sayde terme of twelue peeres, at and vpon the request of the sayde Gouvernour and companie, their Attourney or Attourneys, Deputies or assignes, shall and may make and direct vnder the seale of the sayde Court one or more sufficient writte or writtes close or patent, unto euery or any of the sayd Customers or other Officers to whom it shall appertaine, commaunding them and euery of them thereby, that neither they nor any of them at any time or times during the sayd space of twelue yeeres shall take entrie of any coyants, raisins of Corinth, or wines of Candia, or take or make any agreement for any custome, pondage, or other subside for any of the sayd coyants, raisins of Corinth, or wines of Candie, with any person or persons whatsoeuer, other then with, or in the name and by the priuie of the sayd gouernour and company or some of the same company.

And further of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion we haue condescended and granted, and by these presents for vs our heires and successours doe condescend and graunt to the sayd Gouernour and company of marchants of Leuant, that wee our heires and successours, during the sayd terme, will not graunt libertie, licence, or power to any person or persons whatsoeuer contrary to the tenour of these our letters patents, to saile, passe, trade, or traffique by the sayde Leuant Sea, into, or from the sayde dominions of the sayd Grand Signior or the dominions of the State of Venice or any of them, contrary to the true meaning of these presents, without the consent of the sayd Gouernour and Companie or the most part of them.

And whereas Henry Farrington and Henry Hewet haue not yet assented to bee incorporated into the sayd Societie of Gouernour and companie of marchants of Leuant, neuertheless sicence, as we be informed, they haue bene traders that way heretofore; our will and pleasure is, and we doe hereby expressly commaund and charge that if it happen at any time within two moneths next following after the date hereof, the sayd Henry Farrington and Henry Hewet or either of them, to submit themselues to be of the sayd companie, and doe giue such assurance as the sayd Gouernour and companie, or the moze part of them shall allow of, to beare, pay, and perfozme such orders, constitutions, payments and contributions, as other of the sayd companie shall be ordered to beare, pay, and perfozme, that then euery of the sayd Henry Farrington and Henry Hewet so doing and submitting himselfe, shall vpon his or their request vnto the sayd Gouernour bee admitted into the sayd companie and corpozation of Gouernour and companie of marchants of Leuant, and haue and enioy the same, and as great liberties, priuileges, and preheminences, as the rest of the sayde corpozation or companie may, or ought to haue by vertue of this our graunt. Any thing in these presents contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

And our will and pleasure is, and hereby wee doe also ordaine that it shall and may bee lawfull, to, and for the sayde Gouernour and companie of marchants of Leuant or the moze part of them, to admit into, and to be of the sayd companie, any such as haue bene or shall bee employed as seruants, factorz, or agents in the trade of marchandise by the sayd Leuant Seas, into any the countries, dominions or territories of the sayd Grand Signior or Signiorie or State of Venice, according as they or the most part of them shall thinke requisite.

And where Anthony Radcliffe, Steuen Some, and Robert Brooke Aldermen of the saide Citie of London, Simon Laurence, Iohn Wattes, Iohn Newton, Thomas Middleton, Robert Coxe, Iohn Blunt, Charles Faith, Thomas Barnes, Alexander Dansey, Richard Aldworth, Henry Cowlthirke, Caesar Doffie, Martine Bonde, Oliuer Stile and Nicolas Stile Marchants of London for their abilities and sufficiencies haue bene thought fit to be also of the sayd Company of the saide gouernour and Company of Marchants of Leuant: Our will and pleasure and expresse commaundment is, and wee doe hereby establish and ordeine, that euery such of the same Anthony Radcliffe, Steuen Some, Robert Brooke, Simon Laurence, Iohn Wattes, Iohn Newton, Thomas Middleton, Robert Coxe, Iohn Blunt, Charles Faith, Thomas Barnes, Alexander Dansey, Richard Aldworth, Henry Cowlthirke, Caesar Doffie, Martine Bonde, Oliuer Stile, and Nicolas Stile, as shall pay vnto the saide Gouernour and companie of Marchants of Leuant the summe of one hundred and thirtie poundes of lawfull English money within two monethes next after the date hereof towards the charges that the same Company haue already bene at in and about the establishing of the sayde trades shall from thencefoorth bee of the same companie of Marchants of Leuant as fully and amply and in like maner, as any other of that Societie or Company.

Provided also, that wee our heires and successours at any time during the sayd twelue yeeres may lawfully appoynt and authorize two other persons exercising the lawfull trade of marchandize, and being fit men to bee of the sayd companie of Gouernour and companie of marchants of Leuant, so that the sayd persons to bee nominated or authorized, shall aide, doe, beare, and paie such payments and charges touching and concerning the same trade and Companie of marchants of Leuant, ratable as other of the sayd Companie of marchants of Leuant shall, and doe, or ought to beare and pay : and doe also performe and obserue the orders of the sayd Companie allowable by this our graunt, as others of the same doe or ought to doe . And that such two persons so to bee appointed by vs our heires or successours, shall and may with the sayd Company vse the trade and seate of marchandise aforesayd, and all the liberties and priuileges herein before granted, according to the meaning of these our letters patents, any thing in these our letters patents contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Provided also, that if any of the marchants before by these presents named or incorporated, to bee of the sayd fellowship of Gouvernour and companie of the marchants of Leuant, shall not bee willing to continue or bee of the same Companie, and doe giue notice thereof, or make the same known to the sayd Gouvernour within two moneths next after the date hereof, that then such person so giuing notice, shall no further or any longer be of that companie, or haue trade into those parties, nor be at any time after that of the same corporation or companie, or vse trade into any the territories or countries aforesayd.

Provided alwayes neuerthelesse, that euery such person so giuing notice and hauing at this present any goods or marchandises in any the Territories or countreys of the sayd Grand Signior, or Segntorie or State of Venice, may at any time within the space of eightene moneths next, and immediately following after the date hercof, haue free libertie, power, and authoritie to retorne the same or the value thereof into this Realme, without vsing any traffique there, but immediately from thence hither, paying, bearing, answering, and performing all such charges, duties, and summes of money ratable as other of the same corporation or company doe or shall pay, beare, answer, or performe for the like.

Provided also, that if any of the persons before by these presents named or incorporated to bee of the sayd fellowship of Gouvernour and Companie of the marchants of Leuant, or which hereafter shall bee admitted to bee of the sayd Corporation or Companie, shall at any time or times hereafter refuse to bee of the sayd Corporation or Companie, or to beare, pay, or be contributorie to, or not beare and pay such ratable charges and allowances, or to obserue or performe such ordinances to bee made as is aforesayd, as other of the same company are, or shall bee ordered, to beare, paie, or performe, that then it shall and may bee lawfull for the rest of the sayd Gouvernour and companie of marchants of Leuant, presently to expell, remooue, and displace euery such person so refusing, or not bearing or paying out, of, and from the sayd Corporation and companie, and from all priuilege, libertie, and preheminence which any such person should, or might claime, or haue by vertue of this our graunt, and in place of them to elect others exercising the lawfull trade of marchandise to bee of the sayd Companie. And that euery such person so expelled, remooued, or displaced by consent of the sayd Gouvernour and companie of marchants of Leuant, or the more part of them, shall bee from thenceforth utterly disabled to take any benefite by vertue of this priuilege, or any time after to bee admitted or received againe into the same, any thing in these presents contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Provided alwayes, that if it shall hereafter appeare to vs our heires and successours, that this graunt or the continuance thereof in the whole or in any part thereof, shall not bee profitable to vs our heires and successours, or to this our realme, that then and from thenceforth, vpon and after eightene moneths warning to bee giuen to the sayd companie by vs our heires and successours, this present graunt shall cease, bee voyd, and determined to all intents, constructions and purposes.

And further of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion, wee haue condescended and graunted, and by these presents for vs our heires and successours, doe condescend and graunt to the sayde Gouvernour and companie of marchants of Leuant, that if at the ende of the sayd terme of twelue yeeres it shall seme meete and conuenient to the sayde Gouvernour and Companie, or any the parties aforesayd, that this present graunt shall bee continued : And if that also it shall appeare vnto vs, our heires and successours, that the continuance thereof shall not bee prejudiciall or hurtfull to this our realme, but that wee shall finde the further continuance thereof profitable for vs our heires and successours and for our realme with such conditions as are herein mentioned, or with some alteration or qualification thereof, that then wee our heires and successours at the instance and humble petition of the sayde Gouvernour and Companie, or any of them so suing for the same, and such other person and persons our subiectes as they shall nominate and appoint, or shall bee by vs, our heires and successours newly nominated, not exceeding in number twelue, new letters patents vnder the great seale of England

England in due forme of lawe with like covenants, graunts, clauses, and articles, as in these presents are contained, or with addition of other necessarie articles or changing of these in some partes, for, and during the full terme of twelue yeeres then next following. Willing now hereby, and straightly commaunding and charging all and singular our Admirals, Vice-admirals, Iustices, Maiors, Sherriffes, Escheatores, Constables, Bailiffes, and all and singular other our Officers, Ministers, Lige men and Subjects whatsoever, to bee aiding, fauouring, helping, and assisting vnto the sayd Companie and their successours, and to their Deputies, Officers, Factors, seruantes, assignes and ministers, and euery of them, in executing and enjoying the premisses as well on land as on Sea, from time to time, & at all times when you or any of you shall thereto bee required, any Statute, Acte, ordinance, Prouiso, Proclamation or restraint heretofore had, made, set forth, ordained or provided, or any other matter, cause or thing whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

Although expresse mention of the true yeerely value or certaintie of the premisses, or any of them, or of any other gifts or graunts by vs, or any of our progenitours to the sayde Governour and Companie of the marchantsof Lenant before this time made, in these presents is not made: Or any Statute, Acte, Ordinance, prouision, proclamation or restraint to the contrary thereof before this time had, made, done, or provided, or any other matter, thing or cause whatsoever, in any wise notwithstanding. In witness whereof wee haue caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness our selfe at Westminster the seueneth day of Ianuarie in the foure and thirtieth yeere of our raigne.

To the Worshipfull and his very louing Uncle M.

Rowland Hewish Esquier, at Sand in Deuonshire.

Ir, considering the goodnesse of your Nature which is woont kindly to accept from a friend, euen of meane things being giuen with a good heart, I haue presumed to trouble you with the reading of this rude discourse of my trauailes into Turkie, and of the deliuerie of the present with such other occurrents as there happened woorthie the obseruation: of all which proceedings I was an eie-witnesse, it pleasing the Ambassadour to take mee in with him to the Grand Signior. If for lacke of time to put it in order I haue not performed it so well as it ought, I craue pardon, assuring you that to my knowledge I haue not missed in the truth of any thing. If you aske mee what in my trauels I haue learned, I answer as a noble man of France did to the like demand, Hoc vnum didici, mundi contemptum: and so concluding with the wise man in the booke of the Preacher, that all is vanitie, and one thing onely is necessarie, I take my leaue and commit you to the Almighty. From London the 16. March 1597.

Your louing Nephew

A description of a Voiage to Constantinople and Syria, begun the 21. of March 1593. and ended the 9. of August, 1595. wherein is shewed the order of deliuering the second Present by Master Edward Barton her maiesties Ambassador, which was sent from her Maiestie to Sultan Murad Can,

Emperour of Turkie.

Et set saile in the Ascension of London, a new shippe very well appointed, of two hundred and thre score tunnes (whereof was master one William Broadbanke, a prouident and skilfull man in his facultie) from Grauesend the one and twentie of March 1593. And vpon the eight of Aprill following wee passed the streights of Gibraltar, and with a small Easterne gale, the 24. of the same, we arriued at Zante an Island vnder the Venetians. The fourth of May wee departed, and the one and twentie wee arriued at Alexandretta in Cilicia in the very bottome of the Mediterrane sea, a roade some 25. miles distant from Antioch, where our marchants land their goods to bee sent for Aleppo.

From thence wee set saile the first of June, and by contrary windes were driven vpon the coast of Caramania into a road neere a litle Island where a castle standeth, called Castle Rosso, some thirtie leagues to the Eastwards of the Rhodes, where after long search for fresh water, we could finde none, vntill certaine pooze Greekes of the Island brought vs to a well where we had 5 or 6 tunns. That part of the country next the sea is very barren & full of mountains, yet found we there an olde tombe of marble, with an epitaph of an ancient Greeke character, by antiquity neere woꝛne out and past reading; which to the beholders seemed a monument of the greatnesse of the Grecian monarchy. From thence we went to the Rhodes; and by contrary windes were driven into a port of Candy, called Sirtia: this Island is vnder the Venetians, who haue there 600 souldiers, beside certaine Greekes, continually in pay. Here with contrary winds we stayed six weeks, and in the end, hauing the winde prosperous, we sailed by Nicaria, Pharos, Delos, and Andros, with sight of many other Islands in the Archipelago, and arrived at the two castles in Hellespont the 24 of August. Within few dayes after we came to Galipoli some thirtie miles from this place, where foure of vs tooke a Parma or boat of that place, with two watermen, which rowed vs along the Thracian shoꝛe to Constantinople; which sometime sailing and sometime rowing, in foure dayes they performed. The first of September we arrived at the famous port of the Grand Signior, where we were not a litle welcome to M. Edward Barton vntill then her Maiesties Agent, who (with many other great persons) had for many dayes expected the present. Five or six dayes after the shippe arrived neere the Seuen towers, which is a very strong hold, and so called of so many turrets, which it hath, standing neere the sea side, being the first part of the city that we came vnto. Where the Agent appointed the master of the Ascension to stay with the shippe vntill a fitt winde and opportunity serued to bring her about the Seraglio to salute the Grand Signior in his moskyra or church: for you shall vnderstand that he hath built one neere the wall of his Seraglio or pallace adioyning to the Sea side; whereunto twise or thise a weeke hee resorteth to performe such religious rites as their law requireth: where hee being within few dayes after, our shippe set out in their best maner with flagges, streamers and pendants of diuers coloured silke, with all the mariners, together with most of the Ambassadors men, hauing the winde faire, and came within two cables length of this his moskira, where (hee to his great content beholding the shippe in such brauery) they discharged first two volies of small shot, and then all the great ordinance twise ouer, there being seuen and twentie or eight and twentie pieces in the ship. Which performed, he appointed the Bustangi-Bassa or captain of the great and spacious garden or parke, to giue our men thanks, with request that some other day they would shew him the like spoꝛte when hee would haue the Sultana or Empresse a beholder thereof, which few dayes after at the shippes going to the Customs-house they performed.

The grand Signiors salutation thus ended, the master brought the ship to an anchor at Rapamac neere the ambassadors house, where hee likewise saluted him with all his great ordinance once ouer, and where he landed the Present, the deliuerie whereof for a time was staied: the cause of which staie it shall neither be dishonorable for our nation, or that woꝛthy man the ambassadoꝛ to shew you. At the departure of Sinan Bassa the chiefe Vizir, and our ambassadors great friend toward the warres of Hungarie there was another Bassa appointed in his place, a churlish and harsh natured man, who vpon occasion of certaine Genouezes, escaping out of the castles standing toward the Eurine Sea, now called the blacke Sea, there imprisoned, apprehended and threatened to execute one of our Englishmen called Iohn Field, for that hee was taken thereabouts, and knowne not many dayes before to haue brought a letter to one of them: vpon the soliciting of whose libertie there fell a iarre betweene the Bassa (being now chiefe Vizir) and our ambassadoꝛ, and in choler he gaue her maiesties ambassadoꝛ such woꝛds, as without sustaining some great indignitie hee could not put by. Whereupon after the arrivall of the Present, he made an Arz, that is, a bill of Complaint to the grand Signior against him, the maner in exhibiting whereof is thus performed.

The plaintifes expect the grand Signiors going abroad from his pallace, either to Santa Sophia or to his church by the sea side, whither, with a Perma (that is one of their vsuall whirries) they appoꝛch within some two or thre score yards, where the plaintife standeth by, and holdeth his petition ouer his foꝛthead in sight of the grand Signior (for his church is open to the Sea side) the rest sitting still in the boat, who appointeth one of his Dwarfes to receiue them, and to bring them to him. A Dwarf, one of the Ambassadors fauorites, so soone as he was discerned, beckned him to the shoꝛe side, tooke his Arz, and with speed caried it to the grand Signior. Now the effect of it was this; that except his highnesse would redresse this so great an indignitie, which the Vizir his slaue had offered him and her maiestie in his person, he was purposed to detain the Present vntill such time as he might by letters ouer-land from her maiestie be certified, whither he would would put vp so great an iniurie as it was. Whereupon he presently returned answere, requesting the ambassadoꝝ within an houre after to goe to the Douan of the Vizir, vnto whom himselfe of his charge would send a gowne of cloth of gold, and commaund him publickely to put it vpon him, and with kind entertainment to embrace him in signe of reconciliation. Whereupon our ambassadoꝝ returning home, tooke his horse, accompanied with his me, and came to the Vizirs court, where, according to the grand Signiors command, he with all shew of kindnesse embraced the ambassadoꝝ, and with courteous speeches reconciled himselfe, and with his own hands put the gowne of cloth of gold vpon his backe. Which done, hee with his attendants returned home, to the no small admiration of all Christians that heard of it, especially of the French and Venetian ambassadoꝝ, who neuer in the like case against the second person of the Turkish Empire durst haue attempted to hold an enterprize with hope of so friendly audience, and with so speedie redress. This reconciliation with the great Vizir thus made, the ambassadoꝝ prepared himselfe for the deuierie of the Present, which vpon the 7 of October 1593, in this maner he performed.

The great hall of iudice.

Reconciliation with the Vizir made.

The Ascension with her flags and streamers, as aforesaid, repaired nigh vnto the place where the ambassadoꝝ should land to go vnto the Seraglio: for you must vnderstand that all Christian ambassadoꝝ haue their dwelling in Pera where most Christians abide, from which place, except you would go 4 or 5 miles about, you cannot by land go to Constantinople, whereas by Sea it is little broder then the Thames. Our Ambassadoꝝ likewise appaſſelled in a sute of cloth of siluer, with an upper gowne of cloth of gold, accompanied with 7 gentlemen in costly lures of Satin; with 30 other of his men very well appaſſelled, and all in one liuerie of sad French russet cloth gownes, at his house tooke boate: at whose landing the ship discharged all her ordnance, where likewise attended 2 Bassas, with 40 or 50 Chauses to accompany y^e ambassadoꝝ to the court, & also horses for the ambassadoꝝ & his gentlemen, very richly furnished, with Turkish seruants attendaſſe to take the horses whe they should light. The ambassadoꝝ thus honorably accompanied, the Chauses fozeinost, next his men on foote all going by two and two, himselfe last with his Chause and Dugaman oꝝ Interpreter, and 4 Janissaries, which he doeth vsually entertaine in his house to accompany him continually aboad, came to the Seraglio about an English mile from the water side, where first hee passed a great gate into a large court (much like the space before White hall gate) where he with his gentlemen alighted and left their horses. From hence they passed into another stately court, being about 6 scope in bꝛeath, and some 10 scope yards long, with many trees in it; where all the court was with great pompe set in order to entertaine our ambassadoꝝ. Vpon the right hand all the length of the court was a gallerie arched ouer, and boꝛne by with stone pillars, much like the Roiall Exchange, where stood *most of his guard in rankes from the one end to the other in costly aray, with round head pieces on their heads of mettall and gilt ouer, with a great plume of feathers somewhat like a long bynch standing by before. On the left hand stood the Cappagies oꝝ porters, and the Chauses, All these courtiers being about the number of 2000. (as I might well gesse) most of them appaſſelled in cloth of gold, siluer, velvet, satin and scarlet, did together with bowing their bodies, laying their hands vpon their bꝛests in courteous maner of salutation, entertaine the Ambassadoꝝ: who likewise passing between them, & turning himselfe sometime to the right hand and sometime to the left, answered them with the like. As he thus passed along, certaine Chauses conducted him to the Douan, which is the seat of Justice, where certaine dayes of the weeke the grand Vizir, with the other Vizirs, the Cadi-lesker oꝝ lord chiefe Justice, & the Musti oꝝ high priest do sit to determine vpon such causes as be brought before them, which place is vpon the left side of this great court. Whither the ambassadoꝝ with his gentlemen came, where hee found the Vizir thus accompanied as aforesaid, who with great shew of kindnes received him: and after receit of her maiesties letters, & conference had of the Present, of her maiesties health, of the state of England, and such other matters as concerned our peaceable traffique in those parts: dinner being prepared was by many of y^e Courtiers brought into another inner roome next adioining, which consisted of an hundred dishes oꝝ therabouts, most boiled & roasted, where the ambassadoꝝ accompanied wth the Vizirs went to dinner, his gentlemen likewise with the rest of his men hauing a dinner with the like varietie prepared vpon y^e same side of the court, by theſe lues late doone to their meat, 40 or 50 Chauses standing at the vpper end attending vpon the gentlemen to see them serued in good order; their ozinke was water mingled with rose water & sugar brought in a Luthro (that is a goates skime) which a man carrieth at his backe, and vnder his arme leaſeth it run out at a spout into cups as men wil call for it. The dinner thus with good order brought in, and for halfe an houre with great sobrietie and silence performed, was not so orderly taken vp; for certaine Moglans officers of the kitchen (like her maiesties blake guard) came in disordered manner and tooke away the dishes, and he whose hungry ele one dish could not satifsie, turned two or three one into the other, and thus of a sudden was a cleane riddance made of all. The ambassadoꝝ after dinner with his gentlemen, by certaine officers were placed at the upper ende vpon the left side of the court, nere vnto a great gate which gaue entrance to a third court bring but litle, paved with stone. In the midst whereof was a litle house built of marble, as I take it, within which sate the grand Signor, according to whole commandement giuen there were gownes of cloth of gold brought out of the warrope, and put vpon the ambassadoz and 7 of his gentlemen, the ambassadoz himselfe hauing 2, one of gold, and the other of crimosin velvet, all the rest one a piece. Then certaine Cappagies had the Present, which was in trunks there ready, deliuered them by the ambassadozs men, it being 12 goodly pieces of gilt plate, 36 garments of fine English cloth of al colors, 20 garments of cloth of gold, 10 garments of sattin, 6 pieces of fine Holland, and certaine other things of good value; al which were caried round about the court, each man taking a piece, being in number very neere 100 parcels, and so 2 and 2 going round that all might see it, to the greater gloz of the present, and of him to whom it was giuen: they went into the innermost court passing by the window of that roome, where the grand Signior sate, who, as it went by to be laid by in certaine roomes adioining, tooke view of all. Presently after the present followed the ambassadoz with his gentlemen; at the gate of which court stood 20 or 30 Agaus which be eunuchs. Within the court yard were the Turkes Dwarfs and Dunbe men, being most of them youths. At the dooze of his roome stood the Bustangi-bassa, with another Bassa to lead the ambassadoz and his followers to the grand Signior who sate in a chaire of estate, apparellled in a gowne of cloth of siluer. The floore vnder his secte, which part was a foote higher then the rest, was couered with a carpet of green sattin embroidered most richly with siluer, orient perles & great Turkeses; & other part of the house was couered with a carpet of Carnation sattin embroidered w gold, none were in the roome with him, but a Bassa who stood next the wall ouer against him hanging down his head, & looking submissely vpon the ground as all his subiects doe in his presence. The ambassadoz thus betwixt two which stood at the dooze being led in, either of them taking an arme, kissed his hand, and so backward with his face to the Turke they brought him nigh the doze againe, where he stood untill they had like wise done so with all the rest of his gentlemen. Which ended, the ambassadoz, according as it is the custome when any present is deliuered, made his theze demands, such as he thought most expedient for her maiesties honor, & the peaceable traffique of our natio into his dominions: whereunto he answered in one word, Nolo, which is in Turkish as much as, it shal be done: for it is not the maner of the Turkish emperoz familiarly to confer with any Christian ambassadoz, but he appointeth his Uizir in his person to graunt their demands if they be to his liking; as to our ambassadoz he granted all his demands, & gaue order that his daily allowance for his house of moxy, flesh, wood, & haie, should be augmented with halfe as much moxe as it had bene before. Whereupon the ambassadoz taking his leaue, departed with his gentlemen the same way he came, the whole court saluting him as they did at his comming in; & comming to the second court to take our horses, after we were mounted, we staid halfe an houre, until the captain of the guard with 2000 horsemen at the least passed before, after whom followed 40 or 50 Chausles next before the ambassadoz to accompany him to his house. And as before at his landing, so now at his taking boat, the ship discharged all her great ordinance, where arriuing, he likewise had a great banquet prepared to entertaine those which came to bring him home. The pompe & solemnitie of the Present, with the day thus ended, he shortly after presented the Sultana or emperesse who (by reason that she is mother to him which was heire to the crown Imperial) is had in far greater reuerence then any of his other Queens or concubines. The Present sent her in her maiesties name was a iewel of her maiesties picture, set with some rubies and diamants, 3 great pieces of gilt plate, 10 garments of cloth of gold, a very fine case of glasse bottles siluer & gilt, with 2 pieces of fine Holland, which so gratefully she accepted, as that she sent to know of the ambassadoz what present he thought she might returne & would most delight her maiestie; who sent word that a sute of princely attire being after the Turkish fashion would for the rarenesse thereof be acceptable in England. Whereupon she sent an upper gowne of cloth of gold very rich, an vnder gowne of cloth of siluer, and a girle of Turkie worke, rich and faire, with a letter of gratification, which for the rarenesse of the stile, because you may be acquainted with it, I haue at the ende of this discourse hereunto annexed, which letter and present, with one from the grand Signor, was sent by M. Edward Bushell, and M. William Aldridge our land the 20 of March, who passed through Valachia and Moldaui, & so through Poland, where Michael prince of Valachia, and Aron Voiuoda prince of Moldaui receiuing letters from the ambassadoz, entertained the with al curtesie, through whose meanes by the great fauour which his lordship had with the grand Signor, they had not long before both of them bene aduanted to their princely dignities. Hee likewise presented Sigala the Admirall of the Seas, with Abram Bassa, who married the great Turkes daughter, and all the other Uizirs with diuers pieces of plate, fine English cloth & other costly things: the particulars whereof whereof, to avoid tediousnesse, I omit. All the presents thus ended, the ship shooting ten pieces of ordnance at the Seraglio point, as a last farewell, departed on her journey for England the first of November, my selfe continuing in Constantinople untill the last of July after. This yere in the spring there was great preparation for the Hungarian wars; and the great Turke threatened to goe himselfe in person: but like Heliogabalus, his affections being more serviceable to Venus then to Mars, he stayed at home. Yet a great army was dispatched this yere; who, as they came out of Asia to goe for Hungary, did so pester the streets of Constantinople for the space of two moneths in the spring time, as scarce either Christian or Jew could without danger of losing his money passe by and downe the city. What insolencies, murders and robberies were committed not onely upon Christians but also upon Turks I omit to write, and I pray God in England the like may never be seene: and yet I could wish, that such amongst vs as haue inioyed the Gospel with such great and admirable peace and prosperity vnder her Maiesties gouernment this forty yeeres, and haue not all this time brought forth better fruits of obedience to God, and thankfulness to her Maiesty, were there but a short time to beholde the miserable condition both of Christians and others living vnder such an infidell prince, who not onely are wrapped in most palpable & grosse ignorance of mind, but are cleane without the meanes of the true knowledge of God: I doubt not but the sight hereof (if they be not cleane void of grace) would stirre them by to more thankfulness to God, that euer they were bozne in so happy a time, and vnder so wise and godly a prince professing the true religion of Christ.

The Ascension departed.

Great preparation for the Hungarian wars.

The number of souldiours which went to the warres of Hungary this yere were 470000; as by the particulars given by the Admirall to the Ambassadour hereunder do appeare. Although all these were appointed and supposed to goe, yet the victories which the Christians in the spring had against the Turks strooke such a terrour in many of the Turkish souldiours, as by report diuers vpon the way thither left their Captaines and stolt away.

Thus you may see that the great Turke maketh warre with no small numbers. And in anno 1597, when Sultán Mahomet himselfe went in person into Hungary, if a man may beleue reports, he had an army of 600000.

For the city of Constantinople you shall vnderstand that it is matchable with any city in Europe, as well in bignesse as for the pleasant situation thereof, and commodious traffike and bringing of all maner of necessary pprovision of victuals, and whatsoeuer els mans life for the sustentation thereof shall require, being seated vpon a promontory, looking toward Pontus Euxinus vpon the North-east, and to Propontis on the South-west, by which two seas by shipping is brought great great store of all manner of virtuales. The city it selfe in forme representeth a triangular figure, the sea washing the walles vpon two sides thereof, the other side faceth the continent of Thracia; the grand Signiors seraglio standeth vpon that point which looketh into the sea, being cut off from the city by a wall, so that y^e wall of his pallace containeth in circuit about two English miles: the feuen towers spoken of before stand at another corner, & Constantines olde pallace to the North at the third corner. The city hath a threefolde wall about it; the innermost very high, the next lower then that, and the third a countermure, and is in circuit about ten English miles: it hath foure and twenty gates: and when the empire was remooued out of the West into the East, it was enriched with many spofles of olde Rome by Vespasian and other emperours, hauing many monuments and pillars in it worthy the obseruation; amongst the rest in the midst of Constantinople standeth one of white marble called Vespasians pillar, of 38 or 40 yards high, which hath from the base to the top proportions of men in armour fighting on horsebacke: it is likewise adorned with diuers goodly buildings & stately Heselquitas, whereof the biggest is Sultan Solimans a great warrior, which liued in the time of Charles the fifth; but the fairest is Santa Sophia, which in the time of the Christian emperours was the chiefe cathedrall church, and is still in greatest account with the great Turke: it is built round like other Greeckish churches, the paucements and walles be all of marble, it hath beneath 44 pillars of diuers coloured marble of admirable heigh and bignesse, which stand vpon great round feet of brasse, much greater then the pillars, and of a great heigh, some ten yards distant from the wall: from which vnto these pillars is a great gallery built, which goeth round about the church; and vpon the outside of the gallery stand 66 marble pillars which beare up the round roofoe being the top of the church: it hath threep pulpits or preaching places, and about 2000 lampes brought in by the Turke. Likewise vpon one side in the top is the picture of Christ with the 12 Apostles, but their faces are defaced, with two or thre ancient tombs of Christians: to the West sticketh an arrow in the toppe of the church, which, as the Turks report, Sultan Mahomet shot when he first tooke the city. Recre adioyning be two chapels of marble, where lie buried most of the emperours with their children & sultanas. The 16 of July, accompanied with some other of our nation we went by water to the Blacke sea, being 16 miles distant fro Constantinople, the sea at the way thither being little broader then the Thames; both sides of the shoze are beautified with faire & goodly buildings. At the mouth of this Bosphorus lieth a rocke some fourescore yards from the maine land, where vpon standeth a white marble pillar called Pompeys pillar, the shadow whereof was 23 foote long at nine of the clocke in the forenoone: ouer against it is a turret of stone vpon the maine land 120 steps high, hauing a great glasse-lanchoyne in the toppe foure yards in diamiter and thre in heigh, with a great copper pan in the midst to holde oile, with twenty lightes in it, and it serueth to giue passage into this straight in the night to such ships as come from all parts of those seas to Constantinople: it is continually kept by a Turke, who to y^e end hath pay of the grand Signior. And thus hauing spent eleuen moneths in Constantinople, accompanied with a chaunc, & carrying certaine mandates from the grand Signior to the Bassa of Aleppo for the kinde vlage of our nation in those parts, the 30 of July I tooke passage in a Turkish carmesale or shippe bound for Sidon; and passing thorow Propontis, hauing Salimbria with Heraclia most pleasantly situated on the right hand, and Proconesus now called Marmora on the left, we came to Gallipoly, and so by Helleponti, betwene the two castles before named called Sestos and Abydos, famous for the passages made there both by Xerxes and great Alexander, the one into Thracia, the other into Asia, and so by the Sigean Promontory, now called Cape Ianitza, at the mouth of Helleponti vpon Asia side, where Troy stood, where are yet ruines of olde walles to be seene, with two hills rising in a piramidall forme, not unlikely to be the tombs of Achilles and Ajax. From thence we sailed along, hauing Tenedos and Lemnos on the right hand, and the Troian fields on the left: at length we came to Mytlen and Sio long time inhabited by the Genoueses, but now vnder the Turke. The Island is beautified with goodly buildings and pleasant gardens, and aboundeth with fruits, wine, and the gum masticke. From thence sailing alongst the gulfes of Ephesus with Nicaria on the right hand, Samos and Smirna on the left, we came to Patmos, where S. Iohn wrote the Reuelation. The Island is but small, not about fife miles in compasse: the chiefe thing it yeeldeth is corn: it hath a port for shipping, and in it is a monastery of Greeckish Caloieros. From thence by Cos (now called Lango) where Hipocrates was bozne: & passing many other Islands and rocks, we arriued at Rhodes, one of the strongest and fairest cities of the East: here we stayed thre or foure dayes; and by reason of a By which went in the ship to Paphos in Cyprus, who vsed me with all kindnesse, I went about the city, and tooke the view of all: which city is still with all the houses and walles thereof maintained in the same order as they tooke it from the Rhodian knights.ouer the doozes of many of the houses, which be strongly built of stone, do remaine maine vndefaced, the armes of England, France, Spaine, and many other Christian knights, as though the Turkes in the view thereof glozied in the taking of all Christendome, whose armes there they beholde. From thence we sailed to Paphos an olde ruinous towne standing vpon the Westerne part of Cyprus, where S. Paul in the Acts conuerted the gouernor. Departing hence, we came to Sidon, by the Turkes called Saytosa, within tenne or twelue miles of the place where Tirus stood, which now being eaten in by the sea, is, as Ezekiel prophesied, a place for the spreading out of a net. Sidon is situated in a small bay at the foot of mount Libanus, vpon the side of an hill looking to the North: it is walled about, with a castle nigh to the sea, and one toward the land which is ruined, but the walle thereof standeth. Some halfe mile vp toward the mountaine be certaine ruines of buildings, with marble pillars, remaining: here for three dayes we were kindly entertained of the capitaine of the castle: and in a small barke we sailed from hence along the shore to Tripoli, & so to Alexandretta, where the 24 of August we arriued. From thence with a Venetian carauan we went by land to Aleppo, passing by Antioch, which is seated vpon the side of an hill, whose walles still stand with 360 turrets vpon them, and neere a very great plaine which beareth the name of the city, thorow which runneth the riuer Orontes, in Scripture called Farfar. In Aleppo I stayed vntill February following; in this city, as at a mart, meete many nations out of Asia with the people of Europe, hauing continuall traffike and interchangeable course of marchandise one with another: the state and trade of which place, because it is so well known to most of our nation, I omitte to write of. The 27 of February I departed from Aleppo, and the fifth of March imbarked my selfe at Alexandretta in a great ship of Venice called the Nana Ferra, to come for England. The 14 we put into Salino in Cyprus, where the ship staying many dayes to lade cotton wooll and other commodities, in the meane time accompanied with M. William Barret my countrey man, the master of the ship a Greeke, and others, we tooke occasion to see Nicosia, the chiefe city of this Island, which was some twenty miles frō this place, which is situated at the foot of an hill: to the East is a great plaine, extending it selfe in a great length from the North to the South: it is walled about, but of no such strength as Famagusta (another city in this Island neere the Sea side) whose walles are cut out of the maine rocke. In this city be many sumptuous and goodly buildings of stone, but vninhabited; the cause whereof doth giue me iust occasion to shew you of a rare iudgement of God vpon the owners sometime of these houses, as I was credibly informed by a Cipriot a marchant of good wealth in this city. Before it came in subiection to the Turkes, while it was vnder the Venetians, there were many barons and noble men of the Cipriots, who partly by vsurping more superiority ouer the common people then they ought, and partly through their great reuenues which yeerely came in by their cotton wooll and wines, grew so insolent and proud, and withall so impiouly wicked, as that they would at their pleasure command both the wiues and children of their poore tenants to serue their vncleane lusts, & holding them in such slavery as though they had bene no better then dogges, would wage them against a grayhound or spaniell, and he who woon the wager should euer after holde them as his proper goods and chattels, to do with them as he listed, being Christians as well as themselves, if they may deserue so good a name. As they behaued themselves most vnchristianly toward their brethren, so and much more vngodly (which I should haue put in the first place) did they towards God; for as though they were too great, standing on foot or kneeling to serue God, they would come riding on horsebacke into the church to heare their masse: which church now is made a publike bathstane or market place for the Turkes to sell commodities in: but beholde the iudgement of the righteous God, who payeth the sinner measure for measure. The Turkes the yeere before the ouerthrowe giuen them at Lepanto by Don Iohn tooke Cyprus. These mighty Minstrels fled some into holes & some into mountaines to hide themselves; whereupon the Turkes made generall proclamation, that if they would all come in and yeeld themselves, they would restore them to their former reuenues and dignities: who not mistrusting the mischieuous pretense of the Turkes, assembled together to make themselves knowne; whom after the Turkes had in possession, they (as the Lords executioners) put them with their wiues and children all to the sword, pretending thereby to cut off all future rebellion, so that at this day is not one of the noble race knowne aliue in the Island, onely two or three remaine in Venice but of little wealth, which in the time of the warres escaped. After we had stayed in this Island some thirty dayes, we set saile in the foresayd shippe being about the burthen of 900 tunnes, hauing in her passengers of diuers nations, as Tartars, Persians, Iewes, and sundry Christians. Amongst all which I had often conference with a Jew, who by reason of his many yeeres education at Safec a place in Iudea neere Ierusalem, where they study the Rabbines with some other arts as they thinke good, as also for his trauels into Persia and Ormus, he seemed to be of good experience in matters abroad, who related vnto me such conference as he had with a Baniane at Ormus, being one of the Indians inhabiting the countrey of Cambaia. This Baniane being a Gentile had skill in Astronomie, as many of that nation haue, who by his books written in his owne tongue and Characters, could tell the time of Eclipses both of Sunne and Moone, with the Change and Full, and by iudgement in Astrologie gaue answer to any question demanded. Being asked concerning his opinion in religion, what he thought of God: He made answer, that they held no other god but the sun, (to which planet they pray both at the rising and setting) as I haue seene sundry doe in Aleppo: his reason was drawn from the effects which it worketh in giuing light to the moone & other starres, and causing all things to grow and encrease vpon the earth: answer was made, that it did mooue with the rest, as the wheelles of a clocke, and therefore of force must haue a moouer. Likewise in the Eclipse being darkened it is manifestly proued that it is not god, for God is altogether goodnesse and brightnesse, which can neither be darkened nor receiue detriment or hurt: but the Sun receiueeth both in the Eclipse, as it is apparant: to which hee could not answer; but so they had receiued from their ancestors, that it was without beginning or ende, as in any Orbicular or round body neither beginning or end could be found. He likewise sayd, that there were other Gentiles in y^e Indies which worship the moone as chiefe, and their reason is. The moone when she riseth goeth with thousands of starres accompanied like a king, and therefore is chiefe: but the Sunne goeth alone, and therefore not so great. Against whom the Banianes reason, that it is not true, because the Moone and starres receiue their light from the Sunne, neither doth the Sunne vouchsafe them his company but when he list, and therefore like a mighty prince goeth alone, yet they acknowledge the Moone as Queene or Viceroy. Law they hold none, but onely seven precepts which they say were giuen them from their father Noe, not knowing Abraham or any other. First, to honor father and mother; secondly, not to steale; thirdly, not to commit adultery; fourthly, not to kill any thing liuing; fifthly, not to eat any thing liuing; sixthly, not to cut their haire; seventhly, to go barefoot in their churches. These they hold most strictly, & by no means will breake them: but he that breakech one is punished with twenty stripes: but for the greatest fault they will kill none, neither by a short death nor a long, onely he is kept some time in prison with very little meat, and hath at the most not aboue twenty or five & twenty stripes. In the yere they haue 16 feasts, and then they go to their church, where is pictured in a broad table the Sun, as we vse to paint it, the face of a man with beames round about, not hauing any thing els in it. At their feast they spot their faces in diuers parts with saffron all yellow, and so walke vp and downe the streets; and this they doe as a custome. They hold, there shall be a resurrection, and all shall come to iudgment, but the account shall be most straight, in so much that but one of 10000 shall be receiued to fauor, and those shall liue againe in this world in great happinesse: the rest shall be tormented. And because they will escape this iudgement, when any man dieth, he and his wife be both burnt together euen to ashes, and then they are throwen into a riuer, and so dispersed as though they had neuer bene. If the wife will not burne with her dead husband, shee is holden euer after as a whoore. And by this meanes they hope to escape the iudgement to come. As for the soule, that goeth to the place from whence it came, but where the place is they know not. That the body should not be made againe, they reason wth the philosophers, saying, that of nothing nothing can be made (not knowing that God made the whole world and their god the Sun of nothing) but beholbing the course of nature, that nothing is made but by a meanes, as by the seed of a man is made another, and by coyne cast into the ground there cometh by new coyne: so, say they, man cannot be made except some part of him be left, and therefore they burne the whole: for if he were buried in the earth, they say there is a small bone in the necke which would neuer be consumed: or if he were eaten by a beast, that bone would not consume, but of that bone would come another man; and then the soule being restored againe, he should come into iudgement, whereas now, the body being destroyed, the soule shall not be iudged: for their opinion is, that both body and soule must be united together, as they haue sinned together, to receiue iudgement; and therefore the soule alone cannot. Their seven precepts which they keepe so strictly are not for any hope of reward they haue after this life, but onely that they may be blessed in this world, for they thinke that he which breakech them shall haue ill successe in all his businesse.

The seven precepts of Banianes.

They say, the three chiefe religions in the world be of the Christians, Jewes, & Turks, & yet but one of them true: but being in doubt which is the truest of the three, they will be of none: for they hold that all these three shall be iudged, and but few of them which be of the true shall be saued, the examination shall be so straight: and therefore, as I haue sayd before, to preuent this iudgement, they burne their bodies to ashes. They say, these three religions haue too many precepts to keepe them all wel, & therefore wonderful hard it wil be to make account, because so few doe obserue all their religion aright. And thus passing the time for the space of three moneths in this this sea voyage, we arriued at Venice the tenth of June: and after I had seene Padua, with other English men, I came the ordinary way ouer the Alpes, by Augusta, Noremberg, and so to England; where to the praise of God, I safely arriued the ninth of August 1595.

A letter written by the most high and mighty Empresse the wife of the Grand Signior Sultan Murad Can to the Queenes Maicsty of England, in the yeere of our Lord,

L principio del ragionamento nostro sia scrittura perfetta nelle quattro parte del mondo, in nome di quello che ha creato indifferente mente tante infinite creature, che non haueuano anima ni persona, & di quello che fa girar gli noue cieli, & che la terra sette volte una sopra l'altra fa firmar; Signor & Re senza uicere, & che non ha comparacion alla sua creatione ne opera, & uno senza aprecio, adorato incomparabilmente, l'altissimo Dio creatore; che non ha similitudine, si come e descritto dalli propheti: a la cui grandessa non si arriuue; & alla perfectione sua compinta non si oppone, & quel omnipotente creatore & cooperator; alla grandessa del quale inchinano tutti li propheti; fra quali il maggior & che ha ottenuto gracia, horto del paradiso, raggi dal sole, amato del altissimo Dio e Mahomet Mustaffa, al qual & suoi adberenti & imitatori sia perpetua pace: alla cui sepultura odorifera s'isa ogni honore. Quello che e imperator de sette climati, & delle quattro parti del mondo, inuincibile Re di Gracia, Agiamia, Vngeria, Tartaria, Valachia, Rossia, Turchia, Arabia, Bagdet, Caramania, Abessia, Gionasir, Siruan, Barbaria, Algeri, Franchia, Cornacia, Belgrado, &c. sempre felicissimo, & de dodeci Anoli possessor della corona, & della stirpe di Adam, fin hora Imperator, figliolo del Imperatore, conseruato de la diuina prouidenza, Re di ogni dignita & honore, Sultan Murat, che Il Signor Dio sempre augmenti le sue forze, & padre di quello a cui aspetta la corona imperiale, horto & cypresso mirabile, degno della sedia regale, & uero herede del comando imperiale, dignissimo Mehemet Can, filio del Sultan Murat Can, che dio compisca li suoi disegni, & alung a li suoi giorni felici: Dalla parte della madre del qual si scriu la presente alla serenissima & gloriosissima fra le prudentissime Donne, & eletta fra li triomfanti sotto il standardo di Iesu Christo, potentissima & ricchissima regitrice, & al mondo singularissima fra il feminil sesso, la serenissima Regina d'Inghilterra, che segue le vestigie de Maria uirgine, il fine della quale sia con bene & perfectione, secondo il suo desiderio. Le mando una salutacion di pace, cosi honorata, che non basta tutta la copia di rosignoli con le loro musiche arinare, non che con questa carta: l'amore singulare che e conciputo fra noi, e simile a un horto di Vcelli vagi; che il Signor Dio la faci degna di saluacione, & il fine suo sia tale, che in questo mondo & nel futuro sia con pace. Doppo comparsi li suoi honorati presenti da la sedia de la Serenita vostra, sapera che sono capitati in una hora che ogni puno e stato una consolation di lungo tempo, per occasione del Ambasciadore di vostra serenita uenuto alla felice porta del Imperatore, con tanto nostro contento, quanto si posso desiderare, & con quello una lettera di vostra serenita, che ci e stata presentata dalli nostri Eunuochi con gran honore; la carta de la quale odoraua di camfora & ambracano, & l'inchiostro di musco perfetto, & quella peruenuta in nostro mano tutta la continenza di essa a parte a parte ho ascoltato intente mente. Quello che hora si conuiene e, che corrispondente alla nostra affecione, in tutto quello che si afferta alle cose attenente alli paesi che sono sotto il comando di vostra serenita, lei non manchi di sempre tenermi, dato noticia, che in tutto quello che li occorera, Io possi compiacerla; de quello che fra le nostre serenita e conueniente, accioche quelle cose che si interpreterano, habino il desiderato buon fine; perche Io faro sempre ricordenole al altissimo Imperatore delle occorenze di vostra serenita, per che sia in ogni occasione compiacinta. La pace sia con vostra serenita, & con quelli che segnano dretamente la via di Dio. Scritta al primi dell luna di Rabie Linol, anno del profeta 1002, & di Iesu 1594.

Let the beginning of our discourse be a perfect writing in the foure parts of the world, in the name of him which hath indifferently created such infinite numbers of creatures, which had neither soule nor body, and of him which moueth the nine heauens, and stablisheth the earth seven times one about another, which is Lord and king without any deputy, who hath no comparison to his creation and worke, and is one inestimable, worshipped without all comparison, the most high God, the creator, which hath nothing like unto him, according as he is described by the Prophets, to whose power no man can attaine, and whose absolute perfection no man may controul; and that omnipotent creator and fellow-worker, to whose Maicsty all the Prophets submit themselves, among whom the greatest, and which hath obtained greatest fauour, the garden of Paradise, the beame of the Sunne, the beloued of the most high God is Mahomet Mustassa, to whom and to his adherents and followers be perpetuall peace, to whose fragrant sepulture all honour is performed. He which is emperor of the seven climats and of the foure parts of the world, the inuincible king of Græcia, Agiamia, Hungaria, Tattaria, Valachia, Rossia, Turchia, Arabia, Bagdet, Caramania, Abessis, Giouafir, Siruan, Barbaria, Alger, Franchia, Coruacia, Belgrade, &c. alwayes most happy, and possessor of the crowne from the time of his ancestors; and of the seed of Adam, at this present emperor, the sonne of an emperor, preferred by the diuine prouidence, a king worthy of all glory and honour, Sultan Murad, whose forces the Lord God alwayes increaseth, and father of him to whom the imperiall crowne is to descend, the paradise and wonderfull tall cypresse, worthy of the royall throne, and true heire of the imperiall authority, most worthy Mehemet Can, the sonne of Sultan Murad Can, whose enterprises God vouchsafe to accomplish, and to prolong his happy dayes: on the behalfe of whose mother this present letter is written to the most gracious and most glorious, the wisest among women, and chosen among those which triumph vnder the standard of Iesus Christ, the most mighty and most rich gouernour, and most rare among womankind in the world, the most gracious Queene of England, which follow the steps of the virgine Mary, whose end be prosperous and perfect, according to your hearts desire. I send your Maiesty to honorable and sweet a salutation of peace, that all the focke of nightingales with their melody cannot attaine to like, much lesse this simple letter of mine. The singular loue which we haue conceived one toward the other is like to a garden of pleasant birds: and the Lord God vouchsafe to saue and keepe you, and send your Maiesty an happy end both in this world and in the world to come. After the arrivall of your honorable presents from the Court of your Maiesty, your Highnesse shall vnderstand that they came in such a season that euery minute ministred occasion of long consolation by reason of the comming of your Maiesties Ambassadors to the triumphant Court of the Emperor, to our so great contentment as we could possibly wish, who brought a letter from your Maiesty, which with great honour was presented vnto vs by our eunuchs, the paper whereof did smell most fragrantly of camfor and ambargriese, and the incke of perfect muske; the contents whereof we haue heard very attentiuely from point to point. I thinke it therefore expedient, that, according to our mutuall affection, in any thing whatsoever may concerne the countreys which are subiect to your Maiesty, I neuer faile, hauing information giuen vnto me, in whatsoever occasion shall be ministered, to gratifie your Maiesty to my power in any reasonable and conuenient matter, that all your subiects busineses and affaires may haue a wished and happy end. For I will alwayes be a solicitour to the most mighty Emperor for your Maiesties affaires, that your Maiesty at all times may be fully satisfied. Peace be to your Maiesty, and to all such as follow rightly the way of God. Written the first day of the Moone of Rabie Liul in the yere of the Prophet,

THE SECOND PART OF THIS Second volume containing the principall Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English nation, made to the South and Southeast quarters of the world without the Straights of Gibraltar, namely to the Ilands of Madera, and of the Canaries, to the kingdome of Barbarie, to the Iles of Capo Verde, to the river of Senega, to the coast of Ghinea and Benin, about the cape of Buona Esperansa, and so to Goa in the East Indies, and likewise beyond cape Comori to the Iles of Nienbar, to Sumatra, to the chanell of Singapura ouer against the city of Malacca, and to di-uers other places.

The voyage of Macham an English man, wherein he first of any man discovered the Iland of Madera, recorded verbatim in the Portugall history, written by Antonio Galuano.

In the yeere 1344, King Peter the fourth of that name reigning in Aragon, the Chronicles of his age write that about this time the I-land of Madera, standing in 32 degrees, was discovered by an English man, which was named Macham, who sailing out of England into Spaine, with a woman that he had stolen, arrived by tempest in that Iland, and did cast anker in that haven or bay, which now is called Machico after the name of Macham. And because his lover was sea-sicke, he went on land with some of his company, and the shippe with a good winde made saile away, and the woman died for thought.

Madera first discovered by one Macham an Englishman.

Macham, which loved her dearly, built a chapell, or hermitage, to bury her in, calling it by the name of Iesus, and caused his name and hers to be written or grauen upon the stone of her tombe, and the occasion of their arrivall there. And afterwaite he ordeined a boat made of one tree (for there be trees of a great compasse about) and went to sea in it, with those men that he had, and were left behinde with him, and came vpon the coast of Africke, without saile or oare. And the Portugals which saw it tooke it to be a marvellous thing, and presented him vnto the king of that countrey for a wonder, and that king also sent him and his companions for a miracle vnto the king of Castile.

Macham made there a chapell, naming it Iesus chapell.

In the yeere 1395, King Henry the third of that name reigning in Castile, the information which Macham gaue of this Iland, and also the ship of his company, moued many of France and Castile to go and discover it, and also the great Canaria, &c.

In the yeere 1417, King Iohn the second reigning in Castile, and his mother Lady Katherine being Regent, one Monsieur Ruben of Bracamont, which was Admirall of France, demanding the conquest of the Ilands of the Canaries, with the title of King, for a kinsman of his named Monsieur Iohn Berancourt, after that the Queene had giuen him them, and holpen him, he departed from Sioul with a good army. And they affirme also, that the principall cause which moued him to this, was to discover the Iland of Madera, which Macham had found, &c. ibidem
pag. 2. of Antonio Galuano.

This note following, concerning the ayde and assistance of the English Marchants, giuen to King Iohn the first of Portugall, for the winning of Centa in Barbarie, which was the first occasion of all the Portugall discoveries, is taken out of Thomas Walsingham his Latine Chronicle. Anno 1415.

Occ anno Ioannes primus Rex Portugallie fretus auxilio Mercatorum Anglie quam maximè, & Alemanorum, vicit Agarenos in terra Regis Beinarinorum, multis eorum milibus ad generum Ceres destinatis: cepitque ciuitatem eorum quam amplissimam supra mare sitam, vocatam Ceut eorum lingua.

This pere Iohn the first king of Portugall, being principally assisted by the helpe of the English Marchants, and Almains, overcame the Moorcs in the dominion of the king of Baibary, putting many thousands of them to the sword, and he tooke their city which was very mighty, seated upon the sea, which is called Ceura in their language.

Embaixada que el Rey mandou à el Rey d' Inglaterra, cap. 33.

E Da qui de Monte Mor mandon el Rey por embaixadores à el rey dom Duarte de Inglaterra Ruy de Sousa pessoa principal è de muyto bon saber e credito, de que el Rey muyto confiana, e ho doctor Ioam d' Eluas, e Fernam de Pina por secretario. E foram por mar muy honradamente com muy boa companhia: hos quaes foram en nome del Rey confirmar as ligas antiquas com Inglaterra, que polla condissandellus ho nouo Rey de hum reyno e do outro era obrigado à mandar confirmar: e tambien pera mostrarem ho titulo que el rey tinha no senhorio de Guinee, pera que depois de visto el rey d' Inglaterra defendesse em todos seus reynos, que ninguen armasse nem podesse mandar à Guinee: e assi mandasse desfazer huna armada, que pera laa faziam, per mandado do Duque de Medina Sidonia hum Ioam Tintam e hum Guilherme Fabiam Ingrefes. Com ha qual embaixada el rey d' Inglaterra mostrou receber grande contentamento, e foy delle com muyta honra recebida, e em tudo fez inteiramente ho que pellos embaixadores lhe foy requerido. De que elles trouxeram autenticas escripturas das diligencias que conpublicos pregonos fizeram: e assi as prouises das aprouises que eras necessarias: e com tudo muyto ben acabado, e ha vontade del reyse vieram.

These writings are in the Coler.

The Ambassage which king Iohn the second, king of Portugall, sent to Edward the fourth king of England, which in part was to stay one Iohn Tintam, and one William Fabian English men, from proceeding in a voyage which they were preparing for Guinea, 1481, taken out of the booke of the workes of Gracias de Resende, which intreateth of the life and acts of Don Iohn the second, king of Portugall, Chap. 33.

Afterwards the king sent as Ambassadors from the towne of Monte maior to king Edward the fourth of England, Ruy de Sousa, a principall person, and a man of great wisdom and estimation, and in whom the king reposed great trust, with doctor Iohn d' Eluas, and Ferdinand de Pina, as secretary. And they made their voyage by sea very honourably, being very well accompanied. These men were sent on the behalfe of their king, to confirme the ancient leagues with England, wherein it was conditioned that the new king of the one and of the other kingdome, should be bound to send to confirme the olde leagues. And likewise they had order to shew and make him acquainted with the title which the king held in the seignury of Ginnee, to the intene that after the king of England had seene the same, he should giue charge chozow all his kingdomes, that no man should arme or set forth ships to Ginnee: and also to request him, that it would please him to giue commandment to dissolve a certaine flect, which one Iohn Tintam and one William Fabian, English men, were making, by commandment of the duke of Medina Sidonia, to goe to the aforesayd parts of Ginnee. With which ambassage the king of England seemed to be very well pleased, and they were receiued of him with very great honour, and he condescended vnto all that the ambassadors required of him, at whose hands they receiued authenticall writings of the diligence which they had performed, with publication thereof by the heralds: and also prouises of those confirmations which were necessary. And hauing dispatched all things well, and with the kings good will, they returned home into their countrey.

The first cause of this ambassage.

The second cause.

The third cause.

A briefe note concerning an ancient trade of the English Marchants to the Canarie-lands, gathered out of an olde ligier booke of M. Nicolas Thorne the elder a worshipfull marchant of the city of Bristol.

IT appeareth evidently out of a certaine note or letter of remembrance, in the custody of me Richard Hakluyt, writtten by M. Nicolas Thorne the elder a principall marchant of Bristol, to his friend and factour Thomas Midnall and his owne seruant William Ballard at that time resident at S. Lucar in Andaluzia; that in the peere of our Lord 1526 (and by all circumstances and probabilities long before) certaine English marchants, and among the rest himselfe with one Thomas Spacheford exercised vsuall and ordinary trade of marchandise vnto the Canarie Islands. For by the sayd letter notice was giuen to Thomas Midnall and William Ballard aforesayd, that a certaine ship called The Christopher of Cadiz bound for the West Indies had taken in certaine fardels of cloth both coarse and fine, broad and narrow of diuers sorts and colours, some arowes of packthreed, fire cerons or bagges of lope with other goods of M. Nicolas Thorne, to be deliuered at Sancta Cruz the chiefe towne in Tenerife one of the seuen Canary-lands. All which commodities the sayd Thomas and William were authorized by the owner in the letter before mentioned to barter & sell away at Sancta Cruz. And in lieu of such mony as should arise of the sale of those goods they were appointed to returne backe into England good stoz of Dycheil (which is a certaine kinde of mosse growing vpon high rocks, in those dayes much vsed to die withall) some quantity of sugar, and certaine hundredes of kid-thiunes. For the procuring of which and of other commodities at the best and first hand the sayd Thomas and William were to make their abode at Sancta Cruz, and to remaine there as factours for the abovesayd M. Nicolas Thorne.

The English had an ordinary trade to the Canaries 1526.

And here also I thought good to signifie, that in the sayd letters mention is made of one Thomas Tison an English man, who before the fozesayd yere 1526 had found the way to the West Indies, and was there resident, vnto whom the sayd M. Nicolas Thorne sent certaine armour and other commodities specified in the letter aforesayd.

A description of the fortunate Ilands, otherwise called the Ilands of Canaria, with their strange fruits and commodities: composed by Thomas Nicols English man, who remained there the space of seuen yeeres together.

MY intent is particularly to speake of the Canaria Islands, which are seuen in number, wherein I dwelt the space of seuen yeres and more, because I finde such variety in sundry writers, and especially great vntruths, in a booke called The New found world Antarctike, set out by a French man called Andrew Theuer, the which his booke he dedicated to the Cardinall of Sens, keeper of the great seale of France.

It appeareth by the sayd booke that he had read the works of sundry Philosophers, Astronomers, and Cosmographers, whose opinions he gathered together. But touching his owne trauell, which he affirmeth, I refer to the iudgement of the expert in our dayes, and therefore for mine owne part I write of these Canaria Islands, as time hath taught me in many yeres.

The Iland of Canaria.

THE Iland of Canaria is almost equal in length and bredth, containing 12 leagues in length, touching the which as principall and the residue, the Spaniards holde opinion, that they discovered the same in their navigation toward America, but the Portugals say, that their nation first found the sayd Ilands in their navigation toward Aethiopia and the East Indies.

But truth it is that the Spaniards first conquered these Ilands, with diuers English gentlemen in their company, whose posterity this present day inioyeth them. Some write that this Iland was named Canaria by meane of the number of dogs which there were found: as for example, Andrew Theuer sayth, that one Iuba carried two dogs from thence: but that opinion could I neuer learne by any of the naturall people of the countrey, although I haue talked with many in my time, and with many of their children. For truth it is, that there were dogs, but such as are in all the Northwest lands, and some part of the West India, which serued the people in stead of sheepe for victuall. But of some of the conquerors of those Ilands I haue heard say that the reason why they were called the Canaria Islands is, because there grow generally in them all fouresquare canes in great multitude together, which being touched will cast out a liquour as white as milke, which liquoz is ranke poison, and at the first entry into these Ilands some of the discoverers were therewith poisoned : for many yeeres after that conquest the inhabitants began to plant both wine and sugar, so that Canaria was not so called by sugar canes.

The people which first inhabited this land were called Canaries by the conquerors, they were clothed in goat skinnnes made like vnto a loose cassocke, they dwelt in caues in the rocks, in great amity and brotherly loue. They spake all one language : their chiefe feeding was gelt dogges, goates, and goates milke; their bread was made of barley meale and goates milke, called Gofia, which they vse at this day, and thereof I haue eaten diuers times, for it is accounted exceeding hollesome.

Touching the originall of these people some holde opinion, that the Romans which dwelt in Africa exiled them thither, as well men as women, their tongues being cut out of their heads, for blasphemie against the Romane gods. But howsoever it were, their language was speciall, and not mixed with Romane speech or Arabian.

This Iland is now the principallest of all the rest, not in fertility, but by reason it is the seat of iustice and gouernment of all the residue. This Iland hath a speciall Gouernour for the Iland onely, yet notwithstanding there are thre Judges called Auditors, who are superiour Judges, and all in one ioyntly proceed as the Lord Chancellor of any realme.

Ciuitas Palmarum.

To this city from all the other Ilands come all such by appeale, as haue sustained any wrong, and these good Judges do remede by the same. The city is called Ciuitas Palmarum, it hath a beautifull Cathedral church, with all dignities thereunto pertaining. For the publike weale of the Iland there are sundry Aldermen of great authority, who haue a councill house by themselves. The city is not onely beautifull, but the citizens curious and gallant in apparell. And after any raine or foule weather a man may goe cleane in Velvet slippers, because the ground is sandy, the aire very temperate, without extreame heat or colde.

They reape wheat in February, and againe in May, which is excellent good, and maketh bread as white as snow. This Iland hath in it other thre townes, the one called Telde, the second Galdar, and the third Guia. It hath also twelue sugar houses called Ingenios, in which they make great quantity of good sugar.

The planting and growth of sugar canes.

The maner of the growth of sugar is in this sort, a good ground giueth forth fruit nine times in 18 yere : that is to say, the first is called Planta, which is layd along in a furrow, so that the water of a fluce may come ouer euery roote being couered with earth : this root bringeth forth sundry canes, and so consequently all the rest. It groweth two yeeres before the yeelding of profit, and not sixe moneths, as Andrew Theuer the French man writeth.

The making of sugar.

Then are they cut euen with the ground, and the tops & leaues called Coholia cut off, and the canes bound into bundels like faggots, and so are caried to the sugar house called Ingenio, where they are ground in a mill, and the iuyce thereof conueyed by a conduct to a great vessel made for the purpose, where it is boyled till it waxe thicke, and then is it put into a fornace of earthen pots of the molde of a sugar loafe, and then is it carried to another house, called a purging house where it is placed to purge the blacknesse with a certaine clay that is layd thereon. Of the remainder in the cauldron is made a second sort called Escumas, and of the purging liquoz that droppeth from the white sugar is made a third sort, and the remainder is called Panela or Neras, the refuse of all the purging is called Remiel or Malasses : and thereof is made another sort called Refinado.

When this first fruit is in this sort gathered, called Planta, then the Cane-field where it grew is burned ouer with sugar straw to the stumps of the first canes, and being husbanded, watered and trimmed, at the end of other two yeeres it yeeldeth the second fruit called Zoca. The third fruit is called Tertia Zoca, the fourth Quarta Zoca, and so orderly the rest, till age causeth the olde Canes to be planted againe.

Wine.

Plantano.

This Iland hath singular good wine, especially in the towne of Telde, and sundry sorts of good fruits, as Batatas, Mellons, Peares, Apples, Oranges, Limons, Pomgranats, Figs, Peaches of diuers sorts, and many other fruits; but especially the Plantano which groweth nere brooke sides, it is a tree that hath no timber in it, but groweth directly upward with the body, hauing maruelous thicke leaues, and euery leafe at the toppe of two yards long and almost halfe a yard broad. The tree neuer yeeldeth fruit but once, and then is cut downe; in whose place springeth another, and so still continueth. The fruit groweth on a branch, and euery tree yeeldeth two or thre of those branches, which beare some moze and some lesse, as some forty and some thirty, the fruit is like a Cucumber, and when it is ripe it is blacke, and in eating moze delicate then any conserue.

This Iland is sufficiently provided of Oren, Kine, Camels, Goats, Sheepe, Capons, Hens, Ducks, and Pidgeons, and great Partridges. Wood is the thing that most wanteth: and because cause I haue particularly to intreat of the other sixe Ilands, I leaue further enlarging of Canaria, which standeth in 27 degrees distant from the Equator.

The Ile of Tenerif.

The Iland of Tenerif standeth in 27 degrees and a halfe from the equator, and is distant from Canaria 12 leagues Northward. This Iland containeth 17 leagues in length, and the land lieth high in forme of a ridge of lowen land in some part of England, and in the midst of the sayd place standeth a round hill called Pico Dereiche, situated in this sort. The top of this pike containeth of height directly upward 15 leagues & more, which is 45 English miles, out of the which often times proceedeth fire and bymstone, and it may be about halfe a mile in compasse: the sayd top is in forme of likenesse of a caldron. But within two miles of the top is nothing but ashes & pumish stones: yet beneath that two miles is the colde region couered all the yere with snow, and somewhat lower are mighty huge trees growing, called Vinatico, which are exceeding heauy, and will not rot in any water, although they lie a thousand yeeres therein. Also there is a wood called Barbusano, of like vertue, with many Sauiue trees and pine trees. And beneath these sorts of trees are woods of Bay trees of 10 & 12 miles long, which is a pleasant thing to trauell thorow, among the which are great numbers of small birds, which sing exceeding sweet, but especially one sort that are very litle, and of colour in all respects like a Swallow, sauing that he hath a litle blacke spot on his breast as broad as a penny. He singeth more sweetly then all the rest, but if he be taken and imprisoned in a cage, he liueth but a small while. This Iland bringeth forth all sorts of fruits, as Canaria doth: and also all the other Ilands in generall bring forth shrubs or bushes, out of the which issueth a milke as white as milke, which after a while that it hath come out wareth thicke, and is exceeding good birdlime, the bush is called Taybayba. This Iland also bringeth forth another tree called Drago, which groweth on high among rocks, and by incision at the foot of the tree issueth out a liquor like blood, which is a common drug among Apothecaries. Of the wood of this tree are made targets greatly esteemed, because if any sword or dagger hit thereon, they sticke so fast that it is hard plucking them out.

This is the most fruitfull Iland of all the rest for coyne, and in that respect is a mother or nurse to all the others in time of need. There groweth also a certaine mosse upon the high rocks called Orchel, which is bought for Diars to die withall. There are 12 sugar houses called Ingenios, which make great quantity of sugar. There is also one league of ground which standeth between two towne, the one called Larotaua, and the other Rialeio, and it is thought that the like plot of ground is not in all the world. The reason is, that this one league of ground produceth sweet water out of the cliffes or rocky mountaines, coyne of all sortes, fruites of all sortes, and excellent good like, flaxe, ware, and hony, and very good wines in abundance, with great store of sugar and fire-wood. Out of this Iland is laden great quantity of wines for the West India, and other countreys. The best groweth on a hill side called the Ramble.

for dying.

There is in that Iland a faire city, standing thre leagues from the sea, nere vnto a lake called Laguna, wherein are two faire parish churches, there dwelleth the gouernour who ruleth all that Iland with iustice. There are also aldermen for the publike weale, who buy their offices of the king: the most of the whole inhabitants of this city are gentlemen, merchants, and husband men.

There are other foure towne called Santa Cruz, Larotaua, Rialeio, and Garachico.

Santa Cruz;

In this Iland before the conquest dwelt seuen kings, who with all their people dwelt in caues, and were clothed in goat skinner, as the Canaria people were, and used such like order of diet as they had. Their order of buriall was, that when any died, he was carried naked to a great caue, where he was propped up against the wall standing on his feet. But if he were of any authoritie among them, then had he a staffe in his hand, and a vessell of milke standing by him. I haue seene caues of 300 of these coppes together, the flesh being dried vp, the body remained as light as parchment. These people were called Guanches, naturally they spake another language cleane contrary to the Canarians, and so consequently enery Iland spake a severall language.

Note (gentle reader) that the Iland of Canaria, the Ile of Tenerif, and the Ile of Palma appertaine to the king of Spaine, vnto whom they pay fifty thousand duckats yeerely for custome and other profits. All these Ilands ioyntly are one bishopricke, which pay to the bishop twelue thousand duckats yeerely. And thus I conclude of the Ile of Tenerif, which standeth in 27 degrees and a halfe, as I haue before declared.

Gomera.

The Iland of Gomera standeth Westward from Tenerif, in distance sixe leagues: this is but a small Iland containing eight leagues in length. It is an Earldome, & the Lord thereof is called, called the earle of Gomera. But in case of any controuersie the vassals may appeale to the kings superio^r Judges which reside in Canaria.

This Iland hath one proper towne called Gomera, which hath an excellent good port or harbour for ships, where oftentimes the Indian fleet take refreshing for their voyage.

There is also sufficient graine and fruit for the maintenance of themselves.

There is one Ingenio or Sugar-house, with great plenty of wine and other sorts of fruits, as Canaria and Tenerif hath.

This Iland yeeldeth no other commodity but onely orchell; it standeth in 27 degrees distant from the Equator toward the pole Arcticke.

The Ile of Palma.

The Ile of Palma standeth twelue leagues distant from the Ile of Gomera North-westward. This Iland is fruitfull of wine and sugar: it hath a proper city called the city of Palma, where is great contraction for wines, which are laden for the West India & other places. This city hath one faire church, and a gouernour, and aldermen to maintaine and execute iustice. It hath also another pretty towne, called S. Andrewes. It hath also foure Ingenios which make excellent sugar, two of the which are called Zauzes, and the other two, Tassacort.

This Iland yeeldeth but little bread-corne; but rather is thereof provided from Tenerif and other places.

Their best wines grow in a soile called the Brenia, where perely is gathered twelue thousand butts of wine like unto Palmsties. This Iland standeth round, and containeth in circuit neere five and twenty leagues. It hath plenty of all sorts of fruits, as Canaria and Tenerif haue, it standeth in twenty seuen degrees and a halfe.

The Iland of Yron, called Hierro.

This Iland standeth ten leagues distant from the Iland of Palma Westward: it is but a little Iland, which containeth five leagues in circuit, and hath but small extention. It appertaineth to the earle of Gomera. The chiefest commodity of this Iland is goats flesh and orchell. There is no wine in all that Iland, but onely one vineyard that an English man of Taunton in the West countrey planted among rocks, his name was Iohn Hill.

The only vineyard in Hierro planted by Ioh.
Hill of Taunton.

This Iland hath no kind of fresh water, but onely in the middle of the Iland groweth a great tree with leaues like an Oliue tree, which hath a great cisterne at the foot of the sayd tree. This tree continually is couered with clouds, and by meanes thereof the leaues of the sayd tree continually drop water, very sweet, into the sayd cisterne, which commeth to the sayd tree from the clouds by attraction. And this water sufficeth the Iland for all necessities, as well for the castell, as for the inhabitants. It standeth in 27 degrees.

The Iland of Lanzarota.

The Iland of Lanzarota standeth eightene leagues distant from grand Canaria Southeastward. The onely commodity of this Iland is goats flesh and orchell. It is an earledome, and doth appertaine to Don Augustine de Herrera, with title of earle of Fortauentura and Lanzarota. But the vassals of these earledomes may in any cause of wrong appeale to the Kings Judges, which reside in Canaria, as I haue sayd before: because although the king hath reserved to himselfe but onely the three fruitfull Ilands, called Canaria, Tenerif, and Palma, yet he also reserved the rod of iustice to himselfe, because otherwise the vassals might be euill intreated of their Lords.

From this Iland do weckly resort to Canaria, Tenerif, & Palma, boats laden with dried goats flesh, called Tusinetta, which serueth in stead of bacon, and is very good meat. This Iland standeth in 26 degrees, and is in length twelue leagues.

The Ile of Forteuentura.

The Ile of Forteuentura standeth fifty leagues from the promontory of Cabo de Guer, in the firme land of Africa, and foure & twenty leagues distant from Canaria Eastward. This Iland doth appertaine to the lord of Lanzarota. It is reasonable fruitfull of wheat and barley, and also of kine, goats, and orchel: this Ile is fifteen leagues long and ten leagues broad. On the North side it hath a little Iland about one league distant from the maine Iland, betweene both of the which it is nauigable for any ships, and is called Graciola.

Both Forteuentura and Lanzarota haue very little wine of the growth of those Ilands. It standeth in 27 degrees.

Thus

Thus much haue I written of these seuen Ilands by experience, because I was a dweller there, as I haue layd befoze, the space of seuen yeeres in the affaires of master Thomas Locke, master Anthonie Hickman, and master Edward Castelin, who in those dayes were worthy merchants, and of great credite in the citie of London.

A description of the Iland of Madera.

The Iland of Madera standeth in 32 degrees distant from the equinoctiall line, and sentie leagues from the Ile of Tenerif Northeastward and Southwest from Hercules pillars. This Iland was first discouered by one Macham an Englishman, and was after conquered and inhabited by the Portugall nation. It was first called the Iland of Madera, by reason of the great wilderness of sundry sortes of trees that there did growe, and yet doe, as Cedars, Cypres, Quatico, Barbazano, Pine trees, and diuers others, and therefore the sayd Iland continueth still with the same name. Howbeit they hold opinion, that betweene the sayd Iland and the Ile of Palma is an Iland not yet discouered, which is the true Iland Madera called Saint Brandon. This Iland yeeldeth a great summe of money to the king of Portugall yearly: it hath one faire citie called Fouhall, which hath one faire port or harbour for shippes, and a strong bulwarke, and a faire Cathedral church, with a bishop and other dignities thereunto appertaining. There is also iustice and gouernment according to the Portugall vse. But causes of appellation are remitted to the citie of Lisbon in Portugall to the kings superiour iudges there. This Iland hath another towne called Machico, which hath likewise a good road for shippes, which towne and road were so called after the name of Macham the Englishman, who first discouered the same. There are also sixteen sugar houses called Ingenios, which make excellent good sugar.

There is besides the goodly timber befoze declared, great store of diuers sortes of fruites, as Peares, Apples, Plummies, wild Dates, Peaches of diuers sortes, Pellons, Batatas, Dren-ges, Lemmons, Pomgranates, Citrons, Figges, and all manner of garden herbes. There are many Dragon trees, such as grow in the Canarie Ilands, but chiefly this land produceth great quantitie of singular good wines which are laden for many places. On the North side of this land three leagues distant from the maine Iland standeth another litle Iland called Porto santo: the people thereof liueth by husbandrie, for the Iland of Madera yeeldeth but litle corne, but rather is thereof prouided out of France and from the Iland of Tenerif. On the East side of the Ile of Madera five leagues distant standeth another litle Iland called the Desert, which produceth onely Orchell, and nourisheth a great number of Goates, for the prouision of the maine Iland, which may be thirtie leagues in circuit: and the land is of great heighth where the foresayd trees growe. It is wonder to see the conueyance of the water to the Ingenios by Pipes through the mountaines.

In the mid way betweene Tenerif and the Iland of Madera standeth a litle solitarie Iland called the Saluages, which may bee about one league in compasse, which hath neither tree nor fruit, but is onely food for Goates.

W The originall of the first voyage for traffique into the kingdom of Marocco in Barbarie, begun in the yeere 1551. with a tall ship called the Lion of London, whereof went as captaine Master Thomas Windam, as appeareth by this extract of a letter of Iames Aldaie, to the worshipfull master Michael Locke, which Aldaie professeth himselfe to haue bene the first inuenter of this trade.

Vorshipfull Sir, hauing lately bene acquainted with your intent to prosecute the olde intermitted discouerie for Catai, if therein with my knowledge, trauell or industrie I may doe you seruice, I am readie to doe it, and therein to aduenture my life to the vttermoost point. Truth it is, that I haue bene by some men (not my friends) euill spoken of at London, saying that although I be a man of knowledge in the Arte of Nauigation and Cosmographie, and that I haue bene the inuenter of some voyages that be now growen to great effect; yet say they maliciously and without iust cause, that I haue not bene willing at any season to proceed in those voyages that I haue taken in hand, taking example especially of two voyages. The one was when I was master in the great Barke Aucher for the Leuant, in which voyage I went not, but the causes they did not know of my let from the same, nor of the other. But first the very trusthis, that I was from the same voyage letted by the Princes letters, which my Master Sebastian Gaborra had obtained for that purpose, to my great griefe. And as touching the second voyage which I inuented for the trade of Barbarie, the liuing God knoweth that I say most true, that when the great sweate was, (whereon the chiefe of those with whom I ioyued in that voyage died, that is to say, Sir Iohn Luttrell, Iohn Fletcher, Henry Ostrich and others) I my selfe was also taken with the same sweate in London, and after it, whether with euill diet in keeping, or how I know not, I was cast into such an extreame feuer, as I was neither able to ride nor goe: and the shippe being at Portesmouth, Thomas Windham had her away from thence, before I was able to stand vpon my legges, by whom I lost at that instant fourescore pound. Besides I was appointed by them that died (if they had liued) to haue had the whole gouernment both of shippe and goods, because I was to them the sole inuenter of that trade.

In the first voyage to Barbary there were two Moores, being noble men, whereof one was of the Kings blood, conuayed by the said Master Thomas Windham into their Countrey out of England.

Yours humble at your commandement,

James Alday.

The second voyage to Barbary in the yeere 1552. Set foorth by the right worshipfull Sir Iohn Yorke, Sir William Gerard, Sir Thomas Wroth, Master Frances Lambert, Master Cole, and others; Written by the relation of Master James Thomas then Page to Master Thomas Windham chiefe Captaine of this voyage.

De Shippes that went on this voyage were three, whereof two were of the Riuer of Thames, that is to say, the Lyon of London, whereof Master Thomas Windham was Captaine and part owner, of about an hundred & fiftie tunnes: The other was the Buttolfe about fourescore tunnes, and a Portugall Carauel bought of certaine Portugals in Newport in Wales, and freighted for this voyage, of summe sixtie tunnes. The number of men in the Fleet were an hundred and twentie. The Master of the Lyon was one Iohn Kerry of Mynhed in Somersetshire, his Mate was David Landman. The chiefe Captaine of this small Fleet was Master Thomas Windham a Norffolke gentleman borne, but dwelling at Marshfield-parke in Somersetshire. This Fleet departed out of King-rode neere Bristol about the beginning of May 1552, being on a Sunday in the morning: and the Sunday fortnight next ensuing in the evening came to an anchor at their first port in the roade of Zafia, or Afafion the coast of Barbarie, standing in 32. degrees of latitude, and there put on land part of our merchandise to be conueied by land to the citie of Marocco: which being done, and having refreshed our selues with victuals and water, we went to the second port called Santa Cruz, where we discharged the rest of our goods, being good quantitie of linnen and woollen cloth, corall, amber, Iet, and diuers other things well accepted of the Moores. In which road we found a French ship, which not knowing whether it were warre or peace betwene England and France, drew her selfe as neere vnder the towne wals as she could possiblye, crauing aide of the towne for her defence; if need were, which indeed seeing vs draw neere, shot at vs a peece from the wals, which came ouer the Lion our Admirall, between the maine maste & her foremast. Whereupon we comming to an anchor, presently came a pinnes aboard vs to know what we were, who vnderstanding that we had bene there the yere before, & came with the good leaue of their king in marchant wise, were fully satisfied, and gaue vs good leaue to bring our goods peaceably on shore, where the Viceroy, whose name was Sibill Manache, within short time after came to visite vs, and vied vs with all curtesie. But by diuers occasions we spent here very neere three moneths before we could get in our lading, which was Sugar, Dates, Almonds, and Malassos or Sugar Syzrope. And for all our being here in the heate of the Sommer, yet none of our company perished by sickness. Our ships being laden, we drew into the Sea for a Westerne wind for England. But being at sea, a great leake fell vpon the Lion, so that we were driuen to Lancerota, and Fortuentura, where, betwene the two Ilands, we came to a road, whence wee put on land out of our sayd ship 70. chestes of Sugar vpon Lancerota, with some dozen or fiftene of our company, where the inhabitants supposing we had made a wrongfull prize of our carauell, suddenly came with force vpon our people, among whom I my selfe was one, tooke vs prisoners, and spoiled the sugars: which thing being perceiued from our ships, they manned out three boates, thinking to rescue vs, and draine the Spaniards to flight, whereof they slew righteene, and tooke their gouernour of the Island prisoner, who was a very aged gentleman about 70. yeeres of age. But chaling the enimie so farre, for our recouerie, as powder and arrowes wanted, the Spaniardes perceiuing this, returned, and in our mens retire they slew fire of them. Then a Parle grew, in the which it was agreed, that we the prisoners should be by them restored, and they receiue their olde gouernour, giuing vs a testimonie vnder his and their hands, what damages wee had there received, the which damages were here restored, and made good by the king of Spaine his marchants vpon our returne into England. After wee had searched and mended our leake, being returned aboard, we came vnder saile, and as wee were going to the sea on the one side of the Island, the Cacafuego and other ships of the king of Portugals Armada entered at the other, and came to anker in the road from whence we were but newly departed, and shot off their great ordinance in our hearing. And here by the way it is to bee vnderstood that the Portugals were much offended with this our new trade into Barbarie, and both in our voiage the yeere before, as also in this they gaue out in England by their marchants, that if they tooke vs in those partes, they would vse vs as their mortall enemies, with great threats and menaces. But by God and good prouidence wee escaped their handes. From this Island shaping our course for England, we were seuen or eight weekes before we could reach the coast of England. The first port wee entered into was the haven of Plimouth, from whence within short time wee came into the Thames, and landed our marchandise at London, about the ende of the moneth of October, 1552.

A voiage made out of England vnto Guinea and Benin in Affrike, at the charges of certaine marchants Aduenturers of the Citie of London, in the yeere of our Lord 1553.

Was desired by certaine of my friends to make some mention of this Voiage, that some memorie thereof might remaine to our posteritie, if either iniquitie of time consuming all things, or ignorance creeping in by barbarousnesse and contempt of knowledge should hereafter burie in obliuion so woorthie attempts, so much the greater to bee esteemed, as before neuer enterprised by Englishmen, or at the least so frequented, as at this present they are, and may bee, to the great commoditie of our marchants, if the same be not hindered by the ambition of such, as for the conquering of foztie or fiftie miles here and there, and erecting of certaine forresses, thinke to be Lordes of halfe the world, enuying that other should enioy the commodities, which they themselves cannot wholly possesse. And although such as haue bene at charges in the discourring and conquering of such landes ought by good reason to haue certaine priuileges, preheminences, and tributes for the same, yet (to speake vnder correction) it may seeme somewhat rigorous, and agaynst good reason and conscience, or rather agaynst the charitie that ought to be among Christian men, that such as invade the dominions of other should not permit other friendly to vse the trade of marchandise in places neerer, or seldome frequented of them, whereby thir trade is not hindered in such places, where they themselves haue at their owne election appointed the Partes of their traffike. But forasmuch as at this present it is not my intent to accuse or defend, approoue or improoue, I will cease to speake any further hereof, and proceed to the description of the first voyage, as brieely and faithfully as I was aduertised of the same, by the information of such credible persons, as made diligent inquisition to know the truth thereof, as much as shall be requisite, omitting to speake of many particular things, not greatly necessarie to be knowen: which neuertheless, with alfo the exact course of the nauigation, shall be more fully declared in the second voyage. And if here in fauour of friendship shall perhaps cause some to thinke that some haue bene sharply touched, let them lay apart fauour and friendship, and giue place to truth, that honest men may receiue praise for well doing, and let two persons reprocch, as the iust stipend of their euill desertes, whereby other may be deterred to doe the like, and vertuous men encouraged to proceed in honest attempts.

But that these voyages may be more plainly vnderstood of all men, I haue thought good for this purpose, before I intreat hereof, to make a brieue description of Africa, being that great part of the world, on whose West side beginneth the coast of Guinea at Cabo Verde, about twelue degrees in latitude, on this side the Equinotiall line, and two degrees in longitude from the measuring luring line, so running from the North to the South, and by East in some places, within 5, 4, and 3 degrees and a halfe vnto the Equinoctiall, and so forth in maner directly East and by North, for the space of 36 degrees or thereabout, in longitude from the West to the East, as shall more plainly appeare in the description of the second voyage.

In Africa the lesse are these kingdomes: the kingdom of Tunis and Constantina, which is at this day vnder Tunis, and also the region of Bugia, Tripoli, and Ezzah. This part of Afrike is very barren by reason of the great deserts, as the deserts of Numidia and Barca. The principall ports of the kingdome of Tunis are these: Goletta, Bizerta, Potofarnia, Bona, and Stora. The chiefe citie of Tunis are Constantina and Bona, with diuers other. Under this kingdom are many Ilands, as Zerbi, Lampadola, Pantalarea, Limoso, Beir, Gamelaro, and Malta, where at this present is the great master of the Rhodes. Under the South of this kingdom are the great deserts of Lybia. All the nations in this Africa the lesse are of the sect of Mahomet, and a rustickall people, liuing scattered in villages. The best of this part of Afrike is Barbaria lying on the coast of the sea Mediterraneum.

Mauritania (now called Barbaria) is diuided into two parts, as Mauritania Tingitana, and Cæsariensis. Mauritania Tingitana is now called the kingdom of Fes, and the kingdom of Marocco. The principall citie of Fes is called Fessa: and the chiefe citie of Marocco is named Marocco.

Mauritania Cæsariensis is at this day called the kingdom of Tremisen, with also the citie called Tremisen or Telenfin. This region is full of deserts, and reacheth to the Sea Mediterraneum, to the citie of Oram, with the port of Mersalquiber. The kingdom of Fes reacheth vnto the Ocean Sea, from the West to the citie of Argilla: and the port of the sayd kingdom is called Sala.

The kingdom of Marocco is also extended aboue the Ocean Sea, vnto the citie of Azamor and Azah, which are vpon the Ocean Sea, toward the West of the sayd kingdom. Here Mauritania Tingitana (that is to say, by the two kingdomes of Fes, and Marocco) are in the Sea, the Ilands of Canarie, called in old time, The fortunate Ilands. Toward the South of this region is the kingdom of Guinea, with Senega, Ialoso, Gambia, and many other regions of the Blakke Moores, called Aethiopians or Negros, all which are watered with the riuer Negro called in old time Niger. In the sayd regions are no cities, but onely certaine lowe cottages made of boughes of trees, plastered with chalke, and couered with strawe. In these regions are also very great deserts.

The kingdom of Marocco hath vnder it these seuen kingdomes: Hea, Sus, Guzula, the territorie of Marocco, Duccala, Hazchora, and Tedle. The kingdom of Fes hath as many: as Fes, Temesne, Azgar, Elabath, Errif, Garer, and Elcair. The kingdom of Tremisen hath these regions: Tremisen, Tenez, and Elgazair, all which are Machometists. But all the regions of Guinea are pure Gentiles, and idolatrous, without profession of any religion, or other knowledge of God, then by the law of nature.

Africa the great is one of the three parts of the world, known in old time, and seuered from Asia, on the East by the riuer Nilus, on the West from Europe by the pillars of Hercules. The hither part is now called Barbarie, and the people Moores. The inner part is called Lybia and Aethiopia. Afrike the lesse is in this wise bounded. On the West it hath Numidia: On the East Cyrenaica: On the North, the sea called Mediterraneum. In this countrey was the noble city of Cathage.

In the East side of Afrike beneath the red sea, dwelleth the great and mighty Emperour and Christian king Prefter Iohn, well knowne to the Portugales in their voyages to Calicut. His dominions reach very farre on euery side: and hath vnder him many other Kings both christian and heathen that pay him tribute. This mightie prince is called Dauid the Emperour of Aethiopia. Some write that the king of Portugall sendeth him yeerely eight ships laden with merchandize. His kingdom confineth with the red Sea, and reacheth far into Afrike toward Aegypt and Barbarie. Southward it confineth with the Sea toward the Cape de Bona Speranza: and on the other side with the sea of land, called Mare de Sabione, a very dangerous sea lying between þ great citie of Alcair, or Cairo in Aegypt, and the countrey of Aethiopia: In the which way are many inhabitable habitable deserts, continuing for the space of five dayes iourney. And they affirme, that if the sayd Christian Emperoz were not hindered by those deserts (in the which is great lacke of victuals, & especially of water) he would or now haue inuaded the kingdom of Egypt, and the citie of Alcair. The chiefe city of Ethiopia, where this great emperoz is resident, is called Amacaiz, being a faire citie, whose inhabitants are of the colour of an Oliue. There are also many other cities, as the city of Sava vpon the river of Nilus, where the Emperour is accustomed to remaine in the Sommer season. There is likewise a great city named Barbaregaf, and Ascon, from whence it is said that the Quene of Saba came to Hierusalem to heare the wisdom of Salomon. This citie is but litle, yet very faire, and one of the chiefe cities in Ethiopie. In this prouince are many exceeding high mountains, vpon the which is said to be the earthly paradise: and some say that there are the trees of the Sunne and Moone, whereof the antiquitie maketh mention: yet that none can passe thither by reason of great deserts of an hundred dayes iourney. Also beyond these mountains is the Cape of Bona Speranza. And to haue said thus much of Afrike it may suffice.

The first voyage to Guinea and Benin.

IN the yeere of our Lord 1553. the twelfth day of August, sailed from Portsmouth two goodly ships, the Primerose and the Lion, with a pinnas called the Moone, being all well furnished aswell with men of the lustiest sort, to the number of seuen score, as also with ordnance and victuals requisite to such a voyage: hauing also two captaines, the one a stranger called Anthonie Anes Pinteado, a Portugall boyne in a towne named The Port of Portugall, a wise, discrete, and sober man, who for his cunning in sailing, being as well an expert Pilot as a politike captaine, was sometime in great fauour with the king of Portugall, and to whom the coasts of Brasile and Guinea were committed to be kept from the Frenchmen, to whom he was a terrour on the Sea in those parts, and was furthermore a gentleman of the king his masters house. But as fortune in manner neuer fauoureth but flattereth, neuer promiseth but deceiveth, neuer raiseth but casteth downe againe: and as great wealth & fauour haue alwaies companions, emulation and enuie, he was after many aduersities & quarrels made against him, inforced to come into England: where in this golden voyage he was euil matched with an vnequal companion, and vnlike match of most sundry qualitics & conditions, with vertues few or none adoynd. Thus departed these noble ships vnder saile on their voyage: But first captaine Windam putting forth of his ship at Portsmouth a kinsman of one of the head marchants, and shewing herein a muster of the tragicall partes hee had conceived in his braine, and with such small beginnings nourished so monstrous a birth, that moze happy, yea and blessed was that yong man being left behind, then if he had bene taken with them, as some to wish he had done the like by theirs. Thus sailed they on their voyage, vntill they came to the Island of Madera, where they took in certaine wines for the stowe of their ships, and paid for them as they agreed of the price. At these Islands they met with a great Galion of the king of Portugall, full of men and ordnance: yet such as could not haue preuailed if it had attempted to withstand or resist our ships, for the which cause it was set forth, not onely to let and interrump these our shippes of their purposed voyage, but al other that should attempt the like: yet chiefly to frustrate our voyage. For the king of Portugall was sinistraly informed, that our ships were armed to his castle of Mina in those parties, whereas nothing lesse was meant.

After that our ships departed from the Island of Madera forward on their voyage, began this worthy captaine Pinteados sorrow, as a man tormented with the company of a terrible Hydra, who hitherto flattered with him, & made him a faire countenance and shew of loue. Then did he take vpon him to command all alone, setting waight both by captaine Pinteado, and the rest of the marchants factors, sometimes with opprobrious words, and sometimes with threatnings most shamefully abusing them, taking from Pinteado the seruice of the boies and certain mariners that were assigned him by the order and direction of the worshipful merchants, and leauing him as a common mariner, which is the greatest despite and grief that can be to a Portugale or Spaniard, to be diminished of their honoz, which they esteeme aboue all riches. Thus sailing forward on their voyage, they came to the Islands of Canarie, continuing their course fro thence vntill they arrived at the Island of S. Nicholas, where they victualled themselves with fresh meat, of the flesh of wild goats, whereof is great plenty in that Island, & in manner of nothing els. From hence following on their course and tarrying here & there at the desert Islands in the way, because they would not come too timely to the countrey of Guinea for the heat, and tarrying somewhat too long (for what can be well ministered in a common wealth, where inequality with tyrannie will rule alone) they came at the length to the first land of the countrey of Guinea, where they fel with the great riuer of Sesto, where they might for their marchandizes haue laden their ships with the graines of that countrey, which is a very hate fruit, and much like unto a fig as it groweth on the tree. For as the figs are full of small seeds, so is the said fruit full of graines, which are loose within the cob, hauing in the mids thereof a hole on euery side. This kind of spice is much vsed in cold countreies, & may there be sold for great aduantage, for exchange of other wares. But our men, by the perswasion or rather inforcement of this tragickall captaine, not regarding and setting light by that commoditie, in comparison of fine gold they thirsted, sailed an hundred leagues further, vntill they came to the golden land: where not attempting to come nere the castle pertaining to the king of Portugall, which was within the riuer of Mina, they made sale of their ware only on this side & beyond it, for the gold of that countrey, to the quantitie of an hundred and fiftie pounds weight; there being in case that they might haue dispatched all their ware for gold, if the vntaine braine of Windam had, or could haue giuen eare to the counsell and experience of Pinteado. For when that Windam not satisfied with the gold which he had, and more might haue had if he had taried about the Mina, commanding the said Pinteado (for so he tooke vpon him) to lead the ships to Benin, being vnder the Equinoctial line, and an hundred and fiftie leagues beyond the Mina, where he looked to haue their ships laden with pepper: and being counselled of the said Pinteado, considering the late time of the yere, for that time to go no further, but to make sale of their wares such as they had for gold, wherby they might haue bene great gainers: Windam not assenting hercunto, fell into a sudden rage, reuiling the sayd Pinteado, calling him Jew, with other opprobrious words, saying, This whoreson Jew hath promised to bring vs to such places as are not, or as he cannot bring vs vnto: but if he do not, I will cut off his eares and naile them to the mast. Pinteado gaue the sayd counsell to go no further for the safegard of the men and their liues, which they should put in danger if they came too late, for the Rostia which is their Winter, not for cold, but for smothering heate, with close and cleudie aire and storming weather, of such putrifying qualitie, that it rotted the coates of their backs: or els for coming to soene for the scorching heat of the sunne, which caused them to linger in the way. But of force and not of will brought he the ships before the riuer of Benin, where rising at an Anker, they sent their pinnas by into the riuer 50 or 60 leagues, from whence certaine of the marchants with captaine Pinteado, Francisco a Portugale, Nicholas Lambart gentleman, and other marchants were conducted to the court where the king remained, ten leagues from the riuer side, whither when they came, they were brought with a great company to the presence of the king, who being a blacke Moor (although not so blacke as the rest) sat in a great huge hall, long and wide, the wals made of earth without windowes, the rooffe of thin boords, open in sundry places, like vnto louers to let in the aire.

ward the king.

And here to speake of the great reuerence they giue to their king, it is such, that if we would giue as much to our Sauior Christ, we should remoue from our heads many plagues which we daily deserue for our contempt and impietic.

So it is therfore, that when his noble men are in his presence, they neuer looke him in the face, but sit crouching, as we vpon our knees, so they vpon their buttocks, with their elbowes vpon their knees, and their hands before their faces, not looking by vntill the king command them. And when they are coming toward the king, as far as they do see him, they do shew such reuerence, sitting on the ground with their faces couered as before. Likewise when they depart from him, they turn not their backs toward him, but goe creeping backward with like reuerence.

And now to speake somewhat of the communication that was betwene the king and our men, you shall first vnderstand that he himselfe could speake the Portugall tongue, which he had learned of a child. Therefore after he had commanded our men to stand by, and demanded of them the cause of their coming into that countrey, they answered by Pinteado, that they were marchants trauctelling into those parties for the commodities of his countrey, for exchange of wares which they had brought from their countreies, being such as should be no lesse commodious for him and his people. The king the hauing of old lying in a certaine store-house 30 or 40 kintals of Pepper (euery kintall being an hundred weight) willed them to looke vpon the same, and againe to bring him a sight of such marchandizes as they had brought with them. And thereupon sent with the captaine and the marchants certaine of his men to conduct them to the waters side, with other to bring the ware from the pinnas to the court. Who when they were returned and the wares seen, the king grew to this ende with the marchants to prouide in 30 dayes the lading of all their ships with pepper. And in case their marchandizes would not extend to the value of so much pepper, he promised to credite them to their next returne, and thereupon sent the country round about to gather pepper, causing the same to be brought to the court: So that within the space of 30 dayes they had gathered fourefortie tunne of pepper.

Pepper.

The kings gentlemen to wards our men.

In the meane season our men partly hauing no rule of themselves, but eating without measure of the fruits of the countrey, and drinking the wine of the Palme trees that droppe in the night from the cut of the branches of the same, and in such extreme heate running continually into the water, not vled before to such sudden and vehement alterations (then the which nothing is more dangerous) were thereby brought into swellings and agues: in somuch that the later time of the yeere coming on, caused them to die sometimes three & sometimes 4 or 5 in a day. Then Windam perceiving the time of the 30 daies to be expired, and his men dying so fast, sent to the court in post to Captaine Pinteado, & the rest to come away and to tary no longer. But Pinteado with the rest, wrote backe to him againe, certifying him of the great quantity of pepper they had already gathered & looked daily for much more: desiring him further more to remember the great praise and name they should win, if they came home prosperously, and what shame of the contrary. With which answer Windam not satisfied, and many of their men dying daily, willed and commaunded them againe either to come away forthwith, or els threatened to leave them behinde. Then Pinteado heard this answer, thinking to perswade him with reason, hee tooke his way from the court toward the ships, being conducted thither with men by the kings commandement.

In the meane season Windam all raging, brake by Pincados Cabin, brake open his chestes, spoiled such provision of cold stilled waters and suckers as he had provided for his health, and left him nothing, neither of his instruments to saile by, nor yet of his apparell: and in the meane time falling sicke, himselfe died also. Whose death Pinteado comming aboord, lamented as much as if he had bene the dearest friend he had in the world. But certaine of the mariners and other officers did spit in his face, some calling him Jewe, saying that he had brought them thither to kill them: and some drawing their swords at him, making a shew to slay him. Then he perceiving that they wou'd needs awap, desired them to tary that he might fetch the rest of the marchants that were left at the court, but they would not grant this request. Then desired he them to give him the ship-boate, with as much of an old saile as might serue for the same, promising them therewith to bring Nicholas Lambert and the rest into England, but all was in vaine. Then wrote he a letter to the court to the marchants, informing them of all the matter, and promising them if God would lend him life to returne with all haste to fetch the. And thus was Pinteado kept ashore againe against his will, thrust among the boyes of the ship, not vled like a man, nor yet like an honest boy, but glad to find favour at the cookes hand. Then departed they, leaving one of their ships behind them, which they sunke for lacke of men to cary her. After this, within 6 or 7 dayes sayling, dyed also Pinteado for very pensivnesse & thought that strooke him to the heart. A man worthy to serue any prince, and most wisely vled. And of seven score men came home to Plimmouth scarcely forty, and of them many died. And that no man should suspect these words which I haue laide in commendation of Pinteado, to be spoken upon favour otherwise then truely, I haue thought good to adde hereunto the copie of the letters which the king of Portugall and the infant his brother wrote vnto him to reconcile him, at such time as upon the king his masters displeasure (and not for any other crime or offence, as may appeare by the said letters) he was only for pouertie inforced to come into England, where he first perswaded our marchants to attempt the said voyages to Guinea. But as the king of Portugall too late repented him that he had so punished Pinteado, upon malicious informations of such as envied the mans good fortune: even so may it hereby appeare that in some cases even Lions themselves may either be hindered by the contempt, or aided by the help of the poore muse, according vnto the fable of Esope.

I The king doe give you to vnderstand lord Francis Desleaso, one of my counsell and ouersee of my house, that in consideration of the good seruice which Anthony Anes Pinteado, the sonne of Iohn Anes, dwelling in the towne called the Port, hath done vnto me, my will and pleasure is, to make him knight of my house, allowing to him in pension seven hundred rees monethly, and every day one alcappe of barley, as long as he keepeth a horse, & to be paid according to the ordinance of my house. Providing alwaies that he shall receiue but one marriage gift. And this also in such addition, that the time which is accepted in our ordinance, forbidding such men to marry for getting such children as might succede them in this allowance, which is 6 yerres after the making of this patent, shall be first expired before he do marry. I therefore command you to cause this to be entered in the booke called the Matricula of our household, vnder the title of knights. And when it is so entered, let the Clarke of the Matricula, for the certeintie therof, write on the backside of this Aluala, or patent, the number of the lease wherein this our grant is entered. Which done, let him returne this writing vnto the said Anthonie Anes Pinteado for his warrant.

I Diego Henriques haue written this in Almarin the two and twentie day of September, in the yere of our Lord 1551. And this beneuolence the king gaue vnto Anthonie Anes Pinteado, the five and twentie day of July this present yere.

The Secretaries declaration written vnder the kings grant.

Your Maiestie hath vouchsafed, in respect and consideration of the good service of Athony Anes Pinteado, dwelling in the port, and sonne of Iohn Anes, to make him knight of your house, with ordinarie allowance, of seuen hundred reis pension by the moneth, and one alcaire of barley by the day, as long as he keepeth a horse: and to be payde according to the ordinance of your house, with condition that hee shall haue but one marriage gift: and that not within the space of five yeres after the making of these letters Patents. The copie of the letter of Don Lewes the infant, and brother to the king of Portugall, sent into England to Anthonie Anes Pinteado.

Anthonie Anes Pinteado, I the infant brother to the king, haue me heartily commended vnto you. Peter Gonsalues is gone to seeke you, desiring to bring you home again into your countrey. And for that purpose he hath with him a safe conduct for you, granted by the king, that thereby you may freely and without all feare come home. And although the weather be foule and stormie, yet faile not to come: for in the time that his Maiestie hath giuen you, you may doe many things to your contentation and gratifying the king, whereof I would be right glad: and to bring the same to passe, I will do all that lieth in me for your profite. But forasmuch as Peter Gonsalues will make further declaration hereof vnto you, I say no more at this present. Written in Lisbone, the eight day of December. Anno 1552.

The infant Don Lewes.

All these foresaid writings I saw vnder seale, in the house of my friend Nicholas Liefse, with whom Pinteado left them, at his vnfortunate departing to Guinea. But, notwithstanding all these friendly letters and faire promises, Pinteado durst not attempt to goe home, neither to keepe companie with the Portugals his countrey men, without the presence of other: forasmuch as he had secreete admonitions that they intended to slay him, if time and place might haue serued their wicked intent.

The second voyage to Guinea set out by Sir George Barne, Sir Iohn Yorke, Thomas Lok, Anthonie Hickman and Edward Caselin, in the yere 1554. The Captaine whereof was M. Iohn Lok.

In the first voyage I haue declared rather the order of the history, then the course of the nauigation, whereof at that time I could haue no perfect information: so in the description of this second voyage, my chiefe intent hath beene to shew the course of the same, according to the obseruation and ordinarie custome of the mariners, and as I receiued it at the handes of an expert Pilot, being one of the chiefe in this voyage, who also with his owne hands wrote a briefe declaration of the same, as he found and tried all things, not by coniecture, but by the art of sayling, and instruments pertaining to the mariners facultie. Not therefore assuming to my selfe the commendations due vnto other, neither so bold as in any part to change or otherwise dispose the order of this voyage so well obserued by art and experience, I haue thought good to set forth the same, in such sort and phrase of speech as is commonly vsed among them, and as I receiued it of the said Pilot, as I haue said. Take it therefore as followeth.

In the yere of our Lord 1554 the eleuenth day of October, we departed the riuer of Chames with with three goodly ships, the one called the Trinitie, a ship of the burden of seuen score tunne, the other called the Bartholomew, a ship of the burden of ninetie, the third was the Iohn Euangelist, a ship of seuen score tunne. With the sayd ships and two pinnesses (whereof the one was drowned on the coast of England) we went forward on our voyage, and stayed at Douer fourtene dayes. We staid also at Rie three or foure dayes. Moreover last of all we touched at Dartmouth.

Robert Gainds was matter of the Iohn Euangelist.

The first day of November at nine of the clocke at night, departing from the coast of England, we set off the Start, bearing South-west all that night in the sea, and the next day all day, and the next night after, untill the third day of the said moneth about noone, making our way good, did runne threescore leagues.

The 17 day in the morning we had sight of the Ile of Madera, which doth rise to him that cometh in the North-northeast part upright land in the west part of it, and very high: and to the South-southeast a low long land, and a long point, with a saddle thorow the middell of it, standing in two and thirtie degrees: and in the West part, many springs of water running downe from the mountaine, and many white fieldes like unto coyne fieldes, & some white houses to the South-east part of it: and the toppe of the mountaine sheweth very ragged, if you may see it, and in the Northeast part there is a bight or bay as though it were a harborow: Also in the said part, there is a rocke a little distance from the shoare, and ouer the sayd bight you shall see a great gappe in the mountaine.

The Ile of Madera.

The 19 day at twelue of the clocke we had sight of the Isle of Palmes and Teneriffa and the Canaries. The Ile of Palmes lieth round, & lieth Southeast and North-west, and the North-west part is lowest. In the South is a round hill ouer the head land, and another round hill aboue that in the land. There are betweene the Southeast part of the Ile of Madera & the North-west part of the Ile of Palmes seuen and fifty leagues. This Ile of Palmes lieth in eight and twenty degrees. And our course from Madera to the Ile of Palmes was South and South and by West, so that we had sight of Teneriffa and of the Canaries. The Southeast part of the Ile of the Palmes, & the North-northeast of Teneriffa lie Southeast and North-west, and betweene them are 20 leagues. Teneriffa and the great Canary called Gran Canaria, and the West part of Forteuentura stande in seuen and twenty degrees and a halfe. Gomera is a faire Island but very ragged, & lieth West-south-west off Teneriffa. And whosoever wil come betweene them two Islands must come South and by East, and in the South part of Gomera is a towne and a good roade in the said part of the Island: and it standeth in seuen and twentie degrees and three termes. Teneriffa is a high land, with a great high pike like a sugar loafe, and vpon the said pike is snow throughout all the whole yeere. And by reason of that pike it may be knowen aboue all other Islands, and there we were becalmed the twentieth day of November, from sixe of the clocke in the morning, untill foure of the clocke at afternoone.

The two and twentieth day of November, vnder the Tropike of Cancer the Sunne goeth downe West and by South. Upon the coast of Barbarie five and twentie leagues by North Cape blanke, at three leagues off the maine, there are fiftene fadomes and good shellground, and sande among and no streames, and two small Islands standing in two and twentie degrees and a terme.

The coast of Barbarie. Cape Blanke.

From Gomera to Cape de las Barbas is an hundred leagues, and our course was South and by East. The said Cape standeth in two and twentie and a halfe: and all that coast is flatte, fiftene or seuentene fadome deepe. Seuen or eight leagues off from the riuer del Oro to Cape de las Barbas, there vse many Spaniards and Portugals to trade for fishing, during the moneth of November: and all that coast is very low lands. Also we went from Cape de las Barbas South-south-west, and South-west and by South, till we brought our selues in twentie degrees and a halfe, reckoning our selues seuen leagues off: and there were the least shoales of Cape Blanke.

The riuer del Oro.

Then we went South untill we brought our selues in 13 degrees, reckoning our selues five and twentie leagues off. And in 15 degrees we did reare the Crossiers, and we might haue reared them sooner if we had looked for them. They are not right a crosse in the moneth of November, by reason that the nights are short there. Neuertheless we had the sight of them the 29 day of the said moneth at night.

The crossiers or crosse stars.

The first of December, being in 13 degrees we set our course South and by East, untill the fourth day of December at 12 of the clocke the same day. Then we were in nine degrees and a terme, reckoning our selues 30 leagues off the shoales of the riuer called Rio Grande, being West-south-west off them, the which shoales be 30 leagues long.

Rio Grande.

The fourth of December we beganne to set our course South-east, we being in sixe degrees and a halfe.

The ninth day of December we set our course Eastsoutheast: the fourteenth day of the sayde moneth we set our course East, we being in five degrees and a halfe, reckoning our selues thirty and six leagues from the coast of Guinea.

Cape Mensurado,
The river of Sesto.

The nineteenth of the said moneth we set our course East and by North, reckoning our selues seuentene leagues distant from Cape Mensurado, the said Cape being Eastnortheast of vs, and the river of Sesto being East.

The one and twentieth day of the said moneth, we fell with Cape Mensurado to the Southeast, about two leagues off. This Cape may be easily knowen, by reason y^e the rising of it is like a Poppe-head. Also toward the Southeast there are three trees, whereof the Eastermost tree is the highest, and the middlemost is like a hie stake, & the Southermost like unto a giber: and vpon the maine are foure or five high hilles rising one after another like round bommocks or billocks. And the Southeast of the three trees, handiernwise: and all the coast along is white sand. The said Cape standeth within a litle in five degrees.

The two and twentieth of December we came to the river of Sesto, & remained there untill the nine and twentieth day of the said moneth. Here we thought it best to send befoze vs the pinnesse to the river Dulce, called Rio Dulce, that they might haue the beginning of the market befoze the conning of the Iohn Euangelist.

The river of Sesto.
Rio Dulce.

At the river of Sesto we had a tunne of yraines. This river standeth in five degrees, lacking a terce. From the river of Sesto to Rio Dulce are five and twentie leagues. Rio Dulce standeth in five degrees and a halfe. The river of Sesto is easie to be knowen, by reason there is a ledge of rockes on the Southeast part of the Rode. And at the entring into the haucn are five or six trees that beare no leaues. This is a good harborow, but very narrow at y^e entrance into the river. There is also a rocke in the haucns mouth right as you enter. And all that coast betweene Cape de Monte, and cape de las Palmas, lieth Southeast & by East, Northwest & by West, being three leagues off the shore. And you shal haue in some places rocks two leagues off: and that, betweene the river of Sesto and cape de las Palmas.

S. Vincents harborow.

Betweene the river of Sesto and the river Dulce are five and twentie leagues: & the high land that is betweene them both, is called Cakeado, being eight leagues from the river of Sesto. And to the Southeastwarde of it is a place called Shawgro, and an other called Shyawe or Shauo, where you may get fresh water. Off this Shyawe lieth a ledge of rockes: and to the Southeastward lieth a hedland called Croke. Betweene Cakeado and Croke are nine or ten leagues. To the Southeastward off, is a harborow called S. Vincent: Right ouer against S. Vincent, is a rocke vnder the water, two leagues & a halfe off the shore. To the Southeastward of that rocke you shal see an island about three or foure leagues off: this island is not past a league off the shore. To the Eastsoutheast of the island, is a rocke that lieth aboue the water, and by that rocke goeth in the river Dulce, which you shal know by the said river and rocke. The Northwest side of the haucn is flat sand, and the Southeast side therof is like an Island, and a bare plot without any trees, and so is it not in any other place.

The river Dulce.

In the Rode you shal ride in thirteene or foureteene fadomes, good oaze and sand, being the markes of the Rode to bying the Island and the Northeast land together, and here we ankered the last of December.

The thid day of Januarie, we came from the river Dulce.

Cape de las Palmas.

The coast of Guinea.

Note that Cape de las Palmas is a faire high land, but some low places thereof by the water side looke like red cliffes with white strakes like hie waves, a cable length a peece, and this is the East part of the cape. This cape is the Southermost land in all the coast of Guinea, and standeth in foure degrees and a terce.

The coast from Cape de las Palmas to Cape Trepoyntes, or de Tres Puntas, is faire & cleare without rocke or other danger.

Twentie and five leaues from Cape de las Palmas, the land is higher then in any place, untill we come to Cape Trepoyntes: And about ten leagues befoze you come to Cape Trepoyntes, the land riseth still higher and higher, untill you come to Cape Trepoyntes. Also befoze you come to the said Cape, after other 5 leagues to the Northwest part of it, there is certaine broken ground, with two great rockes, and within them in the bight of a bay, is a castle called Arra, pertaining to the king of Portugall. You shal know it by the said rockes that lie off it: for there is none such from Cape de las Palmas to Cape Trepoyntes. This coast lieth East and by North, West and by South. From Cape de las Palmas to the said castle is fourteene and fifteene leagues. And the coast lieth from the said castle to the Westermost point of Trepoyntes, Southeast and by South, Northwest and by North. Also the Westermost point of Trepoyntes is a low lande, lying halfe a mile out in the sea: and vpon the innermost necke, to the land-ward, is a tuft of trees, and and there we arrived the eleventh day of January.

The 12 day of January we came to a towne called Samma or Samua, being 8 leagues from Cape Trepoinces toward Eastnortheast. Betwene Cape Trepoinces and the towne of Samua is a great ledge of rocks a great way out in the sea. We continued foure dayes at that Towne, and the Capitaine thereof would needs haue a pledge a shore. But when they receiued the pledge, they kept him still, and would traffike no more, but shot off their ordinance at vs. They haue two or three pieces of ordinance and no more.

The towne of Samma.

The pledge was fir Iohn Yorke his p'sent.

The sixteenth day of the said month we made reckoning to come to a place called Cape Corea, where capitaine Don Iohn dwelleth, whose men entertained vs friendly. This Cape Corea is foure leagues Eastward of the castle of Mina, otherwile called La mina, or Castello de mina, where we arrived the 18 day of the moneth. Here we made sale of all our cloth, sauing two or three packes.

Cape Corea.

The castle of Mina pertaining to the King of Portugall.

The 26 day of the same moneth we weighed anchor, and departed from thence to the Trinitie, which was seuen leagues Eastward of vs, where she solde her wares. Then they of the Trinitie willed vs to go Eastward of that eight or nine leagues, to sell part of their wares, in a place called Perecow, and another place named Perecow Grande, being the Eastermost place of both these, which you shal know by a great round hill neere unto it, named Mote Rodondo, lying Westward from it, and by the water side are many high palme trees. From hence did we see forth homeward the thirteenth day of February, & plied vp along it till we came within seuen or eight leagues to Cape Trepoinces. About eight of the clocke the 15 day at afternoone, wee did cast about to seaward: and betwae of the currants, for they will deceiue you sore. Whosoener shall come from the coast of Mina homeward, let him be sure to make his way good West, untill he reckon himselfe as farre as Cape de las Palmas, where the currant setteth alwayes to the Eastward. And within twentie leagues Eastward of Cape de las Palmas is a riuer called De los Poros, where you may haue fresh water and ballast enough, and plenty of iuoy or Elephants teeth. This riuer standeth in foure degrees, and almost two tercies. And when you reckon your selfe as farre shot as Cape de las Palmas, being in a degree, or a degree and a halfe, you may go West, and West by North, vntill you come in three degrees: and then you may go Westnorthwest, and Northwest and by West, vntill you come in five degrees, and then Northwest. And in five degrees, we met Norththerly winde, and great ruffling of tides. And as we could iudge, the currants went to the Northnorthwest. Further in betwene Cape de Monte, and Cape verde, go great currants which deceiue many men.

Currants.

The 22 day of Aprill, we were in 8 degrees and two tercies: and so we ran to the Northwest, hauing the winde at Northeast and Eastnortheast, and sometimes at East, untill we were at 18 degrees and a tercie, which was on Hay day. And so from 18 and two tercies, we had the winde at East and Eastnortheast, and sometimes at Eastsoutheast: and then we reckoned the Islands of Cape verde Eastsoutheast of vs, we iudging our selues to be 48 leagues off. And in 20 and 21 degrees, we had the winde more Easterly to the Southward then before. And so we ran to the Northwest and Northnorthwest, and sometimes North and by West, untill we came into 31 degrees, where we reckoned our selues a hundred and fourescore leagues Southwest and by South of the Island de los Flores, and there wee met with the winde at Southsoutheast, and set our course Northeast.

The Ile de Flores.

In 23 degrees we had the winde at the South and Southwest, and then we set our course Northnortheast, and so we ran to 40 degrees, and then we set our course Northeast, the winde being at the Southwest, and hauing the Ile de Flores East of vs, and 17 leagues off.

In the 41 degrees we met with the winde at Northeast, and so we ran Northwestward, then we met with the winde Westnorthwest, and at the West within 6 leagues, running toward the Northwest, and then we cast about, and lay Northeast, untill we came in 42 degrees, where we set our course Eastnortheast, iudging the Ile of Coruo South and by West of vs, and five and thirtie leagues distant from vs.

The Ile of Coruo.

A remembrance, that the 21 day of May we communed with Iohn Rafe, and he thought it best to goe Northeast, and iudged himselfe 25 leagues Eastward to the Ile de Flores, and in 39 degrees and a halfe.

Note, that on the fourth day of September, vnder nine degrees, we lost the sight of the North Starre.

Note also, that in 45 degrees, the compasse is varied 8 degrees to the West.

Item, in 40 degrees the compasse did varie 15 degrees in the whole.

Item, in 30 degrees and a halfe, the compasse is varied 5 degrees to the West.

Be it also in memory that two or three daies before we came to Cape de 3 puntas, the plummet went alongſt the ſhore, thinking to ſell ſome of our wares, and ſo we came to anchor three or foure leagues Weſt and by South of the Cape de 3 puntas, where we left the Trinitie.

Then our pinnelle came aboard with all our men, the pinnelle alſo tooke in more wares. They told me moreover that they would goe to a place where the Primroſe was, and had receiv'd much gold at the firſt voyage to theſe parties, and tolde me furthermore that it was a good place: but I fearing a bigancine that was then upon the coaſt, did wey and follow them, and left the Trinitie about foure leagues off from vs, and there we rode againſt that towne foure dayes: ſo that Martine by his owne deſire, and aſſent of ſome of the Commiſſioners that were in the pinnelle, went a ſhoare to the towne, and there Iohn Berin went to traſique from vs, being three miles off traſiquing at an other towne. The towne is called Samma or Samua; for Samma and Sammaterra, are the names of the two firſt townes, where we did traſique for gold, to the Northeaſt of Cape de 3 puntas.

Hitherto continueth the courſe of the voyage, as it was deſcribed by the ſayd Pilot. Nowe therefore I will ſpeake ſomewhat of the countrey and people, and of ſuch things as are brought from thence.

They brought from thence at the laſt voiage foure hundred pound weight and odd of gold, of two and twentie carrats and one graine in fineneſſe: alſo ſix and thirtie buſs of graines, & about two hundred and fifty Elephants teeth of all quantities. Of theſe I ſaw & meaſured ſome of nine ſpanes in length, as they were crook'd. Some of them were as bigge as a mans thigh above the knee, and weyed about foureſcore and ten pound weight a peece. They ſay that ſome one hath bin ſcene of an hundred and five & twentie pound weight. Other there were which they call the teeth of calves, of one or two or three yeeres, whereof ſome were a foot and a halfe, ſome two foot, and ſome 3 or more, according to y age of the beaſt. Theſe great teeth or tuſks grow in the upper jaw downward, and not in the nether jaw upward, wherein the Painters and Arras workers are deſciv'd. At this laſt voyage was brought from Guinea the head of an Elephant, of ſuch huge bigneſſe, that onely the bones or crane of thereof, beſide the nether jaw & great tuſks, weighed about two hundred weight, and was as much as I could well liſt from the ground: inſomuch that conſidering alſo herewith the weight of two ſuch great teeth, the nether jaw with the leſſe teeth, the tongue, the great hanging eares, the bigge & long ſnout or tronke, with all the fleſh, baines, and ſkinne, with all other parts belonging to the whole head, in my iudgement it could weigh little leſſe then five hundred weight. This head divers haue ſcene in the houſe of the worthy marchant Sir Andrew Iudde, where alſo I ſaw it, and beheld it, not only with my bodily eyes, but much more with the eyes of my mind and ſpirit, conſidering by the worke, the cunning and wiſedome of the workemaſter: without which conſideration, the ſight of ſuch ſtrange and wonderfull things may rather ſeeme curioſities, then profitable contemplations.

The deſcripti-

ties of the Ele- phant.

The Elephant (which ſome call an Oliphant) is the biggeſt of all foure footed beaſts, his fore-leggs are longer then his hinder, he hath ancles in the lower part of his hinder legges, and five toes on his feete undivided, his ſnout or tronke is ſo long, and in ſuch forme, that it is to him in the ſtead of a hand: for he neither eateth nor drinketh but by bringing his tronke to his mouth, therewith he helpeth by his Paſſer or keeper, therewith he overthroweth trees. Beſide his two great tuſks, he hath on every ſide of his mouth foure teeth, wherewith he eateth and grindeth his meate: either of theſe teeth are almoſt a ſpan in length, as they grow along in the jaw, and are about two inches in height, and almoſt as much in thickneſſe. The tuſkes of the male are greater then of the female: his tongue is very litle, and ſo farre in his mouth, that it cannot be ſcene: of all beaſtes they are moſt gentle and tractable, for by many ſundry wayes they are taught, and doe underſtand: inſomuch that they learne to doe due honor to a king, and are of quicke ſenſe and ſharpenneſſe of wit. When the male hath once ſeaſoned the female, he neuer after toucheth her. The male Elephant lieth two hundred yeeres, or at the leaſt one hundred and twentie: the female almoſt as long, but the flower of their age is but threeſcore yeeres, as ſome write. They cannot ſuffer winter or cold: they love rivers, and will often go into them up to the ſnout, wherewith they blow and ſnuſſe, and play in the water: but ſwimme they cannot, for the weight of their bodies. Plinie and Soline write, that they uſe none adulterie. If they happen to meete with a man in wilderneſſe being out of the way, gently they wil go before him, & bring him into the plaine way. Joynd in battel, they have no ſmall reſpect vnto them that be wounded: for they bring them that are hurt or weary into the middle of the army to be defended: they are made tame by drinking the iuice of barley. They haue continual warre againſt Dragons, which deſire their blood, becauſe it is very cold: and therefore the Dragon lying awaite as the Elephant paſſeth by, winneth his taile (being of exceeding length) about the hinder legs of the Elephant, & ſo ſtaying him, thruſteth his head into his tronke, and exhauſteth his breath, or elſe biteth him in the eare, wherunto he cannot reach with his tronke, and and when the Elephant wareth faint, he falleth downe on the serpent, being now full of blood, and with the poise of his body breaketh him: so that his owne blood with the blood of the Elephant runneth out of him mingled together, which being colde, is congealed into that substance which the Apothecaries call Sanguis Draconis, (that is) Dragons blood, otherwise called Cinnabaris, although there be another kinde of Cinnabaris, commonly called Cinoper or Vermilion, which the Painters vse in certaine colours.

of Elephants.

They are also of three kinds, as of the Parthes, the plaines, and the mountaines, no lesse differing in conditions, Philostratus writeth, that as much as the Elephant of Libya in signes passeth the horse of Nylca, so much doe the Elephants of India exceed them of Libya: for the Elephants of India, some haue bene seene of the height of nine cubits: the other do so greatly feare these, that they dare not abide the sight of them. Of the Indian Elephants onely the males haue tuskes, but of them of Ethiopia and Libya both kinds are tusked: they are of diuers heights, as of twelue, thirtene, and foueteene dodrants, euery dodrant being a measure of nine inches. Some write that an Elephant is bigger then three wilde Dren or Buttes. They of India are black, or of y^e colour of a mouse, but they of Ethiopie or Guinea are browne: the hide or skinn of them all is very hard, and without haire or bristles: their eares are two dodrants broad, and their eyes very litle. One men saw one drinking at a riuer in Guinea, as they sailed into the land.

Of other properties & conditions of the Elephant, as of their marueilous docilitie, of their fight and vse in the warres, of their generation and chastitie, when they were first seene in the Theaters and triumphes of the Romanes, how they are taken & tamed, and when they cast their tuskes, with the vse of the same in medicine, who so desireth to know, let him reade Plinie, in the eight booke of his naturall history. He also writeth in his twelue booke, that in olde time they made many goodly workes of iuoy or Elephants teeth: as tables, tressels, postes of houses, rails, lat tesses for windowes, images of their gods, and diuers other things of iuoy, both coloured and vncoloured, and intermixt with sundry kinds of precious woods, as at this day are made certaine chaires, lutes, and virginals. They had such plenty thereof in olde time, that (as far as I remember) Iosephus writeth, that one of the gates of Hierusalem was called Porta Eburnea, (that is) the Iuoy gate. The witenesse thereof was so much esteemed, that it was thought to represent the naturall fairenesse of mans skinn: insomuch that such as went about to set forth (or rather corrupt) naturall beautie with colours and painting, were reproued by this proverbe, Ebur atramento candefacere, that is, To make iuoy white with inke. The Poets also describing the faire necks of beautifull virgins, call them Eburnea colla, that is, Iuoy necks. And to haue said thus much of Elephants and Iuoy, it may suffice.

Now therefore I will speake somewhat of the people and their maners, and maner of liuing, with another bryefe description of Africa also. It is to be vnderstood, that the people which now inhabite the reigons of the coast of Guinea, and the middle parts of Africa, as Libya the inner, and Nubia, with diuers other great & large regions about the same, were in old time called Ethiopes and Nigritæ, which we now call Moores, Moorens, or Negroes, a people of beaustly liuing, without a God, lawe, religion, or common wealth, and so scorched and bered with the heat of the sunne, that in many places they curse it when it riseth. Of the regions and people about the inner Libya (called Libya interior) Gemma Phrysius writeth thus.

The people of Africa.

Libya interior.

Libya interior is very large and desolate, in the which are many horrible wildernesses & mountaines, replenished with diuers kinds of wilde and monstrous beastes and serpents. First from Mauritania or Barbary toward the South is Getulia, a rough and sauage region, whose inhabitants are wilde and wandering people. After these follow the people called Melanogetuli and Pharusij, which wander in the wilderness, carrying with them great gourdes of water. The Ethiopians called Nigritæ occupy a great part of Africa, and are extended to the West Ocean. Southward also they reach to the riuer Nigritis, whose nature agreeth with the riuer of Nilus, forasmuch as it is increased and diminished at the same time, and bringeth forth the like beastes as the Crocodile. By reason whereof, I thinke this to be the same riuer which the Portugals call Senega: For this riuer is also of the same nature. It is furthermore marueilous and very strange that is said of this riuer: And this is, that on the one side thereof, the inhabitants are of high stature and black, and on the other side, of browne or tawnie colour, and low stature, which thing also our men confirme to be true.

There are also other people of Libya called Garamantes, whose women are common: for they contract no matrimonie, neither haue respect to chastitie. After these are the nations of the people called Pyrei, Sathiodaphnitæ, Odrangi, Mimaces, Lynxamatæ, Dolopes, Aganging, Leuci Ethiopes, Xilice Ethiopes, Calcei Ethiopes, and Nubi. These haue the same situation in Ptolome that they now giue to the kingdome of Nubia. Here are certaine Christians vnder the dominion of

of the great Emperour of Aethiopia, called Prestor Iohn. From these toward the West is a great nation of people called Aphricerones, whose region (as farre as may be gathered by coniecture) is the same that is now called Regnum Orguene, confining vpon the East parts of Guinea, From hence Westward, and somewhat toward the North, are the kingdoms of Gambra and Budomel, not farre from the riuer of Senega. And from hence toward the inland regions, and along by the sea coast, are the regions of Ginoia or Guinea, which we commonly call Ginnee. On the Westside of these regions toward the Ocean, is the cape or point called Cabo verde, or Caput viride, (that is) the greene cape, to which the Portugals first direct their course when they saile to America, or the land of Brasile. Then departing from hence, they turne to the right hand toward the quarter of the wind called Garbino, which is betwene the West and the South. But to speake some what more of Aethiopia: although there are many nations of people so named, yet is Aethiopia chiefly diuided into two parts, whereof the one is called Aethiopia vnder Aegypt, a great & rich region. To this pertaineth the Island Meroc, inbaced round about with the streames of the riuer Nilus. In this Island women reigned in old time. Iosephus writeth, that it was sometime called Sabea: and that the Queene of Saba came from thence to Ierusalem, to heare the wisdom of Salomon. Fro hence toward the East reigneth the said Christian Emperour Prestor Iohn, whom some call Papa Iohannes, & other say that he is called Pean Iuan (that is) great Iohn, whose Empire reacheth far beyond Nilus, and is extended to the coasts of the Red sea & Indian sea. The midole of the region is almost in 66. degrees of longitude, and 12. degrees of latitude. About this region inhabite the people called Clodi, Risophagi, Babylonij, Aximutæ, Molili, and Molibæ. After these is the region called Troglodytica, whose inhabitants dwell in caues and denues: for these are their houses, & the flesh of serpents their meat, as writeth Plinie, and Diodorus Siculus. They haue no speech, but rather a grinning and chattering. There are also people without heads, called Blemines, hauing their eyes and mouth in their breast. Likewise Strucophagi, and naked Ganthasantes: Satyrs also, which haue nothing of men but onely thape. Bozeouer Oripei, great hunters, Memnones also, and the region of Smyrnophora, which bringeth forth myrrhe. After these is the region of Azania, in the which many Elephants are found. A great part of the other regions of Africke that are beyond the Aequinoctiall line, are now ascribed to the kingdome of Melinde, whose inhabitants are accustomed to trafique with the nations of Arabia, and their king is ioynd in friendship with the king of Portugal, and payeth tribute to Prestor Iohn.

The other Ethiope, called Aethiopia interior (that is) the inner Ethiope, is not yet knowne for the greatnesse thereof, but onely by the sea coastes: yet is it described in this maner. First from the Aequinoctiall toward South, is a great region of Aethiopians, which bringeth forth white Elephants, Tygers, and the beastes called Rhinocerotes. Also a region that bringeth forth plenty of cynamome, lying betwene the branches of Nilus. Also the kingdome of Habech or Habasha, a region of Christian men, lying both on this side and beyond Nilus. Here are also the Aethiopians, called Ichthiophagi (that is) such as liue onely by fish, and were sometimes subdued by the warres of great Alexander. Furthermoze the Aethiopians called Rhapsij, & Anthrophophagi, are accustomed to eat mans flesh, inhabite the regions neere vnto the mountains called Montes Lunæ (that is) the mountaines of the Moone. Gazaria is vnder the Tropike of Capricorne. After this followeth the front of Africke, the Cape of Buena Speranza, or Caput Bonæ Spei, that is, the Cape of good hope, by the which they passe that saile from Lisbon to Calicut. But by what names the Capes and gulfs are called, forasmuch as the same are in euery globe and card, it were here superfluous to rehearse them.

Some write that Africa was so named by the Grecians, because it is without colde. For the Greeke letter Alpha or A significth priuation, vpon, or without: and Phrice significth colde. For in deed although in the stead of Winter they haue a clowdy and tempestuous season, yet is it not colde, but rather smothering hote, with hote showres of raine also, and somewhere such scorching windes, that what by one meanes and other, they seeme at certaine times to liue as it were in fornaces, and in maner already halfe way in Purgatorie or hell. Gemma Phrius writeth, that in certaine parts of Africa, as in Atlas the greater, the aire in the night season is seene shining, with many strange fires and flames rising in maner as high as the Moone: and that in the element are sometime heard as it were the sound of pipes, trumpets and drummes: which noises may perhaps be caused by the vehement and sundry motions of such fire exhalations in the aire, as we see the like in many experiences wrought by fire, aire and winde. The hollownesse also, and diuers reflexions and breaking of the cloudes may be great causes hereof, beside the vehement colde of the middle region of the aire, whereby the said fiery exhalations, ascending thither, are suddenly stricken backe with great force: for euen common and dailie experience teacheth vs, by the whistling of a burning torch, what noise fire maketh in the aire, and much more where it strueth when it is inclosed closed with aire, as appeareth in gunnes, and as the like is seene in onely aire inclosed, as in Organ pipes, and such other instruments that go by winde. For winde (as say the Philosophers) is none other then aire vehemently moued, as we see in a paire of bellowses, and such other.

The nature of Elements.
Winde.

Some of our men of good credit that were in this last voyage to Guinea, affirme earnestly that in the night season they felt a sensible heat to come from the beames of the moone. The which thing, although it be strange and insensible to vs that inhabite cold regions, yet doeth it stand with good reason that it may so be, forasmuch as the nature of starres and planets (as writeth Plinie) consisteth of fire, and containeth in it a spirit of life, which cannot be without heat.

The heat of the Moone.

The nature of the starres.

And, that the Moone giveth heat vpon the earth the Prophet David seemeth to confirme in his 121. Psalm, where speaking of such men as are defended from evils by Gods protection, hee saith thus: Per diem Sol non exuret te, nec Luna per noctem. That is to say, In the day the Sunne shall not burne thee, nor the Moone by night.

They say furthermore, that in certaine places of the sea they saw certaine streames of water, which they call Spouts, falling out of the aire into the sea, & that some of these are as bigge as the great pillars of Churches: insomuch that sometimes they fall into shippes, and put them in great danger of drowning. Some saie that these should be the Cataracts of heauen, which were all opened at Noes floud. But I thinke them rather to be such fluxions and eruptions as Aristotle in his booke de Mundo saith, to chance in the sea. For speaking of such strange things as are seene often times in the sea, he writeth thus, Oftentimes also euen in the sea are seene euaporations of fire, and such eruptions and breaking forth of Springs, that the mouthes of riuers are opened.

Spouts of water falling out of the air.

Cataracts of heauen.

Whirlpooles, and fluxions are caused of such other vehement motions, not only in the midst of the sea, but also in creeks & streights. At certaine times also, a great quantity of water is suddenly lifted vp and carried about with the Moone, &c. By which wordes of Aristotle it doth appeare that such waters be lifted vp in one place at one time, and suddenly fall downe in an other place at another time. And herunto perhaps pertaineth it that Richard Chancellor told me that he heard Sebastian Cabot report, that (as farre as I remember) either about the coasts of Brasile or Rio de Plata, his shippe or pinnelle was suddenly lifted from the sea, and cast vpon land, I wot not howe farre. The which thing, and such other like wonderfull and strange workes of nature while I consider, and call to remembrance the narrownesse of mans vnderstanding and knowledge, in comparison of her mightie power, I can but cease to maruell and confesse with Plinie, that nothing is to her impossible, the least part of whose power is not yet knowen to men. Many things moze our men saw and considered in this voyage, woorthy to be noted, whercof I haue thought good to put some in memory, that the reader may as well take pleasure in the variety of things, as knowledge of the historie. Among other things therefore, touching the maners and nature of the people, this may seeme strange, that their princes & noble men vse to pounce and rase their skinnes with pretie knots in diuers formes, as it were branched damaske, thinking that to be a decent ornament.

A muske cat:

And albeit they goe in maner all naked, yet are many of them, & especially their women, in maner laden with collars, bracelets, hoopess, and chaines, either of gold, copper, or iron. I my selfe haue one of their bracelets of Iron, weighing two pound and sixe ounces of Troy weight, which make eight and thirtie ounces: this one of their women did weare vpon her arme. It is made of one whole piece of the biggest part of the tooth, turned and somewhat carued, with a hole in the midst, wherin they put their hands to weare it on their arme. Some haue on euery arme one, and as many on their legges, wherewith some of them are so galled, that although they are in maner made lame thereby, yet will they by no meanes leaue them off. Some weare also on their legges great shackles of bright copper, which they thinke to bee no lesse comely. They weare also collars, bracelets, garlands, and girdles, of certain blew stones like beads. Likewise some of their women weare on their bare armes certaine foxsleues made of the plates of beaten golde. On their fingers also they weare rings, made of golden wires, with a knot or wreath, like vnto that which children make in a ring of a rush. Among other things of golde that our men bought of them for exchange of their wares, were certaine dogs-chaines and collers.

They are very wary people in their bargaining, and will not lose one sparke of golde of any value. They vse weights and measures, and are very circumspect in occupying the same. They that shall haue to doe with them, must vse them gently: for they will not traffique or bzing in any wares if they be euill vsed. At the first voyage that our men had into these parties, it so chanced, that at their departure from the first place where they did traffick, one of them either stole a muske Cat, or tooke her away by force, not mistrusting that that should haue hindered their bargaining in another place whither they intended to goe. But for all the haste they coulde make with full sailes, the fame of their misusage so prevented them, that the people of that place also, offended thereby, would bzing in no wares: insomuch that they were enforced either to restore the Cat, or pay for her at their price, befoze they could trafique there.

- Their houses. Their houses are made of foure postes of trees, and couered with boughes.
- Their feeding. Their common feeding is of roots, & such fishes as they take, whereof they haue great plenty.
- Flying fishes. There are also such flying fishes as are seene in the sea of the West Indies. Our men salted of their fishes, hoping to prouide store thereof: but they would take no salt, and must therefore be eaten forthwith as some say. Howbeit other affirme, that if they be salted immediatly after they be taken, they will last uncorrupted ten or twelue dayes. But this is moze strange, that part of such flesh as they caried with them out of England, which putrified there, became swete againe at their returne to the clime of temperate regions.
- A strange thing. They vse also a strange making of bread, in this maner. They grinde betweene two stones with their handes as much cozne as they thinke may suffice their family, and when they haue thus brought it to floure, they put thereto a certaine quantitie of water, and make thereof very thinne dough, which they sticke vpon some post of their houses, where it is baked by the heate of the Sunne: so that when the master of the house or any of his family will eate thereof, they take it downe and eate it.
- Their wheate. They haue very faire wheate, the eare whereof is two handfuls in length, and as bigge as a great Buttrush, and almost foure inches about where it is biggest. The stennie or straw seemeth to be almost as bigge as the litle finger of a mans hand, or litle lesse. The graines of this wheate are as big as our peason, round also, and very white, and somewhat shining, like pearles that haue lost their colour. Almost all the substance of them turneth into floure, & maketh litle bran or none. I told in one eare two hundred & threescore graines. The eare is inclosed in three blades longer then it selfe, & of two inches broad a piece. And by this fruitfulness the Sunne seemeth partly to recompence such gricfes and molestations as they otherwise receiue by the seruent heate thereof. It is doubtlesse a woorthy cōtemplation to consider the contrary effects of the sunne: or rather the contrary passions of such things as receiue the influence of his beames, either to their hurt or benefit.
- The Sunne. Their drinke is either water, or the uisile that droppeth from the cut branches of the barren Date trees, called Palmitos. For either they hang great gourdes at the said branches euery euening, and let them so hang all night, or else they set them on the ground vnder the trees, that the droppes may fall therin. They say that this kinde of drinke is in taste much like unto whey, but somewhat sweeter, and moze pleasant. They cut the branches euery euening, because they are seared by in the day by the heate of the Sunne. They haue also great beanes as bigge as chestnuts, and very hard, with a shell in the stead of a huske.
- Their drinke. Many things moze might be saide of the maners of the people, and of the wonders and monstrous things that are engendred in Africke. But it shall suffice to haue saide thus much of such things as our men partly sawe, and partly brought with them.
- Graines. And whereas befoze speaking of the fruit of graines, I described the same to haue holes by the side (as in deede it hath, as it is brought hither) yet was I afterwarde enformed, that those holes were made to put stringes or twiggies through the fruite, thereby to hang them vp to dry at the Sunne. They grow not past a foote and a halfe, or two foote from the ground, and are as red as blood when they are gathered. The graines themselves are called of the Philosophers Grana Paradisi.
- Shells that cleaue to ships. At their coming home the keeles of their shippes were maruellously ouergrowne with certaine shelles of two inches length and moze, as thicke as they could stand, and of such bignesse that a man might put his thumbe in the mouches of them. They certainly affirme that in these there groweth a certaine slimie substance, which at the length slipping out of the shell and falling in the sea, becommeth those foules which we call Barnacles. The like shelles haue bene ferne in ships returninge frō Ireland, but these shelles were not past halfe an inch in length. Of the other that came from Guinea, I sawe the Primerose lying in the dorke, and in maner couered with the said shels, which in my indgement should greatly hinder her sayling. Their ships were also in many places eaten with the wormes called Bromas or Bissas, whereof mention is made in the Decades. These creepe betweene the planks, which they eate through in many places.
- Barnacles. Among other things that chanced to them in this voyage, this is woorthy to be noted, that whereas they sailed thither in seuen weekes, they could returne in no lesse space then twentie weekes. The cause whereof they say to be this: That about the coast of Cabo Verde the winde is euer at the East, by reason whereof they were enforced to saile farre out of their course into the maine Ocean, to finde the winde at the West to bring them home. There died of our men at this last voyage about twentie and foure, whereof many died at their returne into the clime of the calde regions, as betweene the Islands of Azores and England. They brought with them certaine blacke slaues, whereof some were tall and strong men, and could wel agree with our meates and drinkes.
- Bromas.
- A secret.
- The death of our men.
- Five blacke Moores brought into England.

The colde and moyst aire doth somewhat offend them. Yet doubtlesse men that are bozne in hot Regions may better abide colde, then men that are bozne in colde Regions may abide heate, forasmuch as vehement heate resolueth the radicall moysture of mens bodies, as colde constraineth and preferueth the same.

Colde may be better abided then heate.

This is also to be considered as a secret worke of nature, that throughout all Africke, vnder the Equinoctial line, and neere about the same on both sides, the regions are extreeme hote, and the people very blacke. Whereas contrariwise such regions of the West Indies as are vnder the same line are very temperate, and the people neither blacke, nor with curle and short wooll on their heads, as they of Africke haue, but of the colour of an Oliue, with long and blacke haire on their heads: the cause of which variety is declared in diuers places in the Decades.

It is also worthy to be noted that some of them that were at this voyage told me: That is, that they ouertooke the course of the Sonne, so that they had it North from them at noone, the 14. day of March. And to haue said thus much of these voyages, it may suffice.

The first voyage made by Master William Towrson Marchant of London, to the coast of Guinea, with two Ships, in the yeere 1555.

Don Vnday the thirtieth day of September wee departed from the Isle of Wight, out of the hauen of Neuporr with two good shippes, the one called the Harr, the other the Hinde, both of London, and the Masters of them were Iohn Ralph, and William Carter, for a voyage to bee made vnto the Riuer de Sestos in Guinea, and to other hauens thereabout. September.

It fell out by the varietie of windes, that it was the foureteenth day of October before wee coulde fetch Dartmouth: and being there arriued wee continued in that roade fise dayes, and the 20. of October we warpt out of the haucn, and set saile, directing our course towards the Southweest, and the next morning we were runne by estimation thirte leagues. October.

The first of Nouember we found our selues to be in 31. degrees of latitude by the reckoning of our Master. This day we ranne about 40. leagues also. Nouember.

The second day we ranne 36. leagues.

The third day we had sight of Porto Santo, which is a small Island lying in the sea, about thre leagues long, and a league & a halfe broad, & is possessed by Portugals. It riseth as we came from the Northnorthwest like two small hilles neere together. The East end of the same Island is a high land like a saddle with a valley, which makes it to heare that soyme. The West end of it is lower with certaine small round hillocks. This Island lyeth in thirte and thre degrees. The same day at 11. of the clocke we raysted the Isle of Madera, which lieth 12. leagues from Porto Santo, towards the Southweest: that Island is a faire Island and fruitfull, and is inhabited by Portugals, it riseth as farre off like a great whole land and high. By thre of the clocke this day at after noone we were thwart of Porto Santo, and we set our course Southweest, to leaue the Isle of Madera to the Eastward, as we did Porto Santo. These two Islands were the first land that we saw since wee left the coast of England. About thre of the clocke after midnight wee were thwart of Madera, within thre leagues of the West end of it, and by meanes of the high hilles there, we were becalmed: We suppose we ranne this day and night 30. leagues. Porto Santo. Madera.

The fourth day wee lay becalmed vnder the Isle of Madera, vntill one of the clocke at afternoone, and then the winde comming into the East, wee went our course, and ranne that day fiftene leagues.

The 5. day we ranne 15. leagues more.

The 6. day in the morning we raysted the Isle of Tenerif, other wise called the Pike, because it is a very high Island, with a pike vpon the top like a loafe of suger. The same night we raysted the Isle of Palma, which is a high land also, and to the Westward of the Isle of Tenerif. Tenerif. Palma.

The 7. day we perceived the Isle of Gomera, which is an Island standing betwixt Tenerif and Palma, about 12. leagues Eastward from Palma, and 8. leagues Westward from Tenerif: and for feare of being becalmed with the Isle of Tenerif, we left both it, and Gomera to the Eastward of vs, and went betwixt Palma and Gomera. We ranne this day and night 30. leagues. Gomera.

Note that these Islands be 60. leagues from Madera, and that there are 3. Islands more to the Westward of Tenerif, named the Grand Canaria, Forte-ventura, & Lancerot, of which Islands we came not in sight: they be inhabited by Spaniards.

This day also we had sight of the Isle of Ferro, which is to the Southwards 13. leagues from the other Islands, and is possessed by Spaniards. All this day and night by reason of the winde we Ferro.

we could not double the point of the Isle of Ferro, except we would haue gone to the Westward of it, which had bene much out of our course: therefore we kept about, and ranne backe five hours Eastnortheast to the ende we might double it vpon the next boord, the winde continuing South-east, which hath not bene often seene vpon that coast by any traualliers: for the winde continually there for the most part Northeast, & East Northeast: so vpon the other boord by the next morning we were in a manner with the Island, and had roome ynough to double the same.

The 8. day we kept our course as neere the winde as wee could, because that our due course to fetch the coast of Barbary was Southeast and by East, but by the scant winde wee could not goe our due course, but went as neere it as we could, and ranne this day and night 25. leagues.

The 9. day we ranne 30. leagues, the 10. 25. leagues, the 12. 24.

The 12. day we sawe a saile vnder our Lee, which was as we thought a fisherman, so that wee went roome to haue spoken with him, but within one houre there fell such a fogge, that wee could not see the shippe nor one of vs the other: we shot off diuers pieces to the Hinde, but he heard them not: at after noone she shot off a piece which wee heard, and made her answere with another: and within one halfe houre after the fogge brake vp, and we were within 4. leagues of the shoare vpon the coast of Barbary, and wee sounded and had 14. fadom water. The Backe also came roome with vs and there ankered by reason of the contrary winde. When we fell with the land, we could not iudge iustly what part of the land it was, because the most part of that coast is lowe land, and no part to be iudged of it but the forepart of the shoare, which is white like chálke or sand, and very deepe into the hard shoare: there immediately we began to fish, and found great store of a kinde of fish which the Portugals commonly fish for vpon that coast, which they call Pergosses, the Frenchmen call them Saders, and our men salt-water breames. Before the clearing vp of the fogge, the shippe which we followed shap'd vs such a course that we could see her no more, by reason of our shooting off to finde the Hinde againe. This part of the coast of Barbary, by our Pilots reckoning, is about 16. leagues to the Eastwards of the riuer del Oro.

Riuer del Oro,

The 13. day in the afternoone wee spied a saile comming towards vs, which wee iudged to be the saile that wee sawe the day before, and as soone as we spied him, wee caused the Hinde to way her ancre and to goe towards him, and manned out our Skiffe in like case to lay him aboord, or to discern what hee was, and wee our selues within halfe an houre after wayed also: but after the saile had espied vs, hee kept about, and turned backe againe, and shortly after there fell such another fogge, that wee coulde not see him: which fogges continued all that night, so that we were constrained to leaue the chafe. This afternoone the winde came about, and wee went our course Southwest and by West, to goe cleare off the coast, wee ranne that night sixteen leagues.

The foureteenth day in the morning was very foggie: but about twelue a clocke wee espied a Caruell of 60. tunne which was fishing, and we sent our Skiffe to him with five men, and all without any weapon sauing their Dares. The Caruell for haste let slippe her ancre, and set saile: and they seeing that, fearing that they should not fetch her, would tary for no weapons, and in the ende overtooke the Caruell, and made her to strike saile, and brought her away, although they had foureteeen or fiftene men aboord, & every man his weapon, but they had not the hearts to resist our men. After they were come to vs, they let fall their ancre, for wee had cast ancre because the winde was not good: I caused then the Skiffe to come for mee, and I went aboord of them to see that no harme should bee done to them, nor to take any thing but that which they might spare vs for our money. So we tooke of them 3. Tappets of figges, two small pots of oyle, two pipes of water, foure hogheads of saltfish which they had taken vpon the coast, and certaine fresh fish which they did not esteeme, because there is such store vpon that coast, that in an houre and sometime lesse, a man may take as much fish as will serue twentie men a day. For these things, and for some wine which wee dranke aboord of them, and three or foure great Canues which they sent aboord of our shippes, I payed them twentie and seuen Pistols, which was twice as much as they willingly would haue taken: and so let them goe to their ancre and cable which they had let slippe, and got it againe by our helpe. After this wee set saile, but the winde caused vs to ancre againe about twelue leagues off the riuer del Oro, as the Portugals tolde vs. There were five Caruels more in this place, but when they sawe vs, they made all away for feare of vs.

A Caruell taken.

Great store of fish vpon the coast of Barbary.

The 15. day we ridde still because of the winde.

The Tropike of Cancer in 23. and a halfe.

The 16. day we set saile and ranne our course 40. leagues. This day, by the reckoning of our Pilots, we were right vnder the Tropike of Cancer. The 17. day we ranne 25. leagues within sight for the most part of the coast of Barbary.

The 18. day wee ranne thirtie leagues, and at twelue of the clocke by the reckoning of our pilots Pilots we were thwart of Cape Blanke.

Cape Blanke.

The 22. day our Pilots reckoned vs to be thwart Cape Verde.

Cape Verde.

The coast of Guinea.

The 12. day of December we had sight of land of Guinea, which as soone as we saw we halled into the land North-east, and about 12. of the clocke at night we were neere the shoare within lesse then 2. leagues: and then we kept about and sounded, and found 18. fadom water. Afterwards we saw a light towarcs the shoare, which we thought to haue bene a ship, and thereby iudged it to be the riuer de Sektos, which light as soone as we espied, we came to an anchor & armed our tops, and made all things ready to fight, because we doubted that it might be some Portugal or French man: this night we remained at an anchor, but in the morning we saw no man, only we espied 4. rockes about 2. English miles from vs, one great rocke, and the 3. other smal ones, which when we sawe, we supposed that the light came from the shoare, and so wayed and set saile East Southeast along the shoare, because the Master did not well know the place, but thought that we were not so farre to the East as the riuer de Sektos.

This land all along is a low land, and full of very high trees all along the shoare, so that it is not possible to know the place that a man doth fall withall, except it be by the latitude: In the 24. houres I thinke we ran 16. leagues, for all the night we had a great gale as we were vnder saile, and had withall shoare of thunder and lightnings.

The 13. day for the most part we ran East Southeast all along the shoare, within two leagues alwayes of the same, and found the land all as at the first, full of woods and great rocks hard aboord the shoare, and the billow beating so foze, that the seas brake vpon the shoare as white as snow, and the water mounted so high that a man might easily discerne it 4. leagues off, in such wise that no boate could land there. Thus we ran until 12. of the clocke, and then they tooke the Sunne and after iudged themselves to be 24. leagues past the riuer de Sektos to the Eastwards, by reason whereof we halled into the shoare within two English miles, and there anchored and found fiftene fadom water, and all off from the shoare the sea so smooth, that we might wel haue rid by an Hawser. All that after-noon we trimmed our boate and made her a saile, to the ende that she might go along by the shoore to seeke some place to water in: for wee could not goe backe againe to the riuer de Sektos, because the winde blowes alwayes contrary, and the Current runneth alwayes to the Eastwards, which was also against vs.

The Current running Eastward.

The 14. day we set saile & went back againe along the coast, and sent our boats hard aboord the shoare to seeke a watering place, which they found about 12. of the clock, and we being farre into the sea, met with diuers boats of the Countrey, small, long and narrow, & in euery boate one man and no more: we gaue them bread which they did eat, & were very glad of it. About 4. of the clocke our boats came to vs with fresh water: and this night we anchored against a Riuer.

The 15. day we wayed and set saile to goe neere the shoare, and with our leade wee sounded all the way, and found sometimes rockes, and sometimes faire ground, and at the shallowest found 7. fadoms alwayes at the least. So in fine we found 7. fadom and a halfe within an English mile of the shoare, and there we anchored in a maner before the mouth of the Riuer, and then wee sent our boats into the Riuer for water, which went about a mile within the Riuer, where they had very good water. This Riuer lieth by estimation 8. leagues beyond the Riuer de Sektos, and is called in the Carde Riuer S. Vincent, but it is so hard to finde, that a boat being within halfe a mile of it shall not be able to discerne that it is a Riuer: by reason that directly before the mouth of it there lieth a ledge of rockes, which is much broader then the Riuer, so that a boate must runne in along the shoare a good way betwixt the rockes and the shoare before it come to the mouth of the Riuer, and being within it, it is a great Riuer and diuers other Riuers fall into it: The going into it is somewhat ill, because that at the entering the seas do goe somewhat high, but being once within it, it is as calme as the Thames.

Riuer S. Vincent.

There are neere to the Sea vpon this Riuer diuers inhabitants, which are mighty bigge men and go al naked except some thing before their priuie parts, which is like a clout about a quarter of a yard long made of the barke of trees, and yet it is like a cloth: for the barke is of that nature, that it will spin small after the maner of linnen. Some of them also weare the like vpon their heades being painted with diuers colours, but the most part of them go bare headed, and their heads are clipped and shorne of diuers sorts, and the most part of them haue their skin of their bodies rased with diuers woxkes, in maner of a leather Jerkin. The men and women goe so alike, that one cannot know a man from a woman but by their beaues, which in the most part be very foule and long, hanging downe low like the voder of a goat.

Cloth made of the barke of trees.

The Negroes race their skinned.

The same morning we went into the Riuer with our Skiffe, and caried certaine basons, manels, &c. And there we tooke that day one hog's-head and 100. li. waight of Graines, and two Elephants teeth at a reasonable good reckoning. Wee solde them both basons, and Manellios, and Graines of Guinea Elephants teeth.

Margarits, but they desired most to haue basons: For the most part of our basons wee had by estimation about 30.li. for a peece, and for an Elephants tooth of 30.li. waight, we gaue them 6.

The 16. day in the morning we went into the riuer with our Skiffe, and tooke some of euery sort of our marchandize with vs, and shewed it to the Negroes, but they esteemed it not, but made light of it, and also of the basons, Manellios and Margarits, which yesterday they did buy: he woe it for the basons they would haue giuen vs some graines, but to no purpose, so that this day wee tooke not by estimation aboue one hundred pound waight of Graines, by means of their Captaine, who would suffer no man to sell any thing but through his hands, and at his price: he was so subtil, that for a bason hee would not giue 15. pound waight of Graines, and sometimes would offer vs small dishfuls, whereas before wee had baskets full, and when he saw that wee would not take them in contentment, the Captaine departed, and caused all the rest of the boates to depart, thinking belike that wee would haue followed them, and haue giuen them their owne askings. But after that wee perceiued their fetch, wee wayed our Grapnel and went away, and then wee went on land into a small Towne to see the fashions of the Countrey, and there came a thre score of them about vs, and at the first they were afraid of vs, but in the ende perceiuing that wee did no hurt, they would come to vs and take vs by the hand and be familiar with vs, and then we went into their Townes, which were like to twentie small houels, all couered ouer with great leaues and baggage, and all the sides open, and a scaffold under the house about a yard high, where they worke many pretie things of the barks of trees, and there they lye also. In some of their houses they worke ypon and make faire darts, and diuers other things to worke their boates, and other things withall, and the women worke as well as the men. But when wee were there diuers of the women to shew vs pleasure danced and sung after their maner, full ill to our eares. Their song was thus:

And with these words they leape and dante and clap their hands. Beastes we could see none that they had, but two goates, small dogges, and small hennies: other beastes we saw none. After that we had well marked all things we departed and went aboard our ships: which thing the Captaine of the other towne perceiuing, sent two of his seruants in a boat with a basket of Graines, and made vs signes that if when we had slept wee would come againe into their riuer, wee should haue store of Graines, and so shewed vs his Graines and departed.

The 17. day in the morning because we thought that the Negroes would haue done something because the Captaine sent for vs, I required the Master to goe on shoare, and sent the rest of our Marchants with him, and taried aboard my selfe by reason that the last day he esteemed our things so litle: so when the Master and the rest came into the riuer, the captaine with diuers others came to them, and brought Graines with them, & after that he saw that I was not there, he made signes to know where I was, and they made signes to him againe that I was in the ships: and then hee made signes to know who was Captaine by the name of Diago, for so they call their Captaine, & they pointed to the master of the ship: then he began to shew his Graines, but he held them so unreasonably, that there was no profit to be made of them: which things the Master perceiuing, and seeing that they had no store of Graines, came away, and tooke not aboue 50. pound waight of Graines. Then he went a shoare to the litle Towne where we were the day before, & one of them plucked a Gourd, wherewith the Negroes were offended, & came many of them to our men with their darts and great targets, and made signes to them to depart: which our men did, hauing but one bow and two or thre swords, and went aboard the boate and came away from them: and as soone as they were come aboard we wayed and set saile, but the winde was off the Sea, so that we could not get out cleare of certaine rocks, and therefore we came to an ancre againe.

This riuer is called Riuer S. Vincent, standing in 4. degrees and a halfe, and it ebberth and floweth there euery 12. houres, but not much water when it ebberth the most: while wee were there, it ebbed one fadome and a halfe water.

This countrey as farre as we could perceiue is altogether woody, and al strange trees, whereof wee knewe none, and they were of many sortes, with great leaues like great dockes, which bee higher then any man is able to reach the top of them.

There are certaine peason by the Sea side, which grow vpon great and very long stalkes, one of the stalkes I measured and found it 27. paces long, and they grow vpon the sand like to trees, and that so neere the Sea, that sometimes the Sea floweth into the woods as we might perceiue by the water markes.

The trees and all things in this place grow continually greene: Diuers of the women haue such exceeding long beafts, that some of them wil lay the same vpon the ground and lie downe by them, but all the women haue not such beafts.

At this place all the day the winde bloweth off the Sea, and all the night off the land, but we found it to differ sometimes, which our Master marvelled at.

This night at 9. of the clocke the winde came by at the East, which ordinarily about that time was wont to come out of the North North-west off the shoare: yet we wayed and halled off South with that winde all night into the Sea, but the next morning we halled in againe to the lande, and rooke in 6. Tunnes of water for our ship, and I thinke the Hinde tooke in as much.

I could not perceiue that here was any gold, or any other good thing: for the people be so wilde and idle, that they giue themselves to seeke out nothing: if they would take paines they might gather great store of graines, but in this place I could not perceiue two Tunne.

There are many foules in the Countrey, but the people wil not take the paines to take them.

I obserued some of their wordes of speech, which I thought good here to set downe,

Bezow, bezow, Manegete afoye, Crocow afoye,

The language about the Ri-uer of S. Vincent.

Their Captaine, and some call him Dabo. These and other wordes they speake very thicke, and oftentimes recite one word thre times together, and at the last time longer then at the first.

The 18. day towards night, as we were sailing along the coast, we met with certaine boats in the sea, & the men shewed vs that there was a riuer thwart of vs, where there were Graines to be sold, but we thought it not good to tary there, least the other ships should get before vs. This riuer hath lying before it thre great rockes, and 5. small rockes, one great tree, and a litle tree right by the riuer, which in height exceeded all the rest: we halled this night along the coast 10. leagues.

The 19. day as we coasted the shoare, about twelue of the clocke there came out to vs 3. boates to tell vs that they had graines, & brought some with them for a shew, but we could not tary there. We proceeded along the coast, & ancred by the shoare all the night, and ran this day 10. leagues.

The 20. day the Hinde hauing ankered by vs amongst rockes, and soule ground, lost a small anker. At noone, as we passed along the coast, there came forth a Negro to vs, making signes, that if we would goe a shoare, wee should haue Graines, and where wee ankered at night, there came another to vs, and brought Graines, and shewed vs them, and made signes that wee should tary, and made a fire vpon the land in the night, meaning thereby to tell vs where we should land, and so they did in diuers other places vpon the coast, where they saw vs to anker.

In all the places where we haue ancred, since we came from our watering place, we haue found the tide alwayes running to the Westwards, and all along the coast many rockes hard aboord the shoare, and many of them a league off the shoare or more, we ran this day 12. leagues.

The tides and nature of the shoare.

The 21. day, although we ranne all day with a good gale of winde, yet the tides came so force out of the coast, that we were not able to runne aboue fixe leagues: and this day there came some Negroes to vs, as there had done other times.

The 22. wee ranne all day and night to double a point, called Das palmas, and ranne fixeene leagues.

The point of Palmas.

The 23. day about 3. of the clocke we were thwart of the point, & before we came to the Westermost part of it, we saw a great ledge of rocks, which lie West from the Cape about 3. leagues and a league or more fro the land. Shortly after we had sight of the Eastermost part of the Cape, which lieth 4. leagues from the Westermost part, and vpon the very corner thereof lie two greene places, as it were closes, and to the Westwards of the Cape the land parted from the Cape, as it were a Bay, whereby it may well be knowen. Foure leagues more beyonde that there lieth a head-land in the sea, and about two leagues beyond the head-land there goeth in a great Bay, as it were a riuer, before which place we ankered all that night, which wee did, least in the night wee should overrunne a riuer, where the * last yere they had all their Elephants reeth.

* That was the yere 1554.

This Cape Das palmas lieth vnder foure degrees and a halfe, and betwixt the said Cape, and the riuer de Sestos is the greatest store of Graines to be had, and being past the said Cape, there is no great store else where.

Where we ankered this night, we found that the tide, which before ran alwayes to the Westward,

The riuers running East-

ward, from this Cape runneth all to the Eastward: this day we ranne some 16 leagues.

The 24. day running our course, about eight of the clock there came forth to vs certaine boats, which brought with them small egges, which were soft without shels, and they made vs signes, that there was within the land fresh water, and Goates: and the Master thinking that it was the riuer which we sought, cast anchor and sent the boate on shoare, with one that knew the riuer, and comming neere the shoare, hee perceiued that it was not the riuer, and so came backe againe, and went along the shoare, with their oares and saile, and wee wayed and ranne along the shoare also: and being thirteene leagues beyond the Cape, the Master perceiued a place which he iudged to be the riuer, when wee were in deede two miles short past it: yet the boate came from the shoare, and they that were in her saide, that there was no riuer: notwithstanding wee came to an anchor, and the Master and I tooke five men with vs in the boat, and when hee came neere the shoare, hee perceiued that it was the same riuer which hee did seeke: so we rowed in, and found the entrance very ill, by reason that the sea goeth so high: and being entred, diuers boates came to vs, and shewed vs that they had Elephants teeth, and they brought vs one of about eight pound, & a little one of a pound, which we bought: then they brought certaine teeth to the riuer side, making signes, that if the next day we would come againe, they would sell vs them: so we gaue vnto two Captaines, to either of them a manillio, and so we departed, and came aboard, and sent out the other boate to another place, where certaine boates that came into the sea, made vs signes that there was fresh water: and being come thither, they found a towne, but no riuer, yet the people brought them fresh water, and shewed them an Elephants tooth, making signes that the next day they would sell them teeth, and so they came aboard.

A Towne.

This riuer lieth by the Carde thirteene leagues from the Cape Das palmas, and there lieth to the Westwards of the same a rocke about a league in the sea, and the riuer it selfe hath a point of lande comming out into the Sea, whereupon growe fine trees, which may well bee discerned two or three leagues off, comming from the Westward, but the riuer cannot bee perceiued vntill such time as a man be hard by it, and then a man may perceiue a little Towne on each side the riuer, and to each Towne there belongeth a Captaine. The riuer is but small, but the water is good and fresh.

Two miles beyond the riuer, where the other towne is, there lieth another point into the Sea, which is greene like a clofe, and not aboue sixe trees vpon it, which growe one of them from the other, whereby the coast may well be knowne: for along all the coast that we haue hitherto sailed by, I haue not seene so much bare land.

trees.

In this place, and three or foure leagues to the Westward of it, al along the shoare, there growe many Palme trees, wherof they make their wine de Palma. These trees may easily be knowen almost two leagues off, for they be very high and white bodied, and streight, and be biggest in the midst: they haue no boughes, but onely a round bush in the top of them: and at the top of the same trees they boare a hole, and there they hang a bottell, and the iuyce of the tree runneth out of the said hole into the bottle, and that is their wine.

Cape Tres
puntas.

From the Cape das Palmas, to the Cape Tres puntas, there are 100. leagues: and to the port where we purpose to make sales of our cloch beyond the Cape Tres puntas 40. leagues.

Note, that betwixt the riuer De Sektos, and the Cape Das palmas, is the place where all the graines be gathered.

The language of the people of this place, as far as I could perceiue, differeth not much from the language of those which dwell where we watred before: but the people of this place be more gentle in nature then the other, and goodlier men: their building & apparel is all one with the others.

Their desire in this place was most of all to haue Manillios and Margarices: as for the rest of our things, they did little esteeme them.

Their manner of swearing by the water of the Sea.

About nine of the clocke there came boates to vs forth, from both of the places aforesaid, and brought with them certaine teeth, and after they had caused me to sweare by the water of the Sea that I would not hurt them, they came aboard our ship three or foure of them, and we gaue them to eate of all such things as we had, and they did eate and drinke of all things, as well as we our selues. Afterwards we bought all their teeth, which were in number 14. and of those 14. there were 10. small: afterwards they departed, making vs signes that the next day we should come to their Townes.

Two townes.

The 26. day because we would not trespasse long at this place I required the Master to goe vnto one of the townes, and to take two of our marchants with him, & I my selfe went to the other, and tooke one with me, because these two townes stand three miles asunder. To these places we caried somewhat of euery kinde of marchandise that we had: and hee had at the one Towne, nine teeth, which were but small, and at the other towne where I was, I had eleuen, which were also not bigge, and we left aboard with the Master certaine Manillos, where with he bought 12. teeth aboard the ship, in our absence: and having bought these of them, we perceived that they had no more teeth: so in that place where I was one brought to me a small goat, which I bought, and so the Master at the other place they brought five small hennes, which he bought also, and after that we saw there was nothing else to be had, we departed, and by one of the clocke we met aboard, and then wayed, and went East our course 18. leagues still within sight of land.

The 28. the wind varied, and we ranne into the sea, and the winde comming againe off the sea, we fell with the land againe, and the first of the land which we raised shewed as a great red cliffe round, but not very high, and to the Eastward of that another smaller red cliffe, and right about that into the land a round hummocke and greene, which we tooke to be trees. We ranne in these 24. houres, not above foure leagues.

The 29. day comming neere to the shoare, we perceived the red cliffe aforesaide to have right vpon the top of it a great heape of trees, and all to the Westwards of it full of red cliffes as farre as we could see, and all along the shoare, as well vpon the cliffes, as otherwise, full of wood: within a mile of the said great cliffe there is a river to the Eastwards, and no cliffes that we could see, except one small cliffe, which is hard by it. We ran this day and night 12. leagues.

The windes that wee had in this place by the reports of the people and of those that have bene there, have not bene vsual, but in the night, at North off the lande, and in the day South off the sea, and most commonly North-west, and South-west.

The 31. day we went our course by the shoare Northwards: this land is all along a low shoare, and full of wood, as all the coast is for the most part, and no rockes. This morning came out many boates which went a fishing, which bee greater boates then those which we sawe before, so that in some of them there sate 5. men, but the fashion of the boates is all one. In the afternoone about three of the clocke we had sight of a Towne by the sea side, which our Pilots iudged to be 25. leagues to the Westwards of the Cape Tres puntas.

The third of January in the morning we fell with the Cape Tres puntas, and in the night passed, as our Pilots saide, by one of the Portugals castles, which is 8. leagues to the Westwards of the Cape: vpon the first sight of the Cape we discerned it a very high land, and all growen over with trees, and comming neere to it, we perceived two head lands, as it were two Bayes betwixt them, which opened right to the Westward, and the uttermost of them is the Easterne Cape, there we perceived the middle Cape, and the Eastermost Cape: the middle Cape standeth not above a league from the West Cape, although the Card sheweth them to be 3. leagues one from the other: and that middle Cape hath right before the point of it a small rocke so neere to it, that it cannot be discerned from the Cape, except a man be neere to the shoare, and vpon the same Cape standeth a great heape of trees, and when a man is thwar the same Cape to the Eastward, there lieth hard by it a round greene hummocke, which commeth out of the maine.

puntas.

The thirde Cape is about a league beyond the middle Cape, and is a high land like to the other Capes, and betwixt the middle, and the thirde commeth out a little head or point of a land out of the maine, and diuers rocks hard aboard the shoare.

Before we came to the Capes, being about 8. leagues off therein, we had the land South-east, and by East, and being past the Capes, the land runneth in againe East North-east.

About two leagues beyond the farthest Cape there is a lowe glade about two miles long, and then the land riseth high againe, and diuers head-lands rise one beyond another, and diuers rockes lie at the point of the first head-land. The middelt of these Capes is the nearest to the Southwards, I mean, further into the sea then any of the other, so that being to the Eastward of it, it may be discerned farre off, and being so to the Eastward it riseth with two small rockes.

This day we ankered for feare of ouer shooting a towne called S. Iohns. Wee ran this day not above 8. leagues. In the afternoone this day there came a boate of the countrey from the shoare, with five men in her, and went along by vs, as we thought, to discerne our flagges, but they would not come neere vs, and when they had well looked vpon vs, they departed.

The fourth day in the morning, sailing by the coast, we espied a ledge of rockes by the shoare, and to the Westwards of them two great greene hills ioyning together, so that betweene them it was hollow like a saddle: and within the said rockes the Master thought the aforesaid Towne had stooke, and therefore we manned our boates, and tooke with vs cloth, and other marchandize, and rowed ashore, but going along by the coast, we sawe that there was no towne, therefore wee went aboard againe.

From these two hills aforesaid, about two leagues to the Eastward, lie out into the Sea almost two miles a ledge of rockes, and beyond that a great Bay, which runneth into the North North-westward, and the land in this place lieth North North-east along the shoare: but the uttermost point of land in that place that we could see, lay North-east, and by East from vs.

After that we were with a small gale of winde runne past that uttermost head-land, we sawe a great red cliffe, which the Master againe iudged to be the towne of S. Iohns, and then wee tooke our boate with marchandize, and went thither, and when we came thither, we perceiued that there was a towne vpon the topp of the hill, and so wee went toward it, and when we were hard by it, the people of the towne came together a great sort of them, and waied vs to come in, with a peece of cloth, and so we went into a very faire Bay, which lieth to the Eastward of the cliffe, whereupon the towne standeth, and being within the cliffe, wee let fall our grapnell, and after that we had taried there a good space, they sent a boate aboord of vs, to shewe vs that they had golde, and they shewed vs a peece about halfe a crowne weight, and required to know our measure, & our weight, that they might shewe their Captaine thereof: and wee gaue them a measure of two elles, and a waight of two Angels to shew vnto him, which they tooke, and went on shoare, and shewed it vnto their Captaine, and then they brought vs a measure of two elles, one quarter and a halfe, and one Crusado-weight of gold, making vs signes that so much they would giue for the like measure, and lesse they would not haue. After this, we taried there about an houre, and when we sawe that they would doe no otherwise, and withall vnderstood, that all the best places were before vs, wee departed to our shippes and wayed, and ranne along the shoare, and went before with our boate, and hauing sailed about a league, we came to a point where there lay sooth a ledge of rocks, like to the others before spoken of, and being past that people, the Master spied a place which hee saide plainly was the towne of Don Iohn: and the night was come vpon vs, so that we could not well discern it, but we ankered as neere vnto the place as we could.

The towne of Don Iohn.

The first day in the morning we perceiued it to be the same towne in deede, and we manned our boates and went thither, and because that the last yere the Portugals at that place tooke away a man from them, and after shot at them with great bales, and did beate them from the place, we let fall our grapnell almost a bale shot off the shoare, and there we lay about two houres, and no boates came to vs. Then certaine of our men with the Hindes boate went into the Bay which lieth to the Eastward of the towne, and within that Bay they found a goodly fresh riuer, and afterwards they came and waied to vs also to come in, because they perceiued the Negroes to come downe to that place, which we did: and immediatly the Negroes came to vs, and made vs signes that they had golde, but none of them would come aboord our boates, neither could wee perceiue any boates that they had to come withall, so that we iudged that the Portugals had spoiled their boates, because we saw halfe of their towne destroyed.

Wee hauing stayed there a good space, and seeing that they would not come to vs, thrust our boates heads a shoare, being both well appointed, and then the Captaine of the Towne came downe, being a graue man: and he came with his dart in his hand, and fire tall men after him, euery one with his dart & his target, and their darts were all of yron, faire and sharpe, and there came another after them which caried the Captaines stoole: wee saluted him, and put off our caps, and bowed our selues, and hee like one that thought well of himselfe, did not moue his cap, nor scant bowed his body, and sate him downe very solemnly vpon his stoole: but all his men put off their caps to vs, and bowed downe themselves.

He was clothed from the loines downe with a cloth of that Countrey making, wrapped about him, and made fast about his loynes with a girde, and his cap of a certaine cloth of the Countrey also, and bare legged, and bare footed, and all bare about the loynes, except his head.

His seruants, some of them had cloth about their loines, and some nothing but a cloth betwixt their legges, and made fast before, and behinde to their girdles, and cappes of their owne making, some like a basket, and some like a great wide purse of beastes skinner.

All their cloth, corbes, girdles, fishing lines, and all such like things which they haue, they make of the bark of certaine trees, and thereof they can worke things very prettily, and yron worke they can make very fine, of all such things as they doe occupy, as darts, fishhookes, hooking yrons, yron heads, and great daggers, some of them as long as a woodknife, which be on both sides exceeding sharpe, and bended after the maner of Turkie blades, and the most part of them haue hanging at their left side one of those great daggers.

Their weapons.

Their targets be made of such pills as their cloth is made of, and very closely wrought, and they be in forme foure square, and very great, and somewhat longer then they be broad, so that kneeling downe, they make their targets to couer their whole body. Their bowes be short, and of a pretie strength, as much as a man is able to draw with one of his fingers, and the string is of the bark of a tree, made flat, and about a quarter of an inch broad: as for their arrowes, I haue not as yet seene any of them, for they had wrapped them vp close, and because I was busie I could not stand about it, to haue them open them. Their golde also they worke very well.

When

When the Captaine was set, I sent him two elles of cloth, and two basons, and gave them unto him, and hee sent againe for a waight of the same measure, and I sent him a waight of two Angels, which he would not take, neither would hee suffer the towne to buy any thing, but the basons of bzaile: so that wee solde that day 74. basons unto the men of the towne, for about halfe an Angel weight, one with another, and nine white basons, which we solde for a quarter of an Angell a peece, or thereabouts.

We shewed them all our other things which we had, but they did not esteeme them.

About two of the clocke, the Captaine who did depart in the morning from vs, came againe, and brought with him to present mee withall, a henne, and two great rootes, which I received, and after made mesignes that the countrey would come to his towne that night, and bring great stoze of gold, which in deed about 4. of the clocke they did: for there came about 100. men under 3. Captaines, well appointed with their darts and bowes, and when they came to vs, every man stucke downe his dart vpon the shoare, and the Captaines had stooles brought them, and they sat downe, and sent a young man aboord of vs, which brought a measure with him of an ell, and one fourth part, and one sixteenth part, and he would haue that foure times for a waight of one Angell and twelue graines: I offered him two elles, as I had done befoze for two Angels weight, which he esteemed nothing, but still stucke at his foure measures aforesaid: yet in the ende, when it grew very late, and I made him signes that I would depart, he came to foure elles for the waight aforesaid, and otherwise he would not deale, and so we departed. This day we tooke for basons five ounces and a halfe and one eight part.

The first day in the morning we manned our boates and the skiffe well, for feare of the Portugals which the last yeece had taken away a man from the other ships, and went on shoare, and landed, because they had no boates to come to vs, and so the young man which was with vs the night befoze was sent aboord, who seemed to haue dealt and bargained befoze with the Portugals for he could speake a litle Portuguese, and was perfect in weights and measures: at his coming he offered vs, as he had done befoze, one Angell, and twelue graines for foure elles, and more he would not giue, and made signes, that if we would not take that, we should depart, which we did: but befoze we did indeede depart, I offered him of some rotten cloth thre elles for his waight of an Angell and twelue graines, which he would not take, and then we departed making signes to him that we would go away, as indeede we would haue done, rather then haue giuen that measure, although the cloth was ill, seeing we were so neere to the places, which we iudged to be better for sale. Then we went aboord our ships, which lay about a league off, and came backe againe to the shoare for sand and balaste: and then the Captaine perceiving that the boats had brought no marchandise but came onely for water and sand, and seeing that we would depart, came unto them, making signes againe to know whether we would not giue the foure elles, and they made signes againe, that we would giue them but thre, and when they sawe that the boats were ready to depart, they came unto them and gaue them the weight of our Angell and twelue graines, which we required befoze and made signes, that if we would come againe, they would take thre elles. So when the boats came aboord, we layde wares in them both, and for the speedier dispatch I and Iohn Sauill went in one boat, and the Master Iohn Makeworth, and Richard Curligin, in the other, and went on shoare, and that night I tooke for my part fiftie and two ounces, and in the other boate they tooke eight ounces and a quarter, all by one weight and measure, and so being very late, we departed and went aboord, and tooke in all this day thre pound.

The seuenth day we went a shoare againe, and that day I tooke in our boate thre pound 19 ounces, so that we dispatched almost all the cloth that we caried with vs befoze noone, and then many of the people were departed & those that remained had litle golde, yet they made vs signes to fetch them some latten basons, which I would not because I purposed not to trifle out my time, but goe thence with speede to Don Iohns towne. But Iohn Sauill and Iohn Makeworth were desirous to goe againe: and I, loth to hinder them of any profite, consented, but went not my self: so they tooke eightene ounces of gold and came away, seeing that the people at a certaine crie made, were departed.

While they were at the shoare, there came a young fellow which could speake a litle Portuguese, with thre more with him, and to him I solde 39 basons and two small white sawcers, for thre ounces, &c. which was the best reckoning that we did make of any basons: and in the forenoone when I was at the shoare, the Master solde five basons unto the same fellow, for halfe an ounce of golde.

This fellow, as farre as we could perceiue, had bene taken into the Castle by the Portugales, and was gotten away from them, for he tolde vs that the Portugales were bad men, and that they made them slauers if they could take them, and would put yrons upon their legges, and besides he told vs, that as many Frenchmen or Englishmen, as they could take (for he could name these two very well) they would hang them: he told vs further, that there were 60 men in the castle, and that every yeere there came thither two shippes, one great, and one small caruell, and further, that Don Iohn had warres with the Portugals, which gaue mee the better courage to goe to his towne, which lieth but foure leagues from the Castle, wherehense our men were beaten the last yeere.

This fellowe came aboard our shippe without feare, and as soone as he came, he demanded, why we had not brought againe their men, which the last yeere we tooke away, and could tell vs that there were five taken away by Englishmen: we made him answere, that they were in England well vsed, and were there kept till they could speake the language, and then they should be brought againe to be a helpe to Englishmen in this Countrey: and then he spake no more of that matter.

Our boates being come aboard, we wayed and set sayle and a litle after spied a great fire vpon the shoare, and by the light of the fire we might discerne a white thing, which they tooke to be the Castle, and for feare of ouerhosting the towne of Don Iohn we there ankered two leagues off the shoare, for it is hard to fetch vp a towne here, if a ship ouerhoot it. This day we tooke seven pound, and five ounces of golde.

This towne lieth in a great Bay, which is very deepe.

The people in this place desired most to haue basons and cloth. They would buy some of them also many crisles, as knives, hozsetailes, hoznes: and some of our men going a shoare, sold a cap, a dagger, a hat, &c.

They shewed vs a certain course cloth, which I thinke to be made in France, for it was course wooll, and a small threed, and as thicke as worsted, and striped with stripes of greene, white, yellow &c. Diuers of the people did weare about their neckes great beades of glasse of diuerse colours. Here also I learned some of their language, as followeth:

Sight of the castie of Mina.

The eight day in the morning we had sight of the Castle, but by reason of a miste that then fell we could not haue the perfect sight of it, till we were almost at the towne of Don Iohn, and then it cleared vp, and we saw it and a white house, as it were a Chappell, vpon the hill about it: then we halled into the shoare, within two English miles of Don Iohns towne, and there ankered in seven sadome water. Here, as in many other places before, we perceiued that the currant went with the winde.

The land here is in some places low and in some high, and full of wood altogether.

Don Iohns
towne described.

The towne of Don Iohn is but litle, of about twentie houses, and the most part of the towne is walled in with a wall of a mans height, made with reede or sedge, or some such thing. Here we staied two or three houres after we had ankered, to see if any man would come vnto vs: and seeing that none did come, we manned our boates and put in marchandize, and went and ankered with our boates neere to the shoare: then they sent out a man to vs who made vs signes that that was the towne of Don Iohn, and that he himselfe was in the Countrey, and would be at home at the going downe of the Sunne, and when he had done, he required a reward, as the most part of them will doe which come first aboard, and I gaue him one ell of cloth and he departed, and that night we heard no more of him.

The ninth day in the morning we went againe with our boates to the shoare, and there came forth a boate to vs, who made signes that Don Iohn was not come home, but would be at home this day: and to that place also came another boate from the other towne a mile from this, which is called Don Deuis, and brought with him gold to shew vs, making signes that we should come thither. I then left in this place Iohn Sauill, and Iohn Makeworth, and tooke the Hinde, and went to the other towne and there ankered, and tooke cloth and went to shope with the boate, and by and by the boates came to vs and brought a measure of foure pards long & a halfe, and shewed vs a weight of an angell and twelue graines, which they would giue for so much, and not otherwise: so I staied and made no bargain. And all this day the barke lay at Don Iohns towne, and did nothing, hauing answered that he was not come home.

The tenth day we went againe to the shoare, and there came out a boat with good store of gold, and hauing giuen the matter off a long time, and hauing brought the meature to a naple lesse then three elles, and their weight to an angell and twentie graines, and could not bring them to more, I did conclude with them and solde, and within one quarter of an houre I tooke one pound and a quarter of an ounce of golde: and then they made me signes to tary, till they had parted their cloth vpon the shoare as their manner is, and they would come againe, and so they went away, and layde the cloth all abroad vpon the sande peece by peece, and by and by one came running downe from the towne to them, and spake vnto them, and soothwith euery man made as much haste as he could away, and went into the woods to hide his golde and his cloth: we mistrusted some knauery, and being waied by them to come a shoare, yet we would not, but went aboord the Hinde, and perceiued vpon the hill 30 men which we iudged to be Portugals: and they went vnto the toppe of the hill and there mustered and shewed themselves, hauing a flagge with them. Then I being desirous to knowe what the Hart did, tooke the Hindes boate and went towards her, and when I came neere to them they shot off two pices of ordnance which I marueiled at: I made as much haste as I could to her, and met her boate and kisse comming from the shoare in all haste, and we met aboord together. They shewed me that they had beene a shoare all that day, and had giuen to the two sonnes of Don Iohn, to either of them three paces and a halfe of cloth, and three basons betwixt them, and had deliuered him 3 yards of cloth more and the weight of an angell and 12 graines, and being on land did tarie for his answer, and in the meane time the Portugals came running from the hill vpon them, wherof the Negroes a litle before had giuen them warning, and had them to go away but they perceiued it not. The sonne of Don Iohn conspired with the Portugales against them, so that they were almost vpon them, but yet they recouered their boate and set off from the shoare, and the Portugales shot their calicuers at them, but hurt no man, and then the ship perceiuing it, shot off the two peeces aforesayde among them. Whereupon we layde bales in both the boates, and in the Skiffe and manned them well, and went a shoare againe, but because of the winde we could not land, but lay off in the sea about ten scope and shot at them, but the hill succoured them, and they from the rockes and from the hilles shotte at vs with their halfe hakes, and the Negroes more for feare then for loue stood by them to helpe them, and when we saw that the Negroes were in such subiection vnto them that they durst not sell vs any thing for feare of them we went aboord, and that night the winde kept at the East, so that we could not with our ship fetch the Hinde, but I tooke the boate in the night and went aboord the barke to see what was there to be done, and in the morning we perceiued the towne to be in like case layde with Portugales, so we wayed and went along the coast. This towne of Iohn de Viso standeth vpon an hill like the towne of Don Iohn, but it hath bene burned, so that there are not passing fixe houses in it: the most part of the golde that comes thither comes out of the countrey, and no doubt if the people durst for feare of the Portugals bring forth their gold, there would be had good store: but they dare not sell any thing, their subiection is so great to the Portugales. The 11 day running by the shoare we had sight of a litle towne foure leagues from the last towne that we came from, and about halfe a league from that, of another towne vpon a hill, and halfe a league from that also of another great towne vpon the shoare: whither we went to see what could there be done: if we could doe nothing, then to returne to the other towne, because we thought that the Portugales would leaue the towne vpon our departure. Along from the castle vnto this place are very high hilles which may be scene about all other hilles, but they are full of wood, and great red clifles by the sea side. The boates of these places are somewhat large and bigge, for one of them will carrie twelue men, but their forme is alike with the former boates of the coast. There are about these townes few riuers: their language differeth not from the language vsed at Don Iohns towne: but euery one can speake three or foure wordes of Portuguese, which they vsed altogether to vs.

The Portugales of the castle of Mina intruded our men.

The towne of Don Iohn de Viso.

We sawe this night about 5 of the clocke 22 boates running along the shoare to the Westward, whereupon we suspected some knauery intended against vs. The 12 day therefore we set sayle and went further along the coast, and descried more townes wherein were greater houses then in the other townes, and the people came out of the townes to looke vpon vs, but we could see no boates. Two mile beyond the Eastermost towne are blacke rockes, which blacke rockes continue to the vitermost cape of the land, which is about a league off, and then the land runnes in Eastnortheast, and a sandy shoare againe: vpon these blacke rockes came downe certaine Negroes, which waied vs with a white flagge, but we perceiuing the principall place to be neere, would not stay, but bare still along the shoare: and as soone as we had opened the point of the land, we rayled another head-land about a league off the point, which had a rocke lying off it into into the sea, and that they thought to be the place which we sought. When we came thwart the place they knew it, and we put wares into our boate, and the ship being within halfe a mile of the place anchored in fine sadome water and faire ground. We went on shoare with our boate, and ankered about ten of the clocke in the forenoone: we saw many boates lying upon the shoare, and diners came by vs, but none of them would come neere vs, being as we iudged afraid of vs: because that four men were taken perforce the last yeere from this place, so that no man came to vs, whereupon we went aboord againe, and thought here to haue made no sale: yet towrdes night a great fozt came downe to the water side, and wauid vs on shoare with a white flagge, and afterwarde their Captaine came downe and many men with him, and sate him downe by the shoze under a tree: which when I perceiued, I tooke things with me to giue him: at last he sent a boat to call to vs, which would not come neere vs, but made vs signes to come againe the next day: but in fine, I got them to come aboord in offering them things to giue to their captaine, which were two elles of cloth, one latten bason, one white bason, a bottle, a great piece of beefe, and fire bisket cakes, which they receiued making vs signes to come againe the next day, saying, that their Captaine was Grand Capirane as appeared by those that attended upon him with their darts and targets, and other weapons.

This towne is very great and stands upon a hill among trees, so that it cannot well be seene except a man be neere it: to the Eastward of it upon the hill hard by the towne stand 2. high trees, which is a good marke to knowe the towne. And under the towne lieth another hill lower then it, whercupon the sea beates: and that end next the sea is all great blacke rockes, and beyonde the towne in a bay lieth another small towne.

The like they doe in the countrey of Prete Ianni.

The 13 day in the morning we tooke our boate and went to shoare, and stayed till ten a clocke and no man came to vs: we went about therefore to returne aboord; and when the Negroes saw that, they came running downe with a flagge to waue vs againe, so we ankered againe, and then one shewed vs that the Captaine would come downe by and by: we saw a saile in the meane time passe by vs but it was small, and we regarded it not. Being on shoze wee made a tilt with our oares and sayle, and then there came a boate to vs with five men in her, who brought vs againe our bottle, and brought me a hen, making signes by the sunne, that within two houres the marchants of the countrey would come downe and buy all that we had: so I gaue them five Manihos to carry to their Captaine, and they made signes to haue a pledge of vs, and they would leaue vs another man: and we willing to doe so, put one of our men in their boate, but they would not giue vs one of theirs, so we tooke our man againe, and there tarried for the marchants: and shortly after one came downe arrayed like their Captaine with a great traine after him, who saluted vs friendly, and one of the chiefe of them went and sate downe under a tree, where the last yeere the Captaine was wont to sit: and at last we perceiued a great many of them to stand at the ende of a hollow way, and behinde them the Portugales had planted a bafe, who suddenly shotte at vs but ouerhot vs, and yet we were in a manner hard by them, and they shot at vs againe before we could ship our oares to get away but did no hurt. Then the Negroes came to the rocks hard by vs, and discharged calieuers at vs, and againe the Portugales shot off their bafe twice moze, and then our ship shot at them; but the rockes and hilles defended them.

Master Robert Gainshes boys age to Guinea in Anno 1554.

The English were offered to build a towne in Guine.

Then we went aboord to goe from this place, seeing the Negroes bent against vs, because that the last yeere M. Gainsh did take away the Captaines sonne and thre other from this place with their golde, and all that they had about them: which was the cause that they became friends with the Portugales, whom before they hated, as did appeare the last yeere by the courteous intertainement which the Trinitie had there, when the Captaine came aboord the shippe, and brought them to his towne, and offered them ground to build a Castle in, and there they had good sales.

The 14 day we wayed and plyed backe againe to seeke the Hinde, which in the morning we met, and so we turned both backe to the Eastwardes to see what we could doe at that place where the Trinitie did sell her eight frises the last yeere. The Hinde had taken eightene ounces and a halfe moze of golde of other Negroes, the day after that we left them. This day about one of the clocke we espied certaine boates upon the sand and men by them and went to them with marchandizes, and tooke thre ounces of gold for 18 fuffes of cloth, euery fuffe thre yards and a halfe after one angell and 12 graines the fuffe, and then they made me signes that the next day I should haue golde enough: so the Master tooke the Hinde with Iohn Sauill and Iohn Makeworth, and went to seeke the place aforesaid, & I with Richard Pakeman remained in this place to see what we could do the next day: and when the Negroes perceiued our ship to go away, they feared that the other would follow, & so sent forth 2 boats to vs with 4 men in them, requiring vs to tary & to giue them one man for a pledge, and 2 of them should tary with vs for him, so Edward M. Morleis seruant seruant seeing these men so earnest therein offered himselfe to be pledge, and we let him goe for two of them, one whereof had his waights and scales, and a chaine of golde about his necke, and another about his arme. They did rate of such things as we had and were well contented. In the night the Negroes kept a light vpon the shoare thwart of vs, and about one of the clocke we heard and saw the light of a bafe which shot off twise at the said light, and by and by discharged two calicuers, which in the end we perceived to be the Portugals bigandine which followed vs from place to place, to giue warning to the people of the countrey, that they should not deale with vs.

Bigandine.

The 15 day in the morning the Captaine came downe with 100 men with him, and brought his wife, and many others brought their wiues also, because their towne was 8 miles vp in the countrey, and they determined to lie by the sea side till they had bought what they would. When he was come he sent our man aboard, and required to haue two men pledges, and he himselfe would come aboard, and I sent him two, of whom he tooke but one, and so came aboard vs, he and his wife with diuers of his friends, and brought me a goate and two great rootes, and I gaue him againe a latten bason, a white bason, 6 manillios, and a bottell of Palmestie, and to his wife a small casket. After this we began to make our measure and weight: and he had a weight of his owne which held one angell and 14 graines, and required a measure of 4 elles and a halfe. In fine we concluded the 8 part for one angell and 20 graines, and before we had done, they tooke their owne weight and measure.

The 16 day I tooke 8 li. 1 ounce of golde: and since the departure of the Hinde I heard not of her, but when our pledge went into the countrey the first night, he said he saw her cast anker aboue fine leagues from this place. The 17 day I sold about 17 pieces of cloth, & tooke 4. li. 4 ounces and a halfe of golde. The 18 day the captaine desired to haue some of our wine, and offered halfe a ducket of golde for a bottell: but I gaue it him freely, and made him and his traine drinke besides. And this day also I tooke 5 li. 5 ounces of golde. The 19 day we sold about 18 clothes, and tooke 4 li. 4. ounces and one quarter of golde.

The 20 day we tooke 3 li. six ounces and a quarter of golde. The 21 we tooke 8. li. 7. ounces and a quarter. The 22, 3. li. 8. ounces and a quarter. And this night about 4 of the clocke the Captaine who had layen all this while vpon the shoare, went away with all the rest of the people with him.

The 23 day we were waied a shoare by other Negroes, and sold them cloth, caskets, knives, and a dosen of bels, and tooke 1. li. 10. ounces of golde. The 24 likewise we sold bels, shceres, and chimbles, and tooke two li. one ounce and a quarter of golde. The 25 day we sold 7 dosen of smal bels and other things, and then perceiuing their gold to be done, we wayed and set sayle & went to leeward to seeke the Hinde, and about 5 of the clocke at night we had sight of her, and bare with her, and vnderstood that shee had made some sales. The 26 day wee receiued out of the Hinde 48 li. 3 ounces and one eight part of golde, which they had taken in the time that we were from them. And this day vpon the request of a Negro that came vnto vs from a captaine, we went to shoare with our marchandize, and tooke 7 li. and one ounce of golde. At this place they required no gages of vs, but at night they sent a man aboard vs, which lay with vs all night, because we might knowe that they would also come to vs the next day. The 27 day in both our shippes we tooke 8. li. one ounce, three quarters and halfe a quarter of golde. The 28 we made sales for the companie, and tooke one pound and halfe an ounce of golde. The 29 day in the morning we heard two calicuers shot off vpon the shoare, which we iudged to be either by the Portugales or by the Negroes of the Portugales: we manned our boates and armed our selues and went to shoare, but could finde nothing: for they were gone. The 30 day we made moze sales for the companie and for the Masters.

The 31 we sent our boate to shoare to take in sand for ballast, and there our men met the Negroes, with whom they had made sale the day before a fishing which did helpe them to fill sand, and hauing no gold, sold fish to our men for their handkerchiefes and nightkerchiefes.

The 1 day of February we wayed and went to another place, and tooke 1. li. 9. ounces 3 quarters of gold. The 2 day we made moze sales: but hauing viewed our victuals, we determined to carie no long time vpon the coast, because the most part of our drinke was spent, & that which remained grew sowze. The 3 and 4 dayes we made some sales, though not great, and finding the wind this 4. day to come off the shoare, we set saile and ranne along the shoare to the Westwards: vpon this coast we found by experience that ordinarily about 2 of the clocke in the night the winde comes off the shoare at Northnortheast, and so continueth vntill eight of the clocke in the morning: and all the rest of the day and night it comes out of the Southwest: and as for the tide or currant vpon this shoare, it goeth continually with the winde. The 5 day we continued sayling and thought to haue met with some English ships, but found none.

February.

They returne for England.

The first day we went our course South-west to fetch under the line, and ranne by estimation 24 leagues.

The 13 day wee thought our selues by our reckoning to be cleare off the Cape das Palmas, and ranne 12 leagues.

Cape de Monte. The 22 day we were thwart of the Cape de Monte, which is to the Westward of the Riuer de Sestos, about 30 leagues.

March. The first day of March in a Tornado we lost the Hinde, whereupon we set by a light and shot off a piere but could not heare of her, so that then we strooke our saile and taried for her, and in the morning had sight of her againe three leagues a sterne off vs.

Cape Verde in latitude 14 degrees & a halfe. Upon the 22 day we found our selues to be in the height of Cape Verde, which stands in 14. degrees and a halfe.

From this day till the 29 day we continued our course, and then we found our selues to be in 22 degrees. This day one of our men called Wilham King, who had bene long sicke, died in his sleepe. his apparell was distributed to those that lackt it, and his money was kept for his friends to be deliuered them at his coming home.

The 30 day we found our selues to be vnder the Tropike.

The 31 day we went our course, and made way 18 leagues.

April. From the first day of Aprill to the 20 we went our course, and then found our selues to bee in the height of the Afores.

May. The seuenth day of May we fell with the South part of Ireland, and going on shoare with our boate had fresh drinke, and two sheepe of the countrey people, which were wilde Kernes, and we gaue them golde for them, and bought further such other vittuals as we had neede of, and thought would serue vs till we arriued in England.

Their arriual at Bristol. The 14 day with the afternoone tide we went into the Port of Bristol called Hungrode, and there ankered in safetie and gaue thanks to God for our safe arriual.

The second voyage made by Maister William Tomrson to the coast of Guinea, and the Castle of Mina, in the yeere 1556. with the Tiger of London, a ship of 120 tunnes, the Hart of London of 60 tunnes, and a Pinnesse of fixteene tunnes.

The fourteenth day of September, the yeere abouesayd, we departed from Harwich, and directed our course for the Isle of Sillie, to meeete there with the Hart and Pinnesse, which were rigged and victualled at Bristol, but arriuing there the eight and twentieth day we found them not, and therefore after long lying at hull to tarrie for them, but not espying them, we turned backe to Plimmouth the 12 day of October, and being there, the Hart and the Pinnesse came to vs, so that the 15 of November we all departed together from Plimmouth at one of the clocke in the after noone, and the 28 day we had sight of the Isle of Porto Santo, and the next day in the morning of Madera.

November.

December.

Sierra Leona.

The third day of December we fell with the Ile of Palma, and the 9 we were thwart of Cape Blanke, and found there certaine Carauels fishing for Pargoes.

The 19 we found our selues in the height of Sierra Leona, and all this day we ranne thwart of certaine Curranes, which did set to the West South-westward so fast as if it had bene the ouerfall of a sand, making a great noyle like vnto a streame or tide-gate when the water is shoale: and to pzooue whither we could finde ground in this place, we sounded and had 150 fadome, and no ground, and so departed.

The 30 of December we fell with the coast of Guinea, and had first sight of it about 4 leagues off. The best marke that we could take of the place to knowe it was three hilles, which lay North-east and by East from vs: betwixt the Northmost two hilles there are two high and great trees standing in sight as it were a sailes breadth one from another, and a litle more to the North-westwards are certaine hommocks. Hauing sayled somewhat into the shoare wee tooke our selues to be thotte somewhat past the riuer de Sestos, so that we kept about to fetch it. And a litle after we had sight of three sayles of shippes and two pinnelles which were in the weather of vs, and hauing sight of them we made our selues readie to meeete them, and halled off our ships to fetch the winde as neere as we could: and hauing sayled about an houre or two, they also went about, and went as we went to make themselves readie, and when we had them in chase, they went away from vs: but when they had made themselves readie, they kept about againe, and came with vs verie finely appointed with their streamers, and pendants and ensignes, and noyle noyse of trumpets very brauely: so when we met, they had the weather of vs, and we being determined to fight, if they had bene Portugals, waned them to come vnder our Lee, which they denied stoutly: then we demaunded of them whence they were, and they sayd of France, we told them againe that we were of London in England. They asked of vs what Portugals wee had seene, we answered, none but fishermen: then they told vs that there were certaine Portugall ships gone to the Mina to defend it, and that they met with another at the riuer de Sestos, which was a ship of two hundred which they had burned, and had saued none but the master and two or three Negros, and certaine others which were soze burned which they left a shoze there. Then they desired to come aboard of vs with their boates to talke with vs, and wee gaue them leave. Then the captaine of the Admirall and diuers others came aboard very friendly, desiring vs to keepe them company because of the Portugals, and to goe to the Mina with them: wee told them that we had not watered, and that we were but now fallen with the coast, and they shewed vs that we were fiftie leagues past the riuer de Sestos: notwithstanding there was water enough to be had, and they would helpe vs to water with their owne boars because they would haue our company. And told vs further, that they had bene five weekes vpon the coast, and had gotten but three tunnes of graines amongst them all: and when wee had heard them, we made our reckoning that although the Mina were cleare, yet if they did goe before vs, they would marre our market; and if it were not cleare, then if the Portugals were there and did take them, they would vnderstand that we were behind, and so would waite for vs. And further we made account that if we went with them we should doe as well as they, if the coast were cleare: if it were not cleare, then by them we were assured to be the stronger. Therefoze hauing considered thus much of their gentle offers, wee told them that the next day wee would conferre more largely of the matter. Whereupon they desired me to come the next day to dinner to them, and to bring the masters of our ships with me, and such marchants as I thought good, promising to giue vs water out of their owne ships if we would take it, or els to tarie with vs and helpe vs to water with their owne boars and pinnalles.

The riuer of Sestos,

Then admit certaine Frenchmen into their company.

The 3rd day in the morning the Admirall sent his boat aboard for me, and I took our masters and certaine of our marchants and went to him, who had prouided a notable banquet for vs, and intreated vs very friendly, desiring vs still to keepe his company, promising that what victuals were in his ships, or other things that might doe vs pleasure vntill the end, we should haue the one halfe of it, offering vs if we would to furle his flags, and to bee at our commandement in all things.

In the ende we agreed to come to an anker, and to send our boat on shoze with the Admiralls boat, and one of his pinnalles, and an Almaine which they had brought out of France, to seeke water; as for our pinnalle she came to an anker to seaward of vs all, and would not come at vs. All this night the boats continued on shoze.

The first day of January our boats came to vs againe and had found no riuer. Whereupon we weighed and set saile, and ankred againe at another riuer.

The 2nd day we went into the riuer and bargained, and tooke 5 small Elephants teeth.

The 3rd day we tooke 5 more.

The fourth day the French Admirall and we tooke fiftene small teeth. This day wee tooke thirtie men with vs and went to seeke Elephants, our men being all well armed with harquebusses, pikes, long bowes, crossebowes, partizans, long swordes, and swordes and bucklers: wee found two Elephants which wee stroke diuers times with harquebusses and long bowes, but they went away from vs and hurt one of our men. The fift day we set saile and ranne along the coast.

An assault vpon elephants.

The 6th day we fell with the riuer de S. Andre, at which place the land is somewhat high to the Westward of the riuer, and a faire Baie also to the Westward of it: but to the Eastward of it it is lowe land.

Rio de S. Andre, Captaine Blundel the French Admirall,

The 7th day we went into the Riuer and found no billage, but certaine wild Negros not accustomed to trade. It is a very great riuer and 7 fadome water in some places at the entring. Where we filled water, and after set saile.

The 8th day we sailed along the shoze and came to the Rebelisses, and went for ward in sailing the 9th day also.

The 10th day we came together to confer with captaine Blundel Admirall of the French ships, Ierom Bauder his viceadmiral, and Iohn de Orleans master of a ship of 70 tunne, and with their marchants, and agreed that when God should send vs to any place where wee might make sale, that we should be of one accord and not one of vs hurt the market of the other, but certaine of our boates to make the price for all the rest, and then one boate to make sale for euery shippe. This night our boats going to the Shore met with certaine Negroes, who said that they had gold, and therefore we here cast anchor.

Allow,

The 11 day all the day we tooke but one halfe angel weight of 4 graines, which we tooke by hand, for the people of this place had no weight: the Negroes called this place Allow.

The 12 day we ran along the coast and found but one towne, but no boates would come out to vs, and therefore we went our course.

The 13 day I tooke my boat and went along the shore, and passed by diuers small townes, and was waied to come on shore at 3 places, but the sea went so high vpon the shore, that it was not possible for vs to land, neither could they come to vs if they had had boats, as I could see none but at one place, where there was one that would haue come vnto vs, but the Land-wath went so fast that it ouerthrew his boat, and one of the men was drowned, which the people lamented, and cried so fast, that we might easily heare them, and they got his body out of the sea, and caried it amongst them to their towne.

Dondon a great towne.

The castle of Mina.
Cape de Tres puntas.

The 14 day we came within Saker-shot of the castle, & straightway they set forth and Almadedo to descry vs, and when they perceiued that we were no Portugals, they ranne within the towne againe: for there is a great towne by the Castle which is called by the Negroes Dondon. Within this there lie two great rockes like Islands, and the castle standeth vpon a point which seemeth almost like an Island. Before we came at this castle, we found the land for five or six leagues to be high land, and about seuen leagues before we came to the castle, lowe land, vntill we came at the castle, and then wee found the land high againe. This castle standeth about five leagues to the East of Cape de Tres puntas. Here I tooke the boate with our Negroes and ranne alongst the shore till I came to the Cape and found two small townes, but no boates at them, neither any traffique to be had. At these places our Negroes did vnderstand them well, and one of them went a Shore at all the places and was well receiued of them. This night we ankred at the Cape de Tres puntas.

Bulle.

The 15 day I tooke our boat and went along the shore, & about 3 leagues beyond the Eastermost part of the Cape we found a faire Bay where we ran in, and found a small towne and certaine boates which belonged to the same towne, but the Negroes in a long time would not come to vs, but at the last by the perswasion of our owne Negroes, one boat came to vs, and with him we sent George our Negro to a Shore, and after he had talked with them, they came aboord our boates without feare, and I gaue to their captaine a bason, and two strings of Pargarets, and they shewed vs about 5 duckats weight of gold, but they required so much for it that wee would not take it, because the Frenchmen and we had agreed to make price of our goods all in one boat, and the price being made then euery man to sell in his owne boat, and no man to giue more the the price which should be set by vs all. This place is called Bulle, and here the Negroes were very glad of our Negroes, and shewed them all the friendship they could, when they had told them that they were the men that were taken away being now againe brought by vs.

The Negroes here shewed vs that a moneth since there were 3 ships that fought together, & the two shippes put the other to flight: and before that at the castle of Mina there were 4 ships of the Portugals which met with one Frenchman, which Frenchman caused them all to flee, which shippe we tooke to be the Roebarge: for the Frenchmen of our company iudged her to be there: about that time with her pinnasse also. And further, that after her went a shippe of twelue scoze named the Shaudet all alone, and after her a ship of fourescoze, and both for the Mina. And there were two others also which they left, one at Cape Verde called the Leurriere of Diepe, and another at the riuer De Sestos, besides these 3 which all this time be in our company, whose names be these:

The Esipoir of Hableness which is the Admirall, whose captaine is Denis Blundell.

The Leurriere of Roan Viceadmirall, whose master is Ierome Bauder.

The other is of Hunfleur whose master is called Iohn de Orleans.

Hantz.

The sixteenth day I went along the shore with two pinnasses of the Frenchmen, and found a Baie and a fresh riuer, and after that went to a towne called Hantz, twelue leagues beyond the Cape. At this towne our Negroes were well knownen, and the men of the towne wept for ioy when they saw them, and demanded of them where Anthonie and Binne had bene: and they told them that they had bene at London in England, and should bee brought home the next voyage. So after this, our Negroes came aboord with other Negroes which brought a weight with them, which was so small that wee could not giue them the halfe of that which they demanded for it.

The Negroes here told vs that there were five Portugall shippes at the Castle and one pinnasse, and that the Portugals did much harme to their Country, and that they liued in feare of them, them, and we told them againe, that we would defend them from the Portugals whereof they were very glad.

The 17 day we went a shoze and the Frenchmen with vs, but did no great good, the Negroes were so unreasonablen, we sold 80 Panellios for one ounce of gold.

Shamma.

Then wee departed and went to Shamma, and went into the riuer with five boates well appointed with men and ordinance, and with our noises of trumpets and drummes, for we thought here to haue found some Portugals but there were none: so wee sent our Negroes on shoze, and after them went diuers of vs, and were very well received, and the people were very glad of our Negroes, specially one of their brothers wiues, and one of their aunts, which receiued them with much ioy, and so did all the rest of the people, as if they had bene their naturall brethren: we comforted the captaine and told him that he should not feare the Portugals, for wee would defend him from them: whereupon we caused our boats to shoote off their hailes and harquebusses, and caused our men to come on shoze with their long bowes, and they shot befoze the captaine, which he, with all the rest of the people, wondered much at, specially to see them shoot so farre as they did, and assaied to draw their bowes but could not. When it grew to be late, we departed to our ships, for we looked euery houre for the Portugals. *And here the Negroes shewed vs that there was an English ship at the Mina, which had brought one of the Negroes againe, which Robert Gaynsh tooke away.

The Negroes brought home by our men.

*Note. Robert Gaynsh.

The 18 day we went into the riuer with no lesse strength then befoze, and concluded with the Negroes to giue them for euery Fuffe two yards and three nailles of Cloth, and to take for it one angel-buckat: so that we took in all 70 Duckats, whereof the Frenchmen had fortie, and wee thirtie.

The nineteenth day wee went a shoze euery man for himselfe, and cooke a good quantitie of gold, and I for my part cooke foure pound and two ounces and a halfe of gold, and our Partes boate cooke one and twentie ounces. At night the Negroes shewed vs that the next day the Portugals would be with vs by land or by Sea: and when wee were ready to depart, we heard diuers harquebusses shoote off in the woods by vs which wee knew to bee Portugals, which durst come no neerer to vs, but shot off in the woods to see if they could feare vs and so make vs to leaue our traffique.

The 20 day we manned our five boates, and also a great boat of the Frenchmens with our men and the Admirals, 12 of them in their murrions and cozzlets, and the rest all well appointed, with foure trumpets, a drumme and a fife, and the boate all hanged with streamers of Silke and pendants very faire, and went into the riuer and traffiqued, our man of warre lying off and on in the riuer to waite vs, but we heard no more of the Portugals. This day the Negroes told vs that there were certain ships come into Hanta, which towne is about 2 leagues to the Westward of this place.

Hanta.

This 21 day we manned our boats againe & went to a place a league from this to the Westwards, and there found many Negroes with another Captaine, and sold at the same rate that wee had done with the others.

The 22 day we went a shoze againe and traffiqued in like sort quietly, and I tooke 4 pound and six ounces of gold.

The 23 day about night the Negroes with their captaine came to vs and told vs that the king of Portugals ships were departed from the Castle, meaning the next day to plie to the windward to come to vs, giuing vs warning to take heed to our selues: we told them againe that we were very glad of their coming, and would be ready at all times to meet them, and to assure them that we were glad of it, wee sounded our trumpets, and shot off certaine hailes whereof the Negroes were very glad, and requested vs that if the Portugals sought to hinder our traffique, to shew them all the extremitie that we could, promising vs that if they came by land, they would aduertise vs thereof.

The 24 we went a shoze with our trumpets and drummes, and traffiqued, and I bade the captaine of the towne to dinner.

The 25 day we being a shoze, our ships had descried fine sailes of the king of Portugals, & our ships shot off ordinance to call vs away, and we thzew euery man his caske a shoze for water, and went to our ships, and by that time we had weighed and giuen order one to another what to do, it was night, so y^t that night nothing was done. We set saile and lay close all night to get the wind if we could: we were nere some of them, and one shot off a piece which wee indged to be the Admirall of the Portugals, to cause the rest to come and speake with him: so all this night we made our selues ready for fight.

fine sailes of Portugals descried.

The 26 we came in with the shoze and had sight of the Portugals where they rid at anker, and we bare with them, and we gaue all our men white scarffes, to the ende that the Frenchmen might know one the other if we came to booyding: but the night came vpon vs that we could not fetch them; but we ankered within demie-Culuering shot of them.

The 27 day we waighted and so did the Portugals, and about eleuen of the clocke wee had the wind of them, and then we went roome with them, which when they perceiued, they kept about to the shoze againe, and wee after them; and when they were so neere the shoze that they could not well runne any further on that booyd, they kept about againe, and lay to the Seaward; and then we kept about with them, and were a head of them; and tooke in our topsailes and caried for them: and the first that came vp was a littall barke which sailed so well that she cared not for any of vs, and caried good ordnance: and as soone as she came vp, she shot at vs, and ouer shot vs, and then she shot at the Admirall of the Frenchmen, and shot him through in two or three places, and went forth a head of vs, because we were in our fighting sailes: then came vp another carauell vnder our Lee in like case which shot at vs and at the Frenchman, and hurt two of his men and shot him through the maine masse. And after them came vp the Admirall vnder our Lee also, but he was not able to doe vs so much harme as the small shippes, because he caried ordnance higher then they, neither were we able to make a good shot at any of them, because our shippe was so weake in the side, that she laid all her ordnance in the Sea: wherefore we thought to lay the great ship aboord, and as soone as the French Admirall went roome with him, he fell a sterne and could not fetch him, and after he fell a sterne of two carauells moze and could fetch none of them, but fell to Lee ward of them all: and when he was to Lee ward, he kept about to the shoze ward, and left vs, and then we put out our topsailes and gaue them chase, and both the other Frenchmen kept the wind, and would not come neere vs, and our owne ship was a sterne so that she could not come to vs: and after we had folowed them about two houtes to the seaward, they kept about againe towards the shoze, thinking to pay vs as they went along by, and to haue the wind of the French Admirall which before ran in towards the shoze, and we kept about with them, and kept still the wind of them thinking that our Viceadmirall and the other would haue folowed vs as wee willed them to do: but after that the Portugall was past by them, and euery one had shot at vs and our Viceadmirall, both our Viceadmirall and the two Frenchmen, & our owne pinnasse left vs in the laps, and ran to seaward, and we ran still along, and kept the wind of them to succour the French Admirall, who was vnder all of their Lees, and when they met with him, euery one went roome with him, and gaue him the broad side, and after they cast about againe, and durst not booyd him, because they sawe vs in the weather of them or els without doubt they had taken or sunke them, for thzee of them which were the smallest, went so fast that it was not possible for a ship to booyd them, and caried such ordnance that if they had had the weather of vs, they would haue troubled 3 of the best ships that we had, and as for their Admirall and Viceadmirall they were both notable appointed.

When the Frenchman was cleare of them, hee laye as neere the winde as hee could, and wee folowed them still towards the shoze, and then the Admirall ranne to Sea after the rest, and left vs all alone: and when the Portugals perceiued that we were alone, and gaue them chase, they kept about with vs and we with them, to keepe the wind of them, and we ranne still within base shot of them, but they shot not at vs, because we had the weather of them, and sawe that they could do vs no hurt: and thus we folowed one another vntil night, and in the night we lost them, but as for all the rest of our ships, they packed on all the sailes that they could and ranne to sea, and as they themselues confesse, they prayed for vs, but as for helpe at their hands we could haue none.

The 28 day we met with our Viceadmirall, our pinnasse, and two of the Frenchmen, and the thirde was fled which was a ship of fourscore tunne, and belonged to Roan: and when I had the sight of the rest of our ships, I tooke our skiffe and went to them to know why they lost vs in such a case, and Iohn Kire made me answere that his ship would neither reare nor steere, and as for the pinnasse, Iohn Davis made me answere that she would doe nothing, and that he could cary her no further, for her rudder was broken, so that the Part was glad to tow her. Then I went to the French Admirall, and found him selfe to be a man of good stomacke, but the one halfe of his men were sicke and dead: and then I talked with the smaller Frenchman, and he made mee answere that he could doe nothing, saying, that his ship would beare no saile, and had 16 of his men dead and sicke, so he made vs plaine answere that he was able to doe nothing. After this the Frenchmen durst not anker for feare of the Portugals.

The 29 day the master of the pinnasse came to vs and sayd that they were not able to keepe her any longer, and then wee viewed her and seeing there was no remedie, her rudder with all the iron worke being broken both aloft and belowe, wee agreed to breake her vp and to put the men men into the Barr. So we tooke out of her foure bales, one anker, and certaine fire wood, and set her on fire, and afterwarde ran along the coast.

The thirte day we went in to the shoze, and spake with certaine Negroes, who told vs that some French shippes had bene there, but wee could not bargaine with them they were so vnreasonable.

The 31 day I went to shoze but did not traffike.

The 1 day of February we weighed, seeing we could not bring the Negroes to any reason, and came to another place which standeth vpon an hill. February

The third day I went to a towne foure leagues from vs, and shot off two pieces, and the Captaine came to vs, and I sent Thomas Rippen a land who knew the Captaine, and as soone as he came on shoze the Captaine knew him and diuers of the Negroes who then began to aske for mee, and hauing told the Captaine that I was in the boate, hee made no longer tarrying but by and by caused two boates to be put to the Sea, and came to me himselfe, and when he saue me, he cryed to me before hee came to the boat and seemed to be the gladdest man allue, and so did all the company that knew mee, and I gaue him a reward as the maner of the Countrey is, and caused the Frenchmen to giue another, promising the next day to giue him wine: and that night because it was late, he would not talke of any price, but left me a pledge, and tooke another of me and so departed.

The 4 day going on shoze, I found that the ships of France which had bin there, had done much hurt to our markets, but yet I tooke five ounces and a halfe of gold.

The fift day I tooke eight ounces and one eight part of gold: but I saw that the Negroes perceived the difference in Cloth betwixt ours and that which the Frenchmen had, which was better, and broader then ours: and then I told captaine Blundel that I would goe to the Leeward, because I perceived that being there where his Cloth was sold, I should do no good, whereof hee was soze.

The 6 day there came an Almace & Negroes aboord me, requesting me to come to their towne for they had much gold and many marchants: and so I went and found their old Captaine gone, and another in his place: but this night wee did no good, because the marchants were not come downe: so he required a pledge which I let him haue, and tooke another of him.

The 7 day George our Negro came to vs, who had followed vs at the least 30 leagues in a small boat, and when he came, the Negroes and we soone concluded of price, I tooke this day five pound and one ounce, and 3 quarters of gold. This Negro we had left at Shamma at the time of the fight, who said that he saw the fight being on shoze, and that when we were gone from the Portugals, the Portugals came into their riuer, and told them that the Englishmen had slaine two Portugals with a piece, which was in deed out of our ship, and they required harbour there, but the captaine of Shamma would not suffer them. George our Negro.

The 8 day we tooke nineteene pound three ounces and a halfe.

The 9 day we tooke two pound six ounces and a halfe.

The 10 day three pound.

The 11 day came to vs Jerome Bawdet the Viceadmirall of the Frenchmen and his pinnasse, and he shewed vs that where we left them there was no good to be done, and sayd he would goe to the Eastward, but wee told him hee should not: and thereupon commaunded him to goe to his company which he was appointed to bee with, which hee refused to doe untill wee had shot three or foure pieces at their pinnasse, and when the ship saue that, she kept about, and ranne to Sea-ward, and durst come no neerer to vs, so the pinnasse went after her. We tooke this day one pound five ounces. Two Portugals slaine by the English.

The 12 day there came one of the Frenchmens pinnasses to vs laden with cloth, and would haue made sale, but I would not suffer him, and therefore tooke him and sent him aboord of our ship, and caused him to ride there all day. We tooke five pound six ounces and a halfe.

The 14 day we tooke of some Negroes 4 ounces of gold.

The 16 we came to another towne.

The 17 day I went a shoze and understood that 3 of the Portugall ships were at the Castle, and the other two at Shamma. The captaine of this towne was gone to the principall towne, to speake with their king, and would returne shortly as they told me, and so he did, and brought me a weight and measure, and I sent a man to see that principall towne, and their king. The Portugall ships rid so neere vs, that within 3 houres they might be with vs, yet were all contented to tary for sales.

The 18 day certaine of the kings seruants came to vs, and we tooke one pound two ounces, and one eight part of gold. The Frenchmen tybled by the English.

The 10 day we tooke five pound one ounce.

The 20 day one pound and foure ounces.

The 21 I tooke foure pound and one ounce, and the Negroes enquired for fine cloth, and I opened two pieces which were not fine enough, as they sayd, but seeing that we had no other, they bought of them. At night I provided a gift, or present, and sent one marchant and a mariner with it to the king, to certifie him of our want of victuals, by reason whereof we could not stay long: for in deed we searched our ship, and the most part of our beere was leaked out of all our barrels.

The 22 day we tooke three ounces and a halfe.

King Abaan.

The offer of the king to the English to build a fort.

The 23 our men came from the king Abaan, and told vs, that he had receiued the very friendly, but he had little gold, but promised, if we would tary, to send into all his countrey for gold for vs, and he willed our men at their comming home to speake to our king to send men and provision into his countrey, to build a castle, and to bring Tailors with them, to make them apparell, and good wares, and they should be sure to sell them: but for that present the Frenchmen had filled them full of cloth.

A towne in circuit as big as London.

A pretie device to descrye the enemie.

This towne standeth about foure leagues by in the land, and is, by the estimation of our men, as big in circuit as London, but the building is like to the rest of the countrey. They haue about this Towne great store of the wheate of the Countrey, and they iudge, that on one side of the towne there were one thousand rikes of Wheate, and another sort of Cozne which is called Mill, which is much vsed in Spaine. About this towne they keepe good watch euery night, and haue to warne the watchmen certaine cordes made fast ouer their wayes, which lead into the towne, and certaine bells vpon them, so that if any man touch the cordes, the bells ring, and then the watchmen runne forth of their watch houses to see what they be: and if they be enemies, if they passe the cord, they haue provision with certaine nets hanged ouer the wayes, where they must passe, to let fall vpon them, and so take them, and otherwise then by the wayes it is not possible to enter the towne, by reason of the thickets and bushes which are about the same, and the towne is also walled round about with long cordes, and bound together with sedge and certaine barkes of trees.

The kings
friendly entertainment of

When our men came to the towne, it was about five of the clock in the morning, for there they trauell allwayes in the night by reason of the heate of the day: and about nine of the clocke, the king sent for them, for there may no man come to him before he be sent for, and then they would haue caried their present with them: but the Negroes told them, that they must bee three times brought before him, before they might offer their gift: and when they came to him, he talked with them, and receiued them very friendly, and kept them about halfe an houre, and then they departed, and after that sent for them againe three times, and last of all, they brought him their present, which he receiued thankfully, and then caused a pot of wine of Palme to be brought forth, and made them drinke: and before they drinke, both here and in all the Countrey, they vse certaine ceremonies.

Their ceremonies
in drinke.

First they bring forth their pot of drinke, and then they make a hole in the ground, & put some of the drinke into it, and they cast the earth vpon it, which they digged forth before, and then they set the pot vpon the same, then they take a little thing made of a goord, and with that they take out of the same drinke, and put it vpon the ground in three places, and in diuers places they haue certaine bunches of the pills of Palme trees set in the ground before them, and there they put in some drinke, doing great reuerence in all places to the same Palme trees.

All these ceremonies first done, the king tooke a cup of gold, and they put him in wine, and he dranke of it, and when he dranke, the people cried all with one voice, Abaan, Abaan, with certaine other words, like as they cry commonly in Flanders, vpo the Twelue night, The kinning drinke: and when he had drinke, then they gaue drinke to euery one, and that done, the king licensed them to depart, and euery one that departeth from him boweth 3 times towards him, and waueth with both hands together, as they bow, and then do depart. The king hath commonly sitting by him 8 or 10 ancient men with gray beards.

This day we tooke one pound and 10 ounces of gold.

The 24 day we tooke 3 pound and 7 ounces.

The 25 we tooke 3 ounces and 3 quarters.

The 26 we tooke 2 pound and 10 ounces.

The 27 two pound and five ounces.

The 28 foure pound, and then seeing that there was no more gold to be had, we weighed and went forth.

Howe.

The first day of March we came to a towne called Mowre, but we found no boats nor people there:

there: but being ready to depart, there came two Almades to vs from another towne, of whom we tooke two ounces and a halfe of golde: and they tolde vs that the Negroes that dwelled at Mowre were gane to dwell at Lagoua.

Lagoua.

The second day we came thwart of the castle, and about two leagues off, and there saw all the five Portugall ships at anchor, and this day by night we fetched Shamma.

They returne.

The third day we had sight of one tall ship, of about two hundred tunnes, in the weather of vs, and within lesse then two leagues of our ships, and then we saw two moze a sterne of her, the one a ship of five hundred or moze, and the other a pinnesse: and these were a new fleet at that present arriued out of Portugall. Whereupon we wayed, and made thist to double out of the land, and then the winde comming to the South-southwest, the Hart going roome with them fell thre leagues to the leeward of vs. These Portugals gaue vs the chase from nine of the clocke in the morning, till five at night, but did no good against vs. At last, we perceiuing the Admirall to be farre a sterne of his company, because his maiue top-mast was spent, determined to cast about with them againe, because we were sure to weather them, and the winde being as it was, it was our best course: but the Hart was so farre to the leeward, that we could not doe it, except we would lose her company, so that we tooke in some of our sailes, and went roome with him: which when he perceiued, he looffed to, and was able to lie as neere as he did before. At night, when we came to him, he would not speake to vs: then we asked of his company why he went so roome; and they made excuse that they were able to beare no saile by, for feare of bearing their foretopmast over boord: but this was a simple excuse.

Ships of Portugall.

The fourth day, being put from our warring place we began to seeke our meat in salt water, and to rebate our allowance of drinke, to make it indure the longer: and so concluded to set our course thence, for our owne countrey.

The 12 of March I found my selfe thwart of Cape das palmas.

The 16 day we fell with the land, which we iudged to be the Cape Mensurado, aboutt which place is very much high land.

Cape Mensurado.

The 18 day we lost sight of the Hart, and I thinke the willfull Passer ran in with the hope of purpose to lose vs, being offended that I tolde him of his owne folly.

The 27 day we fell in sight of two small Islands, which lie by our reckoning five leagues off the headland of Sierra Leona: and before we came in sight of the same Islands, we made our reckoning to be forty or thirte leagues at the least off them. Therefore all they that saile this way are to regard the currents which set Northnorthwest, or els they may be much deceived.

Two small Islands by Sierra Leona. Note.

The 14 of Aprill we met with two great ships of Portugall, which although they were in the weather of vs, yet came not roome with vs, whereby we iudged that they were bound for Calicut.

The 18 day we were in the heighth of Cape verde.

The 24 we were directly vnder the tropike of Cancer.

The first day of May Henry Willson our Steward died: and the next day died Iohn Vnderwood.

The fift day we were in the heighth of S. Michael.

The 23 we had sight of a shippe in the weather of vs, which was a French man of 90 tunne, who came with vs as stoutly and as desperately as might be, and comming neere vs perceiued that we had bene vpon a long voyage, and iudging vs to be weake, as in deed we were, came neerer vs, and thought to haue layed vs aboard, & there slept by some of his men in armour, and commanded vs to strike saile: whereupon we sent them some of our Russe, crosse barres, and chaine-shot, and arrowes, so thicke, that it made the vpper worke of their shippe lie about their eares, and we spoiled him with all his men, and toare his shippe miserably with our great ordinance, and then he began to fall a sterne of vs, and to packe on his sailes, and get away: and we seeing that, gaue him foure or five good pieces moze for his farewell; and thus we were rid of this French man, who did vs no harme at all. We had aboard vs a French man a Trumpetter, who being sicke, and lying in his bed, tooke his trumpet notwithstanding, and sounded till he could sound no moze, and so died.

A French brigado.

The 28 we conferred together, and agreed to go into Seuerne, and so to Bristol, but the same night we had sight of the Lizard, and by reason of the winde, we were not able to double the land, and to go into Seuerne, but were forced to beare in with the Lizard.

The 29 day, about nine of the clocke in the morning, we arriued safely in Plimmouth, and praised God for our good arriual.

The third and last voyage of M. William Townson to the coast of Guinie, and the Castle de Mina, in the yeere 1577.

The thirtieth day of January, the yeere abouesayd, we departed out of the Sound of Plimmouth, with three ships, and a pinnelle, whereof the names are these: (1)

1 The Minion Admirall of the fleet,

2 The Christopher Viceadmirall,

3 The Tyger.

4 A pinnelle called the Vnicorne: being all bound for the Canaries, and from thence, by the grace of God, to the coast of Guinie.

It is to be understood, that at this time there was warre betwixt England and France.

The next day, being the last of this moneth, we met with two hulks of Dantzick, the one called the Rose, a ship of foure hundred tunnes, and the other called the Vnicorne, of an hundred and fifty tunnes, the Master of the Rose was called Nicholas Masse, and the Master of the Vnicorne Melchior White, both laden at Bourdeaux, and for the most part with wines. When we came to them, we caused them to hoist forth their boats, and to come and speake with vs, and we examined euery one of them apart, what French mens goods they had in their shippes, and they sayd they had none: but by the contrarieties of their tales, and by the suspicion which we gathered of their false charact-parties, we perceiued that they had French mens goods in them: we therefore caused one of them to fetch vp his bills of lading, and because he denied that he had any, we sent certaine with him, who caused him to goe to the place where he had hid them, and by the differences of his billes of lading, and his talke, we gathered, as before, that they had Frenchmens goods. Whereupon we examined them straightly, and first the Master of the Vnicorne, which was the smaller shippe, confessed that they had two and thirty tunnes and a hoghead of a French mans. Then we examined the Master in like case, and he acknowledged the same to be true. Then we examined also the Master of the great ship, and he confessed that he had an hundred and eight and twenty tunnes of the same French mans, and moze they would not confesse, but sayd that all the rest was laden by Peter Lewgues of Hamburg, to be deliuered to one Henry Summer of Camphire, notwithstanding all their letters were directed to Hamburg, and written in Dutch without, and within in French.

When they had confessed that they had thus much French mens goods within their shippes, we conferred together what was best to be done with them. William Cretton and Edward Selman were of the opinion, that it should be good either to carry them into Spaine, and there to make sale of the goods, or els into Ireland, or to returne backe againe into England with them, if the winde would permit it. But I, waping what charge we had of our Masters, first by mouth, and afterwards by writing, that for no such matter we should in any case prolong the time, for feare of losing the voyage, and considering that the time of the yeere was very farre spent, and the money that we should make of the wines not very much, in respect of the commodity which we hoped for by the voyage, perswaded them that to goe into Ireland, the winde being Easterly as it was, might be an occasion that we should be locked in there with that winde, and so lose our voyage: and to carry them into Spaine, seeing they sailed so ill, that hauing all their sailes abroad, we kept them company onely with our foresailes, and without any toppe sailes abroad, so that in euery two dayes sailing they would haue hindered vs moze then one; and besides that (the winde being Easterly) we should not be able to seaze the coast with them: besides all this the losse of time when we came thither was to be considered, whereupon I thought it not good to carry them any further.

And as for carrying them into England, although the winde had bene good, as it was not, considering what charge we had of our Masters, to shift vs out of the way for feare of a stay by reason of the warres, I held it not in any wise conuenient.

But notwithstanding all this, certaine of our company not being herewith satisfied went to our Master to know his opinion therein, who made them a plaine answer, that to carry them into any place, it was not the best way nor the profit of their Masters. And he tolde them further, that if the time were prolonged one moneth longer before they passed the Cape, but a few men would go the voyage. All these things considered, we all paused, and determined at the last, that euery man should take out of the hulks so much as he could well bestow for necessities, and the next morning to conclude what should be further done with them. So we tooke out of them for vs foure teene tunnes and a halfe of wine, and one tunne we put into the pinnelle.

Moze we tooke out one hoghead of Aquauita,

Sixe cakes of rozen.

A small halfer for ties: and certeine chesnuts,

The French mens goods seized in the time of the warre vpon the losse of Calles.

The Christopher tooke out,

Ten tunnes of wine, and one hoghead.

A quantity of Aquauitz;

Shall-lines.

Chestnuts.

Site double bales with their chambers. And their men broke by the hulks chests, and tooke out their compasses, and running glasses, the sounding leade and line, and candles: and cast some of their beefe over boord, and spoiled them so much, that of very pity we gaue them a compasse, a running glasse, a lead and a line, certaine bread and candles, and what apparell of theirs we could finde in their ship, we gaue them againe, and some money also of that which William Crompton tooke for the rancome of a pooze Frenchman; who being their Pilot downe the Riuer of Bordeaux, they were not able to set him a shoze againe, by reason of the foule weather.

The Tyger also tooke out of the smaller hulke fire or seven tunnes of wine, one hoghead of Aquauitz; and certaine rozzen, and two bales he tooke out of the great hulke.

The first day of February in the morning we all came together againe sauing W. Crompton who sent vs word that he was contented to agree to that order which we should take.

Now Edward Selman was of this opinion, that it was not best to let the ships depart, but put men into them to cary them into England, which thing neither we nor our Master would agree vnto, because we thought it not good to vnmann our ships going outward, considering how dangerous the time was: so that in fine we agreed to let them depart, and giue them the rest of the wine which they had in their ships of the Frenchmens for the freight of that which we had taken, and for their ordnance, rozzen, aquauitz, chestnuts, and other things which the company had taken from them. So we receiued a bill of their handes, that they confessed how much Frenchmens goods they had, and then we let them depart.

The 10 day we reckoned our selues to be 25 leagues from the Grand Canarie, and this day about nine of the clocke our pinnesse brake her rudder, so that we were forced to tow her at the sterne of the Minion, which we were able to doe, and yet kept company with the rest of our ships. About eleven of the clocke this day we had sight of the Grand Canarie.

The 11 day when we came to the Island we perceiued that it was the Ile of Tenerif, & then in deed wee had sight of the Grand Canarie, which lieth 12 leagues to the Eastwards of Tenerif: and because the road of Tenerif is foule ground, and nothing was there to be gotten for the helping of our pinnesse, hauing the winde large, we agreed to go with the Grand Canarie.

The 12 day we came into the roade of the towne of Canarie, which lieth one league from the same towne. And after we had shot off diuers pieces of ordnance to salute the towne and the castle, the gouernour and capitaines of the Island sent to vs which were the capitaines of the ships, requiring vs to come a shoze. And when we came to them they receiued vs very friendly, offering vs their owne Jennetts to ride to the towne, and what other friendship they could shew vs: and we went to the towne with two English Marchants which lay there, and remained in their house that day. The second day following we came aboord to deliuer our marchandise, and to get our pinnesse mended.

Two English Marchants liuers in the Grand Canary.

The 14 day came into the road the Spanish fleet which was bound to the Emperours Indies, which were in number nineteene saile, whereof five were ships of foure hundred and five hundred a peece, the rest were of two hundred, an hundred and fifty, and of an hundred. When they were come to an ancre they saluted vs with ordnance, and so we did them in like case. And afterwards the Admirall (who was a knight) sent his pinnesse to desire me to come to him; and when I came to him he receiued me friendly, and was desirous to heare somewhat of the state of England and Flanders. And after he had made me a banquet, I departed; and I being gone vnto the boat, hee caused one of his gentlemen to desire Francisco the Portugall, which was my interpreter, to require me to furl my flagge, declaring that hee was Generall of the Emperours fleet. Which thing (being come aboord) Francisco shewed me: and because I refused to furl it, and kept it footz till, certaine of the souldiers in the ships shot diuers harquebush shot about the ship, and ouer the flagge: and at the same time there came certaine gentlemen aboord our ship to see her: to whom I sayd, that if they would not cause those their men to leaue shooting, I would shoot the best ordnance I had thorow their sides. And when they perceiued that I was offended, they departed, and caused their men of warre and souldiers to shoot no moze, and afterwards they came to me againe, and tolde me that they had punished their men. That done, I shewed them the ship, and made them such cheere as I could, which they receiued very thankfully: and the day following they sent for mee to dine with them, and sent me word that their Generall was very soyy that any man should require me to furl my flagge, and that it was without his consent: and therefore he requested me not to thinke any vngentlenesse to be in him, promising that no man of his should misbeemeane himselſe.

The 17 day we ſet ſaile in the roade of Grand Canarie, and proceeded on our voyage.

Rio del Oro,

The 20 in the morning we had ſight of the coaſt of Barbarie, and running along the ſhoze we had ſight of Rio del Oro, which lieth almoſt vnder the tropike of Cancer.

The 21 day we found our ſelves to be in 20 degrees and a halfe, which is the height of Cape

Four Ilands.

The 26 I tooke Francisco and Francis Caſtelin with me, and went into the pinneſſe, and ſo went to the Tyger which was neerer the ſhoze then the other ſhips; and went aboard her, and with her and the other ſhips we ranne Weſt and by South, and Weſt-ſouthweſt, untill about foure of the clocke, at which time we were hard aboard the Cape, and then we ran in Southweſt, and beyond the Cape about foure leagues we found a faire Iland, and beſides that two or three Ilands, which were of very high rocks, being full of diuers ſortes of ſea-foule, and of pigeons, with other ſortes of land-foules, and ſo many, that the whole Iland was covered with the dung thereof, and ſeemed ſo white as if the whole Iland had bene of chalke; and within thoſe Ilands was a very faire bay, and hard aboard the rocks eightene ſadom water, and faire ground. And when we perceined the bay, and vnderſtanding that the Frenchmen had a great trade there, which we were deſirous to know, we came to an ancre with the Tyger. And after that the Minion and the Chriſtopher ancred in like caſe: then we cauſed the pinneſſe to runne beyond another Cape of land, to ſee if there were any place to trade in there.

It being neere night I tooke our cocke and the Tygers ſkiffe, and went to the Iland, where we got certaine foules like unto Gannards: and then I came aboard againe and tooke two of the Gannards which we had taken, and caried them to the captaine of the Chriſtopher, and when I had talked with him, I found him not willing to tary there, neither was I deſirous to ſpend any long time there, but onely to attempt what was to be done. The Maſter of the Chriſtopher toſe me he would not tary, being not bound for that place.

and hides.

The 27 the Captaine of the Tyger and Edward Selman came to me; and Iohn Makeworth from the Chriſtopher, and then we agreed to take the pinneſſe, & to come along the ſhoze, becauſe that where we rid no Negros came to vs; and the night beſore our pinneſſe brought vs word that there was a very faire Iland. And when I came beyond the point I found it ſo, and withall a goodly bay, and we ſaw vpon the maine certaine Negros which waied vs on ſhoze, and then we came to an ancre with the pinneſſe, and went a ſhoze with our cocke, and they ſhewed vs where their trade was, and that they had Elephants teeth, muſke, & hides, and offered vs to fetch downe their Captaine, if we would ſend a man with them, and they would leaue a pledge for him: then we asked them when any ſhip had bene there; and ſome of them ſayd not in eight moneths, or yers, in ſix moneths, and others in foure, and that they were Frenchmen.

Then we perceiuing the Chriſtopher not willing to tary, departed from them, & ſet ſaile with the pinneſſe and went aboard the Tyger.

Cabo de Monte.

The 10 day of March we fell with the coaſt of Guinea, ſixe leagues to the Eaſtward of Cape de Monte, beſide a riuer called Rio das Palmas.

The 11 we went to the ſhoze, and found one man that could ſpeake ſome Portuguiſe, who toſe vs that there were three French ſhips paſſed by; one of them two moneths paſt, and the other one moneth paſt. At this place I receiued nineteene Elephants teeth, and two ounces and halfe a quarter of golde.

The riuer de Sestos.

The 12 we ſet ſaile to go to the riuer de Sestos.

The 13 at night we fell with the ſame riuer.

The 14 day we ſent in our boats to take water, and romaged our ſhippes, and deliuered ſuch wares to the Chriſtopher and Tyger, as they had need of.

The 15 we came together, and agreed to ſend the Tyger to another riuer to take in her water, and to ſee what ſhe could do for graines. After that we tooke marchandiſe with vs, and went into the riuer, and there we found a Negro which was bozne in Liſbone, left there by a ſhip of Portugall which was burned the laſt yere at this riuer in fighting with three Frenchmen; and he toſe vs further, that two moneths paſt there were three Frenchmen at this place; and ſix weeks paſt there were two French ſhips at the riuer; and ſixteene dayes paſt there was one. All which ſhips were gone towards the Mina. This day we tooke but few graines.

The 19 day conſidering that the Frenchmen were gone beſore vs, and that by reaſon of the vnholeſome aires of this place foureene of our men in the Minion were fallen ſicke, wee deter- mined to depart, and with all ſpeed to go to the Mina.

The

The 21 we came to the riuer de Potos, where some of our boats went in for water, and ^{Rio de Potos,} went in with our rocks, and tooke 12 small Elephants teeth.

The 23 day, after we had taken as many teeth as we could get, about nine of the clocke we set saile to go towards the Mina.

The 31 we came to Hanta, and made sale of certaine Manillios.

The first Aprill we had sight of five saile of Portugals, whereupon we set saile and went off to sea to get the winde of them, which we should haue had if the winde had kept his ordinary course, which is all the day at the Southwest, and West-southwest: but this day with a flaw it kept all the day at the East, and East-southeast, so that the Portugals had the winde of vs, and came roome with the Tyger and vs untill night, and brought themselves all saue one, which sailed not so well as the rest, within shot of vs: then it fell calme, and the winde came vp to the Southwest, howbeit it was neere night, and the Christopher, by meanes of her boat, was about foure leagues to the lee wards of vs. We tacked and ranne into the weather of the Admirall, and three moze of his company, and when we were neere him we spake to him, but he would not answer. Then we cast about and lay in the weather of him; and casting about he shot at vs, and then wee shot at him, and shot him foure or five times thorow. ^{They descrie five saile of the Portugals.} They shot diuers times thorow our sailes, but hurt no man. The Tyger and the pinnelle, because it was night, kept out their sailes, & would not meddle with them. After we had thus fought together 2 houres or moze, and would not lay him aboord because it was night, we left shooting one at the other, and kept still the weather of them. Then the Tyger and the pinnelle kept about and came to vs, and after ward being neere the shoze, we three kept about and lay to the sea, and shot off a piece to giue warning to the Christopher.

This night about 12 of the clocke, being very litle winde, and the Master of the Tyger asleepe, by the ill worke of his men the ship sel aboord of vs, and with her sheare-hooks cut our maine saile, and her boat being betwixt vs was broken and suncke, with certaine marchandise in her, and the ships wailes were broken with her outleger: yet in the end we cleared her without any more hurt, but she was in hazzard to be broken downe to the water.

The second day we had sight of the Christopher, and were neere vnto her, so that I tooke our boat and went to her. And when I came thither, they shewed me, that after the Portugals had left vs, they went all roome with him, and about twelue a clocke at night met him, and shot at him, and hee at them, and they shot him thorow the sailes in diuers places, and did no other great hurt. And when we had vnderstood that they had beene with him as well as with vs, we agreed altogether to seeke them (if wee might finde them) and keepe a weather our places of traffique.

The third day we ran all day to the Southwestwards to seeke the Portugals, but could haue no sight of them, and halled into the shoze.

The fourth day, when we had sight of land, we found that the current had set vs thirty leagues to the Eastwards of our reckoning, which we wondered at: for the first land we made was La- ^{Lagua.} gua. Then I caused our boat to be manned, and the Christophers also, and went to the shoze and tooke our Negro with vs. And on shoze we learned that there were foure French ships vpon the coast; one at Perinnen, which is six leagues to the Westward of Lagoa: another at Weamba, which is foure leagues to the Eastward of Lagoa: a third at Perecow, which is foure leagues to the Eastward of Weamba: and the fourth at Egrand, which is foure leagues to the Eastward of Perecow. ^{Perinnen. Weamba. Perecow. Egrand.}

When we had intelligence of these netues we agreed to go to the Eastwards with the French men to put them from their traffique, and shot off two or three pieces in our boats to cause the ships to way: and hauing bene about one houre vnder saile, we had sight of one of the French men vnder saile, halling off from Weamba to whome we gaue chase, and agreed in the night for feare of ouershooting them, that the Minion should first come to ancre, and after that about three houres, the Tyger and the Christopher to beare along all night.

The 5 day we found three of the French ships at ancre: one called La foye de Honfleur, a ship of 220 tunnes, another called the Ventereuse of small Roebarge of Honfleur, of 100 tunnes, both appertaining to Shawdet of Honfleur, the third was called the Muler de Baruille a ship of 120 tunnes, and this ship belonged to certaine Marchants of Roan.

When we came to them, we determined to lay the Admiral aboord, the Christopher the Vice-admirall, and the Tyger the smallest: but when we came nere them they wayed, and the Christopher being the headmost & the weathermost man, went roome with the Admirall: the Roebarge went to fall that wee could not fetch her. The first that we came to was the Muler, and her wee ^{The English boord the Frenchmen.} layed aboord, and our men entred and tooke her, which ship was the richest except the Admirall: ^{for}

for the Admirall had taken about 80 pound of golde, and the Roeburge had taken but 22 pound; and all this we learned of the Frenchmen, who knew it very well: for they were all in consort together, and had bene upon the coast of Mina two moneths and odder dayes: howbeit the Roeburge had bene there before them with another ship of Diepe, and a carauel, which had beaten all the coast, and were departed one moneth before our arriuing there, and they three had taken about 700 pound of golde.

Assoone as we had layed the ship aboard, and left certaine men in her to keepe her, we set saile and gaue chase to the other two ships, and chased them all day and night, and the next day buttill three a clocke in the afternoone, but we could not fetch them: and therfore seeing that we brought our selues very farre to leeward of our place, we left the chase, and kept about againe to go with the shore.

Fifty pound of golde taken

The 7 day I sent for the capitaine, marchants & masters of the other ships, and when they came we weighed the golde which we had from the Frenchmen, which weighed fifty pound and five ounces of golde: this done, we agreed to put men out of euery ship into the prize to keepe her.

The 12 day we came to the further place of the Mina called Egrand, and being come to an ancre, discharged all the marchants goods out of the prize, and would haue sold the ship with the victuals to the Frenchmen, but because she was leake they would not take her, but desired vs to saue their liues in taking them into our owne ships: then we agreed to take out the victuals and sinke the ship, and diuide the men among our ships.

The 15 at night we made an end of discharging the prize, and diuided all the Frenchmen except foure which were sicke and not able to helpe themselves: which foure both the Christopher and the Tyger refused to take, leauing them in their ship alone in the night, so that about midnight I was forced to fetch them into our ship.

Benin.

The 15 of April, moouing our company for the voyage to Benin, the most part of them all refused it.

The 16, seeing the unwillingnesse of the company to goe thither, we determined to spend as much time upon the coast as we could, to the end we might make our voyage, and agreed to leaue the Minion here at Egrand, the Tyger to go to Pericow which is foure leagues off, and the Christopher to goe to Weamba, which is ten leagues to the weaether ward of this place: and if any of them both should haue sight of more sailes then they thought good to meddle withall; to come roome with their fellowes; to wit, first the Christopher to come with the Tyger, and then both they to come with vs.

of sickness.

We remained in this place called Egrand, vntill the last day of April, in which time many of our men fell sicke; and sixe of them died. And here we could haue no traffique with the Negros but three or foure dayes in the weeke, and all the rest of the weeke they would not come at vs.

The 3 of May not hauing the pinnelle sent vs with cloth from the other ships, as they promised, we solde French cloth, and gaue but three yards thereof to euery suffice.

The 5 day the Negros departed, and told vs they would come to vs againe within foure dayes, which we determined there to tary, although we had diuers of our men sicke.

Sickness.

The 8 day, all our cloth in the Minion being sold, I called the company together, to know whether they would tary the sale of the cloth taken in the prize at this place or no: they answered, that in respect of the death of some of their men, and the present sickness of twenty more, they would not tary, but repaire to the other ships, of whom they had heard nothing since the 27 of April: and yet they had our pinnelle with them, onely to carrie newes from one to another.

The 9 day we determined to depart hence to our fellowes, to see what they had done, and to attempt what was to be done at the towne of Don Iohn.

The 10 day in the morning we set saile to seeke the Christopher and the Tyger.

The 11 day the capitaine of the Christopher came to vs, and told vs that they could finde small doings at the places where they had bene.

The 12 William Crompton and I in our small pinnelle went to the Tyger and the Christopher at Perenine.

The 13 we sent away the Tyger to Egrand, because we found nothing to doe at Perenine, worth the tarying for.

The 14 our great pinnelle came to vs, and presently we put cloth into her, and sent her backe to Weamba, where she had bene before, and had taken there ten pound of golde.

The 15 the Minion came to vs, and the next day we went a shore with our boats, and tooke but one ounce of golde.

Mowre.

The 19 day hauing set saile we came to an ancre before Mowre, and there we carried two dayes, but tooke not an ounce of golde.

The

The 21 we came to an ancre before Don Johns towne.

The 22 we manned our boats and went to shoze, but the Negros would not come at vs; then the Captaine of the Christopher and I tooke a skiffe and eight men with vs, and went and talked with the Negros, and they sayd that they would send a man to the great towne, where Don Iohn himselfe say, to aduertise him of our comming.

The 23 we went a shoze againe, and the Negros tolde vs that this day the marchants of Don Iohn would come downe: so we tarried there untill night, and no man would come to vs: but diuers of the Negros made vs signes to depart.

The 24 the Captaine of the Christopher tooke his boat & went to Mowre, and when he came thither, certaine Negros came to him to know the price of his wares, but in the end there came an Almade, which he iudged came from the castle, and caused all the Negros to depart from him: and when he saw they would come no more to him, he went a shoze and tooke certaine men with him, and then the Negros cast stones at them, & would not suffer them to come vp to their towne. And when they saw that, they tooke certaine of the Almade, and put them to the sea, and afterwaros departed. The same morning I went a shoze at Don Johns towne, and tooke a white flag with me, but none of the Negros could come to me, which caused vs to iudge that the Portugals were in the towne. After this, our boat came to vs well manned, and I sent one man vp to the towne with a white flag in his hand, but when he was come thither, all the Negros went away & would not speake with him. Then I sent one alone into the woods after them, but they in no case would come to vs. When we saw that, we tooke twelue goats and foure or five hennies, which we found in the towne, and went aboord without doing any further hurt to the towne: and when I came aboord, I found our pinnelle come from Cormatin, which had taken there two pound & six ounces of golde. Then after much ado with the froward Haribers, we went thither wards with our ship, and the Christopher went to Mowre.

Cormatin,

The 25 day the Master of the Christopher sent his boat to the shoze for ballast, and the Negros would haue beaten the company from the shoze, wherupon the company resisted them, and slew and hurt diuers of them, and hauing put them to flight, burned their towne, and brake all their boats.

to fight with the Negros

The 26 day our pinnelle came to vs from Cormatin, and had taken two pound & eleven ounces of golde: and Iohn Shirife tolde vs that the Negros of that place were very desirous to haue a ship come backe againe to their towne.

The 27 we wayed and went to Cormatin.

The 28 the Christopher came to vs from Mowre, and traffiqued there two dayes.

The second day of Iune the Tyger came to vs from Egrand, and the pinnelle from Weamba, and they two had taken about fifty pound of golde since they departed from vs.

The 4 day we departed from Cormatin to plie vp to Shamma, being not able to tary any longer vpon the coast for lacke of victuals, and specially of drinke.

The 7 day we had sight of one of the king of Portugals ships, which came to an ancre besides the castle.

The 8 day George and Binny came to vs, and brought with them about two pound of golde.

The 10 day in the morning I tooke our small pinnelle, and the Captaine of the Christopher with me, and manned her well, and went to the castle to view the Portugals ships, and there we found one ship of about 300 tunne, and foure carattels: when we had well viewed them, we returned backe againe to our ships which we found seven leagues at sea.

The 11 day in the morning we found our selues well shot toward Shamma, & the Tyger with vs, but the Minion & the pinnelle had not wayed that night, so that we were out of sight of them: and hauing brought our selues in the weather of the Portugals ships, we came to an ancre to tary for the Minion, or els we might haue fetched Shamma. At night the Minion and the pinnelle came vp to vs, but could not fetch so farre to the weatherward as we, and therefore they ancred about a league a weather The castle, and we waied in the Christopher, and went toome with her.

The 12 day the Tyger came toome with vs, and she and the Christopher finding themselves to stand in great need of victuals, would haue gone with the Portugals ships to haue fetched some of them forth: but our master and company would in no case consent to goe with them, for feare of hanging when we came home: and the other two ships being fully minded to haue gone, and fearing that their owne company would accuse them, durst not go to them.

After this, by reason of the want of victuals in the pinnelle, which could receiue no victuals from the other shippes, but from vs onely, we tooke out all our men, and put twelue Frenchmen into her, and gaue them victuals to bring them to Shamma.

The 19 day the Tyger and Minion arrived at Shamma, and the Christopher within two Note. leagues off them, but could not fetch the winde by reason of the scantnesse of the winde; which hath bene so scant, that in fiftene dayes we haue plied to the windewards but twelue leagues, which befoze we did in one day and a night.

The 20 day I tooke our pinnesse, and went to the towne of Shamma to speake with the capitaine, and he tolde me that there was no golde there to be had, nor so much as a hen to be bought, and all by reason of the accord which he had made with the Portugals, and I seeing that departed peaceably from him.

The 21 I put such things as we had into our small pinnesse, and tooke one marchant of our ship, and another of the Tyger, and sent her to Hanta, to attempt, if she could doe any thing there, that night they could do nothing but were promised to haue golde the next day.

The next day (which was the 22) being come, we sent our pinnesse to Hanta againe, but there neither the capitaine nor the Negros durst traffike with vs, but intised vs from place to place, and all to no purpose.

They put the Frenchmen with victuals into the pinnesse.

This day we put away our pinnesse, with fife and twenty Frenchmen in her, and gaue them such victuals as we could spare, putting fiftene of them to the ranfome of fixe crownes a man.

The 23 of June our pinnesse came to vs from Hanta, and tolde vs that the Negros had dealt very ill with them, and would not traffike with them to any purpose.

Shamma burnt by the English.

The 24 we tooke our boat and pinnesse, and manned them well, and went to the towne of Shamma, and because the Capitaine thereof was become subiect to the Portugals we burned the towne, and our men seeking the spoile of such trifles as were there found a Portugall chell, wherein was some of his apparell, and his weights, and one letter sent to him from the castle, whereby we gathered that the Portugall had bene there of a long time.

Their returre homeward.

The 25 day, about thre of the clocke at afternoone, we set saile, and put into the sea, for our returre to England.

The current.

The last day of this moneth we fell with the shoze againe, and made our reckoning to be eighteene leagues to the weatherward of the place where we set off. When we came to make the land, we found our selues to be eighteene leagues to the leeward of the place, where we set off, which came to passe, by reason of the extreame current that runneth to the Eastward: when we perceiued our selues so abused, we agreed to cast about againe, and to lie as neere the winde as we could, to fetch the line.

S. Thome Island

The seuenth of Iuly we had sight of the Ile of S. Thome, and thought to haue sought the road to haue anered there: but the next morning the winde came about, and we kept our course.

The ninth, the winde varying, we kept about againe, and fell with the Island of S. Thome, and seeking the road were becalmed neere the Island, and with the current were put neere the shoze, but could haue no ground to ancre: so that we were forced to hoise out our pinnesse, and the other ships their skifs to towne from the Island, which did little good, but in the end the winde put vs thre leagues off the shoze.

The tenth day the Christopher and the Tyger cast about, whereby we iudged them to haue agreed together, to goe seeke some ships in the road, and to leaue vs: our men were not willing to goe after them, for feare of running in with the Island againe, and of putting our selues into the same danger that we were in the night befoze: but we shot off a piece, and put out two lights, and they answered vs with lights againe: whereupon we kept our course, and thought that they had followed vs, but in the morning we could not see them, so that they left vs willingly, and we determined to follow them no more. But the eleuenth day we altered our opinion and course, and consented to cast about againe for the Island, to seeke our ships; and about foure of the clocke in the afternoone we met with them.

The 13 we fell againe with the Island of S. Thome; and the same night we found our selues directly vnder the line.

The description of the Ile of S. Thome.

This Island is a very high Island, and being vpon the West side of it, you shall see a very high pike, which is very small, and straight, as it were the steeple of a church, which pike lieth directly vnder the line, and at the same South end of the Island to the Westward thereof lieth a small Island, about a mile from the great Island.

The third of August we departed fro the Ile of S. Thome, and met the winde at the South-west.

The 12 day we were in the height of Cape verde.

The Island of Salt.

The 22 day we fell with one of the Iles of Cape verde, called The Ile of Salt, and being informed by a Scottish man that we tooke among the Frenchmen vpon the coast, that there were fresh victuals to be had, we came to an ancre there.

The 23 day in the morning we manned our skiffe, and went a shoze, and found no houses, but we saw fouze men, which kept themselves alwayes farre from vs, as for cattell we could finde none, none, but great store of goats, and they were so wilde, that we could not take above three or foure of them: but there we had good store of fish, and vpon a small Island which lay by the same we had great store of sea-birds.

At night the Christopher brake her cable, and lost an ancre, so that she could cary no longer, so we all wayed, and set saile. Vpon the same Island we left the Scottish man, which was the occasion of our going aland at that place, but how he was left we could not tell: but, as we iudged, the people of the Island found him sleeping, and so caried him away: for at night I went my selfe to the Island to seeke him, but could heare nothing of him.

The 24 day the Master of the Tyger came aboord vs, & tolde vs that his men were so weake, and the shippe so leake, that he was not able to keepe her aboute the water, and therefore requested vs to go backe againe to the Island, that we might discharge her, and giue her vp: but we intreated him to take paine with her a while, and we put a French Carpenter into her, to see if he could finde the leake. This day we tooke a view of all our men, both those that were hole, and the sicke also, and we found that in all the three ships, were not aboute thirty sound men.

The 25 we had sight of the Ile of S. Nicholas, and the day following, of the other Iles, S. Lucia, S. Vincent, and S. Anthony; which foure Iles lie the one from the other Northwest and by West, Southeast and by East.

The 26 we came againe with the Island of S. Anthony, and could not double the Cape. This day Philip Iones, the Master of the Christopher, came aboord vs, who had bene aboord the Tyger, and tolde vs that they were not able to keepe the Tyger, because she was leake, and the Master very weake, and sayd further, he had agreed with the Master and the company, that if the next day we could double the Island, we should runne to the leeward of it, and there discharge her: but if we could not double it, then to put in betwixt the Island of S. Vincent and S. Anthony, to see if we could discharge her.

The third day of September I went aboord the Tyger, with the Master and marchants with me, to view the shippe and men: and we found the shippe very leake, and onely six labouring men in her, whereof one was the Master gunner: so that we seeing that they were not able to keepe the ship, agreed to take in the men, and of the goods what we could saue, and then to put the ship away.

The fift day we went to discharge the Tyger.

The eight day, hauing taken out the artillery, goods, victuals, and gold of the Tyger, we gaue her vp 25 degrees by North line.

The Tyger given vp.

The 27 we had sight of two of the Iles of the Azores, S. Mary, and S. Michael.

The fourth of October we found our selues to be 41 degrees and a halfe from the line.

The first day the Christopher came to vs, and willed vs to put with the Cape, for they also were so weake, that they were not able to keepe the sea, and we being weake also, agreed to goe for Vigo, being a place which many English men frequent.

The 10 day the Christopher went toorne with the Cape, but we hauing a merry wind for England, and fearing the danger of the enemies, which ordinarily lie about the Cape: besides, not knowing the state of our countrey and Spaine, and although it were peace, yet there was little hope of friendship at their hands, considering the voyage that we had made, and we also being so weake, that by force and violence we could come by nothing, and doubting also that the King of Portugall knowing of our being there, might worke some way with the Councell of Spaine to trouble vs: and further, considering that if we did put in with any harbor, we should not be able to come out againe, till we sent for more men into England, which would be a great charge, and losse of time, and meanes of many dangers. All these things pondered, we agreed to shoor off two pieces of ordnance, to warne the Christopher, and then we went our course for England: she hearing our pieces followed vs, and we carried a light for her, but the next day in the morning it was thicke, and we could not see her in the afternoone neither, so that we suspected that either she was gone with Spaine, or els that she should put forth more sailes then we in the night, and was shot a head of vs, so that then we put forth our top-sailes, and went our course with England.

At the time when the Christopher left vs, we were within 120 leagues of England, and 45 leagues Northwest and by West from Cape Finister: and at the same time in our ships we had not aboute sixe Mariners and sixe Marchants in health, which was but a weake company for such a ship to seeke a frozen harbour.

The 16 day, about sixe of the clocke at night, we met with a great storme at the West-south-west, & West, and our men being weake, and not able to handle our sailes, we lost the same night our maine saile, fore saile, and spere saile, & were forced to lie a hulling, vntill the eighteenth day, and then we made ready another course of a fore saile, and put it to the yard, and therewith finding our selues far thor into the fleene, we bare with our owne coast; but that foresaile continued not aboute two houres, befoze it was blowen from the yard with a great, and then we were forced to lie a hull againe, untill the nineteenth day of October in the morning, and then we put an olde bonnet to our foreyard, which, by the good blessing and prouidence of God, brought vs to the Ile of Wight, where we arrived the 20 of October in the afternoone.

A letter of M. John Lok to the worshipfull company of Marchants aduenturers for Guinie, written 1561, shewing reasons for his not proceeding in a voyage then intended to the foresayd country.

Worshipfull sirs; Since the arrivall of M. Pet and Buttoll Monioy (as I vnderstand) for the voyage it is concluded that the Minion shall proceed on her voyage, if within 20 dayes she may be repaired of those hurts she hath received by the last storme: or in the moneth of January also, if the wind wil serue therfore. Wherefore for that your worshipps shall not be ignorant of my determined purpose in the same, with the reasons that haue perswaded me thereminto; I haue thought good to aduertise you thereof, trusting that your worshipps will weigh them, as I by rightly and plainly meane them. And not for any feare or discouragement that I haue of my selfe by the raging of the stormes of the sea, for that (I thanke the Lord) these haue not bene the first that I haue abiden, neither trust I they shalbe the last. First the state of the ship, in which, though I thinke not but M. Pet can do moze for her strengthening then I can conceiue, yet for all that, it will neither mend her conditions, nor yet make her so staunch that any cabin in her shalbe staunch for men to lie drie in: the which foze, what a weakening it will be to the poore men after their labour, that they neither can haue a shift of apparell drie, nor yet a drie place to rest in, I referre to your discretion. For though that at Harwich she was both bound and caulked as much as might be, both within and without, yet for all that she left not, afoze this slaw, in other weathers, being stressed, to open those seamcs, and become in the state she was befoze; I meane, in wetting her men: notwithstanding her new worke. And my iudgement; with that little experience I haue had, leadech me to thinke that the ship whose water wopks and footings be spent and rotten cannot be but leake for men. Next, the vnseasonable time of the yere which is now present. And how onely by meanes of the vnseasonable times in the returne from the voyage home, many therby haue decayed, to the great misery and calamity of the rest, and also to the great slander of the voyage (which I much respect) the last and other voyages haue declared. And what it is to make the voyage in vnseasonable time, that hath the second voyage also declared. Wherefore weying and fozefering this (as I may wel terme it) calamity and vneuitable danger of men; and that by men she must be brought home againe (except that God will shew an extraordinary miracle) I purpose not nor dare I venture with a safe conscience to tempt God herein. Againe, forsomuch as she is alone, and hath so little helpe of boat or pinnesse in her trade, & also for her watering, where a long time of foze must be spent, my going, to the accomplishment of your expectations, will be to small effect for this time, because I shall want both vessel and men to accomplish it. And I would not gladly so spend my time and traueil, to my great charges and paine, and after, for not falling out accordingly, to lose both pot and water, as the proverbe is. As for the Primrose, if she be there, her trade will be ended or euer we come there, so that she of foze, by want of pposition, must returne: yea, though we should carrey with vs a supply for her, yet is the meeting of her doubtful, and though we met her, yet will the men not carrey, as no reason is they should: howbeit my opinion of her is that she is put into Ireland. The Flowerdeluce was in Milford. Thus for that your worshipps might vnderstand the whole cause why I doe not proceed, I haue troubled you at this time with this my long Letter. And, as God is my Iudge, not for feare of the Portugals, which there we shall meet (and yet alone without ayde) as here is a shippe which was in Lisbon, whose men say that there are in a readinesse (onely to meet vs) foure great shipps, of the which one is accounted 700 tunnes, & other pinnesses: yet not for feare of them, nor raging of the seas (whose rage God is aboueto rule) but onely for the premices: the sequell whereof must by reason turne to a great misery to the men; the which I for my part (though it might turne me to as much gaine as the whole commeth to) yet would I not be so tormented, as the sight thereof would be a cosse to my heart, and the more, because foreseeing the same, I should be so lew, as yielding, to haue runne into the danger thereof, and therefore I haue absolutely determined with my selfe not to goe this voyage. Howbeit if in a seasonable time of the yeere I had but one ship sufficient, though much lesse by the halfe, I would not refuse (as triall being made thereof should appeare) or if I had ability of my selfe to venture so much, it should well be scene. And this I speake to giue you to vnderstand that I refuse not this for feare: If you purpose to proceed heerein, send some one whom you please; to whom I will not onely deliver the articles which I haue receiued, but also will giue some particular notes which I haue noted in the affaires which you haue committed vnto mee, with the best helpe and counsell I can. Thus the liuing God keepe your worships all. Bristol this 11 of December 1561.

Your worships to command to his power

John Lok.

The relation of one William Rutter to M. Antony Hickman his master touching a voyage set out to Guinea in the yeere 1562, by Sir William Gerard, Sir William Chester, M. Thomas Lodge, the sayd Antony Hickman, and Edward Castelin: which voyage is also written in verse by Robert Baker.

Worshipfull sir, my duty remembred, this shalbe to declare vnto you the discourse of this our voyage, since our departure out of England from Dartmouth; at which time I gaue you to vnderstand of our departure, which was the 25 of February 1562. Then hauing a prosperous winde we departed from thence, and sailed on our voyage vntill we arrived at Cauo verde the 20 of March, making no abode there, but sailed along the coast to our first appointed port Rio de Sestos, at which port we arrived the third of Aprill in the morning, hauing the sight of a Frenchman, who as soone as he perceiued vs, set saile and made to the sea: in the meane time we came to an anker in the rode: and after that he had espied our flag, perceiuing vs to be Englishmen, he bare with the shore, & hailed our ships with his ordinaunce, at which time we the merchants of both the ships were in the riuier in traffike, and had vnderstanding of the Negroes that he had bene there three dayes before our comming: so we concluded together, that if he sent his pinnelle to traffike, we would not suffer him, vntill we had taken further order with their captaine & marchants. In the afternoone the pinnelle came into the riuier, whose men we willed to make no traffike vntill we had talked further with their captaine, whom we willed that night to come aboard our admirall; which was done. At which sayd time M. Burton and Iohn Munc went aboard the Minion where the Frenchmen were, & there concluded that they should tary by vs eight dayes, and suffer vs quietly to traffike, where with they were not well pleased. Whereupon the next morning they departed from vs, sailing alongst the coast to the Eastward towards Poris, which he did to hinder our traffike that way: wherefore the marchants of the Minion & we concluded (forasmuch as at that present we vnderstode that there were no sailes past alongst) that we should go before, to the end we might not be hindered of our traffike by the Frenchmen; which thing we did: and at our comming thither we found the Frenchman in traffike to the West of Poris, by whom we passed, & arrived at Rio de Poris the 12 of Aprill, where we remained in traffike vntill the 15 of the sayd moneth, and then departed from thence along the coast toward Sanct Andre, where we appointed by agreement to tary for the Minion: and the 17 at night we came to the riuier of S. Andre; in which very day the Minion came vnto vs, telling vs that they met at cauo das Palmas a great ship and a caruell of the king of Portugals bound to the Mina, who gaue chase vnto them, and shot freely at them, and the Minion in her defence returned her the like: but God be praised the Minion had no hurt for that time. In the end we concluded to hasten towards cauo de tres puntas, to haue put them from the castle, if by any meanes wee might; and when wee were come to the Cape, we lay a hull one night and two dayes, and doubting they had bene past, the Minion went neere the shore, and sent her merchants to a place called Antea, where before time we had traffike, and the next morning very early being the 21 of the sayd moneth, we againe had sight of the ship and the caruell a good way to sea-board of vs. Then we presently set saile, and bare with the foremost of them, hoping to haue got betweene the castle and them, but we came short of our purpose, which was no small grieue vnto vs all; and when they had gotten the castle to friend, they shot at vs freely, and we at them, and the castle at vs; but we profited little. In the afternoone we set saile & came to the town of Don Juan called Equi, where the 22 in the morning we went a shore to traffike, but the Negroes would not vntill they had newes from Don Luis, for at that time Don Iuan was dead, and the 23 came Don Luis his sonne and Pacheco minding to traffike with vs, at which said day came two gales rowing along the shore from the castle, minding to keepe vs from our traffike. The 24 we set saile and chased the gales to the castle againe, The Negros being glad of that required vs to goe to Mowre, which is some 3 leagues behind, and thither would they come for that they stood in feare of the Portugals, and there we remained for the merchants that came out of the countrey which were come with their gold, but Anthonio don Luis his sonne, and Pacheco were aboord the Minion. And the 25 in the morning came the two gales from the castle againe vnto vs, the weather being very calme, they shot at vs and hit vs 3 times, and shortly after the wind came from the shore, at which instant we discried the ship, & the carauell coming towards vs, then we weighed and set saile, and bare as neere vnto them as we could: but it was night or euer wee met with them, and the night being very darke we lost them. The next day plying to the shore, at night we agreed to go with Cormantin, but the next morning being the 28 we were but a litle distant from the great ship and the 2 gales, hauing no wind at all, and the carauell hard aboord the shore. Then being calme, came the 2 gales rowing to the sterne of the Minion, and fought with her the most part of the forenoone: and in the sight a mischance hapned in the Minions steward-roume by means of a barrell of powder that tooke fire, where with were hurt the master gunner, the steward, and most part of the gunners; which the gales perceiving, began to be more fierce vpon them, and with one shot cut halfe her foremast in twaine, that without present remedie shee was not able to beare saile, and presently vpon this the great ship sent her boat to the gales, who suddenly departed from vs. And after their departure we went aboord the Minion to counsell what were best to be done, at which time they were fore discomfited. Whereupon we deuised what was best to be done: and because wee knew that the Negros neither would nor durst traffike so long as the gales were on the coast; it was therefore agreed that we should prepare our selues to depart to Rio de Sestos, and so we departed that day. The 14 of May in the morning we fell with the land, and when wee came to it, we doubted what place it was, and sent our boates on land to know the truth, and we found it to be Rio de Barbos, which is to the Eastward of sant Andre, and there remained in getting of water untill the 21, where we lost the day before 5 of our men by meanes of ouerthrowing our blacke pinnasse. The 22 we departed from thence to Rio de Sesto, where we arriued the 2 of Iune, and the 4 wee departed from Rio de Sesto, and arriued (God bee thanked) the 6 of August within sight of the Stert in the West part of England, our men being very sicke and weake. We haue not at this present about 20 sound men that are able to labour, and we haue of our men 21 dead, and many more very sore hurt and sicke. Master Burton hath bene sicke this 6 weekes, and at this present (God strengthen him) is so weake that I feare he will hardly escape. Herein inclosed your worship shall receive a briefe of all the goods sold by vs, & also what commodities we haue receiued for the same. Thus I leaue to trouble your worship, reseruing all things else to our generall meeting, and to the bringer hercof. From aboord the Minion the 6 of August 1563.

A meeting at Sir William Gerards house the 11 of Iuly 1564. for the setting foorth of a voyage to Guinea, with the Minion of the Queens, the Iohn Baptist of London, and the Merline of M. Gonson.

This meeting were these chiefe aduenturers, Sir William Gerard, sir William Chetter, sir Thomas Lodge, Anthonie Hickman, and Edward Castelin. Where it was agreed that Francis Ashbie should be sent to Depford to M. Gonson for his letters to Peter Per to goe about the rigging of the Minion vpon the Queens maiesties charges, and so the said Francis to repaire with the same letters to Gillingham with money to supplie our charge there.

Also that euery one of the five partners shall forthwith call vpon their partners to supply towards this new rigging and victualling, 29 li. 10 s. 6 d. for euery 100 li. value.

Also that euery one of the five partners shall forthwith bring in 50 li. towards the furniture of the premisses.

Likewise it is agreed that if M. Gonson giue his consent that the Merline shall be brought about from Brisoll to Hampton, that a letter be drawn whereunto his hand shall be, before order be giuen for the same.

The successe of this Voiage in part appeareth by certaine briefe relations extracted out of the second voyage of Sir Iohn Hawkins to the West Indies, made in the sayd yeere 1564. which I thought good to set downe for want of further instructions; which hitherto I could not by any meanes come by, albeitt I haue vsed all possible indenuour for the obtaining of the same: Take them therefore in the meane season as foloweth.

After Iohn Hawkins, with the Iesus of Lubeck a ship of 700. tunnes, and the Salomon, a ship of 700. the Tiger a barke of 50, and the Swallow of 30 tunnes, being all well furnished with men to the number of one hundred threescore and ten, as also with ordnance and victuall requisite for such a voyage, departed out of Plimmouth the 18 day of October in the yeere of our Lord 1564. with a prosperous winde: at which departing, in cutting the foresaile, a marueilous misfortune happened to one of the officers in the ship, who by the pullic of the heat was slaine out of hand being a sorrowfull beginning to them all. And after their setting out 10 leagues to the Sea, hee met the same day with the Pinion a ship of the Queens Maiesties, wherof was captaine David Carlet, & also her consort the Iohn Baptist of London bring bound to Guinea like wise, who hailed one the other after the custome of the sea, with certaine pieces of ordnance for ioy of their meeting: which done, the Pinion departed from him to seeke her other consort the Merline of London, which was a sterne out of sight, leaving in M. Hawkins companie the Iohn Baptist her other consort.

The Pinion
of the Queene.

Thus sailing forwarde on their way with a prosperous wind until the 21 of the same moneth, at that time a great storme arose, the wind being at North-east about 9 of the clocke at night, and continued to 23 houres together, in which storme M. Hawkins lost the company of the Iohn Baptist aforesaid, and of his pinasse called the Swallow, the other 3 ships being soze beate with the storme. The 23 day the Swallow, to his no small reioicing, came to him againe in the night 10 leagues to the Northward of Cape Finister, having put roomer and not being able to double the Cape, in that there rose a contrary wind at South-west. The 25 the wind continuing contrary, he put into a place in Galicia called Ferol, where he remained 5 daies and appointed all the masters of his ships an order for the keeping of good company.

The 26 day the Pinion came in also where he was, for the reioicing whereof he gaue them certaine pieces of ordnance after the currellie of the Sea for their welcome, but the Pinions men had no mirth because of their consort the Merline, who at their departure from M. Hawkins vpon the coast of England, they went to seeke, and having met with her, kept company two dayes together, and at last by misfortune of fire (though the negligence of one of the gunners) the powder in the gunners room was set on fire, which with the first blast stroke out her poope, and therewithall lost 3 men, besides many soze burned (which escaped by the Brigandine being at her sterne) and immediately to the great losse of the owners, and most horrible sight of the beholders, the sunke before their eyes. The 30 day of the moneth M. Hawkins with his consorts and company of the Pinion having now both the Brigandines at her sterne, weighed anchor, and set saile on their voyage having a prosperous wind thereunto. The 4 of November they had sight of the Island of Madeira, and the 6 day of Teneriffa, which they thought to haue bene the Canarie, in that they supposed themselves to haue bene to the Eastward of Teneriffa but were not: but the Pinion being 3 or 4 leagues a head of vs kept on her course to Teneriffa, having better sight thereof then the other had, and by that means they parted company.

The firing and sinking of the

for Guinea.

The aforesaid Sir Iohn Hawkins passing on his voyage by Caño Verde, and Sierra Leona, and afterwarde crossing ouer the maine Decan comming to the towne of Burboroara vpon the coast of Terra firma in the West Indies, had further information of the euill successe of this Guinean voyage, as in the same hereafter is verbatim mentioned.

The 29 of April, we being at anker without the road, a French ship called the green Dragon of Newhauen, wherof was captaine one Bon Temps came in, who saluted vs after the maner of the sea, with certaine pieces of ordnance, and we returned him with the like againe: with whom having communication, he declared that hee had bene at the Mina in Guinea, and was beaten off by the Portugals gallies, and enforced to come thither to make sale of such wares as he had: and further that the like was hapned vnto the Pinion: also, that captaine David Carlet, & a merchant, with a dozen mariners were betrayed by the Negros at their first arrivall thither, remaining prisoners with the Portugals, besides other misadventures of the losse of their men hapned through the great lacke of fresh water, with great doubts of bringing home the ships: which was most sorrowfull for vs to vnderstand.

The

The voyage of M. George Fenner to Guinie, and the Islands of Cape Verde, in the yeere 1566. with three ships, to wit, the Admirall called The Castle of Comfort, the May Flower, and the George, and a Pinnasse also:

Written by Walter Wren.

The 10 day of December, in the yeere abovesayd, we departed from Plimmouth, and the 12 day we were thwart of Ushant.

The 15 day in the morning being Sunday, we had sight of Cape Finister, and the same night we lost the company of our Admirall, wherefore we sailed along the coast of Portugall, hoping that our Admirall had bene before vs.

The 18 day we met with a French ship of whom we made inquirie for our Admirall, but he could not tell vs newes of him: so we followed our course to the Islands of the Canaries.

The 25 day in the morning we fell with a small Island called Porto Santo, & within 3 houres we had sight of another Island called Madera, which is 6 leagues from Porto Santo.

The said 25 day being the day of the Nativitee, we hoised out our boat, and set master Edward Fenner captain of the May flower aboard vs, bring in the George, with the master whose name was Robert Courise and others of the sayd shippe, and feasted them with such cheere as God had sent vs.

The 28 day we fel with an Island called Tenerif, which is 27 leagues from the said Island, and on the East side thereof we came to an anchor in 40 fadome water, within a bafe shot of the shoze, in a little Baie wherein were 3 or 4 small houses: which Baie and houses were distant from a little towne called Santa Cruz, a league or thereabout, and as we rode in the said Baie, we might see an Island called The grand Canarie which was 6 or 7 leagues from vs.

The 29 day the May flower for that she could not fet into y^e road where we were at an anchor, by reason the wind was off the shoze, & because she bare more roomer frō the land then we did, in the morning came bearing in with the towne of Santa Cruz, thinking to come to an anchor in the road against the towne, and before she came within the reach of any of their ordinance, they shot at her foure pieces, which caused her to come toome with vs, and came at last to an anchor by vs. And about one of the clocke in the after noone, the fozenamed captain of the May flower wrote a letter a shoze, directing it to the head officer of the towne of Santa Cruz, to the intent to understand the pretence of the shooting off the said ordinance.

The letter being written, Robert Courise master of the May flower, and Walter Wren were appointed to deliuer the same a land at 3 or 4 houses to bee conuered to the foresayd towne, and so went with six men in the boate, and rowed to the shoze as neere as they might, for letting the boat on ground, for the sea went cruelly at the shoze.

The people stood in number 30 persons with such armour as they had: the foze sayd Wren called to them in Spanish, declaring to the that they had a letter which they would very gladly haue conuered vnto the towne, shewing that they would traffique with them as marchants, desiring their helpe for the conuenance of the same letter. With that one of the Spaniards willed vs to come on land, and we should be welcome, but doubting the worst, the said Walter answered them that they would not come on land, until they had answer of their letter which they had brought.

Whereupon one of the Spaniards vntaied himselfe, and lept into the water, and swam to the boat, whom we receiued. And he saluted vs, and demaunded what our request was: we made him answer, that by misfortune we lost the companie of our Admirall, and being bound to this Island to traffique for wines and other things necessary for vs, do here mind to stay until he come.

Concerning our letter he made vs answer, that he would with all diligence cary it, and deliuer it according to the direction, and so the said Walter knit the letter in a bladder, and deliuered it vnto him, and also gaue him foure coials of Spanish money for his paines: and promising that we should haue answer of it, heooke his leaue and swamme againe on shoze, where the people stood ready to receiue him. And after that they had talked with him, and understood our meaning, some of them threw by their hats, & the other put them off holding them in their hands, and made vs very courteous signes, alwaies desiring that the boat would come a land, but we resaluting them rowed backe againe aboard.

The 30 day the Gouernours Brother of Santa Cruz came aboard the May flower with five or seneen Spaniards with him, who concluded with the Captaine that we might come a shoze and traffique with them, but that day we did not, for we had no sufficient pledge of theirs for our assurance. Our Captaine entertained them well, and at their departure gaue them foure pieces of ordinance dinance for a fare well, and bestowed vpon them two cheeses with other things.

The sayd Gouvernours brother promised our Captaine that hee should haue sufficient pledges the morrow folowing, which was not done, whereupon wee grew suspicious, and went not that day a shoze.

The first day of January our captaine sent Nicholas Day and Iohn Sumpter a shoze, who were very well entertained with as many of our company as went after them.

In the said Island is a marvellous high hill called the Pike, which is a far off more like a cloud in the aire, then any other thing: the hill is round and somewhat small at the top, it hath not bene knownen that euer any man could goe by to the top thereof. And although it stand in 28 degrees which is as hote in January, as it is in England at Midsummer, yet is the top of the said hill Winter and Sommer seloome without snow.

In this Island about two leagues from the said Santa Cruz is a citie called Anagona.

The thir day wee departed about the Western point of the Island, about 12 or 14 leagues from Santa Cruz, into a Baie which is right agaynst the house of one Petro de Soules, in which Baie we came to an anker the 5 day, where we heard that our Admirall had bene there at an anker 7 dayes before vs, and was gone thence to an Island called Gomera, whereupon wee set saile presently to seeke him.

They meet their Admirall againe.

The 6 day we came to an anker against the towne of Gomera, where we found our Admirall, which was very ioyfull of our comming, and we also of his sight.

In the sayd road we found Edward Cooke in a tall ship, and a shippe of the Copperminits of London, which the Portugals had treacherously surprisid in the Baie of Santa Cruz, vpon the coast of Barbarie, which ship we left there all spoiled.

Our Generall & marchants bought in the said towne for our prouision, 14 butts of wine, which cost 15 duckats a butt, which were offered vs at Santa Cruz in Teneriff for 8, 9, and 10 duckats.

The 9 day we departed from this road to another Baie, about 3 leagues off, and there tooke in fresh water: & so the 10 day we set saile towards Cape Blanke, which is on the coast of Guinea.

The 12 day we fell into a Baie to the Eastward of Cape Pargos, which is 35 leagues from Cape Blanke. But hauing no knowledge of that coast, we went with Cape Blanke, and at the fall of the land we sounded and had 16 fadome water two leagues from the shoze. The land is very lowe and white sand. Upon the fall of the sayd coast beware how you bozow in 12 or 10 fadome, for within 2 or 3 castes of the lead you may be on ground.

Cape Verde.

The 17 day we set saile from Cape Blanke, directing our course South and by East, & South among, and so fell into a Baie to the Eastward of Cape Verde, about 16 leagues, and about five leagues from the shoze. The sayd land seemed vnto vs as if it had bene a great number of shippes vnder saile, being in deed nothing els but the land which was full of Hammocks, some high some lowe, with high trees on them. We bare with the said land till we were within 3 leagues of the shoze, and then we sounded, and found 28 fadome water, blacke oase. This day we saw much fish in stumpy sculls swimming with their noses with the bym of the water.

Passing along this coast we might see two small round hills, seeming to vs about a league one from the other, which is the Cape, and betweene them are great shoze of trees, and in all our dayes sailing we saw no land so high as the said two hills.

The foolish

pany to land unarmed.

The 19 day we came to an anker at the Cape, in a roade fast by the Westernmost side of two hills in 10 fadome of water, where you may ride in five or six fadome, for the ground is faire, and alwayes you shall haue the winde off the shoze. And as soone as we were all at an anker, our Generall came aboord vs, and with him the master of the Admirall, whose name was William Bats, and with them the captaine of the Viceadmirall, whose name was master Edward Fenner, and Robert Curisfe the master, and dined aboord of vs being in the George, wherein was Captaine Iohn Heiwood, and Iohn Smith of Hampton master, and there we concluded to goe aland, which was halfe a mile from vs: and by the counsell of William Bats both Captaine and marchants and diuers of the companie went without armour: for he sayd, that although the people were blacke and naked, yet they were ciuill: so that hee would needs giue the venter without the consent of the rest to go without weapon. Thus they rowed to shoze, where, we being in the shippe might see a great companie of Negroes naked, walking to and fro by the sea side where the landing place was, waiting for the comming of our men, who came too soone, and landed to their losse as it fell out afterwards.

There went a shoze the Admirals skiffe, and the May Flowers boate, and in them the number of 20 persons or thereabouts, as M. George Fenner the Generall, his brother M. Edward Fenner, Thomas Valentine, Iohn Worme and Francis Leigh marchants, Iohn Haward, William Bats, Nicholas Day, Iohn Tomson and others.

At their coming to the shoze there were 100 Negroes or vpward, with their bowes and arrows: our Capitaines and merchants talked with them, & according to the vse of the country, the one demanded pledges of the other, & they were content to deliuer 3 of their Negroes for 5 of our men. Our 5 mens names were these, John Haward, Wil. Bats, Nich. Day, Ioh. Tomson, & Iohn Currie: these were deliuered them, and we received 3 Negroes into our Admirals Skiffe.

Our men being a shoze among the Negroes, began to talke with them, declaring what ware and marchandize we had, as woollen cloth, linnen cloth, iron, cheese & other things. The Negroes answered againe, they had euier, muske, gold and graines, which pleased our capitaines and merchants very well. Then the Negroes desired to haue a sight of some of our wares, to the which our marchants were content, and forthwith sent aboord one of the boats for part of their marchandise, and in the meane time while the boate went to the ship, our five men were walking on the shoze with the Negroes, and our Generall and marchants staid in the other boat by the sea side, hauing the 3 Negroes with them.

Our boate then came againe and brought iron and other marchandize, with bread, wine, and cheese which they gaue vnto them. Then two of the Negroes (which were the pledges) made themselves sicke, desiring to goe a shoze, promising to send other two for them. Captaine Haward perceiving that our men had let the Negroes come a shoze, asked what they meant, and doubting the worst began to drawe toward the boate, and two of three of the Negroes folowed him. And when hee came to the boate they began to stay him, and he made signes vnto them that hee would fetch them more drinke and bread: notwithstanding, when he was enterin into the boate, one of them caught him by the breeches and would haue staid him, but hee sprang from him and leapt into the boate, and as soone as hee was in, one of the Negroes a shoze beganne to blow a pipe, and presently the other Negro that was in our boate sitting on the boates side, and master Wormes swoze by him, suddenly drew the sword out of the scabbard, and cast himselfe into the Sea and swamme a shoze, and presently the Negroes laied handes on our men that were on shoze, and tooke three of them with great violence, and toze all their apparell from their backes and left them nothing to couer them, and many of them shot so thicke at our men in our boates, that they could scarce set hand to any Dare to rowe from the shoze, yet (by the helpe of God) they got from them with their boates, although many of them were hurt with their poisoned arrowes: and the poison is vncurable, if the arrow enter within the skin and drawe blood, and except the poison bee presently sucked out, or the place where any man is hurt bee soozthwith cut away, hee dieth within foure dayes; and within three houres after they bee hurt or pricked, wheresoeuer it be, although but at the little toe, yet it striketh vp to the heart, and taketh away the stomacke, and causeth the partie maruellously to vomite, being able to brooke neither meat nor drinke.

The Negroes hauing vsed our men with such cruelty, whose names were Nicholas Day, William Bats, and Iohn Tomson, led them away to a towne which was within a mile of the water side, or thereabout.

The 20 day we sent to land a boate of skiffe wherein were eight persons, and one of them was the foresayd Iohn Tomson and our interpreter which was a Frenchman, (for there was one of the Negroes which spake good French:) and they caried with them two harquebusses, two car-goes and a mantell.

The cause of sending them was to learne what ranfome they demanded for Bats and Day whom they detained. And when they came to the shoze and told the Negroes what they desired, they went and fetched them from among the trees, and brought them loose among fortie or fiftie of them. And being come within a stones cast of the sea side, William Bats brake from them, and ran as fast as he could into the sea towards the boat, and he was not so soon in the water but hee fell downe, either being out of breath or his foote sailing him in the sand being soft: so that the Negroes came and fell on him and tooke him and haled him, that we thought they had toze him in pieces: for they toze againe all the apparell from his backe, so that some of them caried our men againe to the towne, and the rest shot at vs with their poisoned arrowes, and hurt one of our men called Androwes in the smal of the leg, who being come aboord, (for al that our Surgeons could do) we thought he would haue died.

Our Generall (notwithstanding all this villanie) sent agayne to them, and offered them anything that they desired for the ranfome of our men, but they would not deliuer them: giuing vs this answer: That there was in the foresayd roade, three weekes before wee came, an English shippe which had taken three of their people, and vntill wee did bring or send them againe, wee should not haue our men although wee would giue our three shippes with their furniture.

Euier, muske, gold & graine, the commodities lies of Cape Verde.

The Negroes interpreter.

30 French his interpreter for Cape Verde.

The danger of poisoned arrowes.

The answer of the Negroes.

The 21 day a French shippe of the burden of 80 tunnes (or thereabouts,) came to the place where we were, being bound to traffique at the Cape: we told them of the detaining of our two men by the Negros: and seeing that these Frenchmen were very well welcome to the Negros, we wished them to see whether they could procure them againe of the Negros, and bring them along with them, and our Generall promised the Frenchmen 100 li. to obtaine them. So wee committed the matter to the Frenchmen and departed.

Of our men that were hurt by the Negros arrowes, foure died, and one to saue his life had his arme cut off. Androwes that was last of all hurt, lay lame not able to helpe himselfe: onely two recovered of their hurts. So we placed other men in the roomes of those that we lost, and set saile.

The 26 day betweene Cape Verde and Bona vista we sawe many flying fishes of the bignesse of herrings, whereof two flew into our boat, which we towed at our sterne.

Bona vista.

The 28 day we fell with an Island called Bona vista, which is from Cape Verde 86 leagues. The Northside of the sayde Island is full of white sandie hills and dales, and somewhat high land.

The sayd day wee came to an anker within the Westermost point, about a league within the point, and found in our sounding faire sand in ten fadome water, but you may goe neere till you be in five or six fadome, for the ground is faire.

As soone as we were at an anker, our Generall sent his pinnasse a land, and found five or six small houses, but the people were fled into the mountains: and the next day he sent a shoz againe, and met with two Portugals, who willingly went aboard with his men; and at their comming he welcomed them, although they were but poore & simple, and gaue each of them a paire of shoes, and so set them a shoz againe.

At good aduision.

The 30 day we weighed & sailed into a Bay within a small Island about a league from vs, and tooke plentie of diuers sortes of fishe. The foresayd Island lieth in sixteene degrees. And if you meane to anker in the said Bay, you may bozow in foure or five fadome of the Southermost point of the sayd Island, which you may see when you ride in the road. But beware of the middle of the Baie, for there lieth a ledge of rocks, which at a lowe water breaketh, yet there is thre fadome water ouer them.

Banished Portugals.

The last day of Iannarie our Generall with certaine of his men went a shoz in the Baie to the houses, where he found 12 Portugals. In all the Island there were not aboue 30 persons, which were banished men for a time, some for more pecces, some for lesse, and amongst them there was one simple man which was their captaine.

They liue vpon goats flesh, cocks, hennes, and fresh water: other victuals they haue none, sauing fish, which they esteeme not, neither haue they any boats to take them.

Great store of goats.

They reported that this Island was giuen by the king of Portugall to one of his gentlemen, who hath let it forth to rent for one hundred duckats a yeere, which rent is reared onely in goats skinner. For by their speaches there hath bene sent forth of the sayd Island into Portugall 40000 skins in one yeere.

We were to these men maruailously welcome, and to their powers very wel entertained, and they gaue vs the flesh of as many hee-goates as wee would haue, and cooke much paines for vs in taking them, and bringing them from the mountains vpon their asses.

They haue there great store of the oyle of Tortoises, which Tortoise is a fish which swimmeth in the Sea, with a shell on his backe as broad as a target. It raineth not in this Island but in thre moneths of the yeere, from the midst of Iuly to the midst of October, and it is here alwayes very hote. Wine haue bene brought hither, but by reason of the heate and brought they haue died.

The Ile of Maiyo.

The 3 of February wee departed from this Island, and the same day fell with another Island called the Island of Maiyo, which is 14 leagues from the other Island: there is in the midst of the way between these two Islands a danger which is alwayes to be seene.

S. Iago.

We ankred in the Northwest side of the sayd Ile in a faire Baie of eight fadomes water and faire sand, but here we staid not, but the fourth day weighed and sailed to another Island called S. Iago, which lieth off the said Island of Maiyo East and by South, and about five leagues one from the other. Being come within the Westermost point, we saw a faire road, and a small towne by the water side, and also a fort or platfome by it: there we purposed to come to anker, and our marchants to make some sale. But before we came within their shot, they let flie at vs two pieces, whereupon we went roomer and sailed along the shoz two or thre leagues from the road, where we found a small Baie and two or thre small houses, where we came to an anker in 14 fadome faire ground.

Within

Which an houre after we had ankered we might see diuers hoysmen and footmen on the land right against vs riding and running to and fro.

The next day being the first of Februarie, a great companie of their hoysmen and footmen appeared on the shoare side, vnto whom our Generall sent to vnderstande whether they would quietly trafike with them: And they sent him worde againe, desiring that they might speake with him, promising that if he came to trafike as a marchant he should be welcome, and also that he should haue any thing that he of the marchant would with reason demaund.

When this answer was brought vnto our Generall he was very glad thereof and the whole companie, and presently (with as much speede as he could) he caused his boates to be made ready: but doubting the villanie of the Portugales, he armed his boates putting a double bace in the head of his pinnesse, and two single baces in the head of the Skiffe, and so sent to the May-floure and the George, and willed them in like sort to man their two boates.

These boates being thus manned and well appointed, our Generall entered into his Skiffe, and with the rest rowed to the shoare where were threescore hoysmen or more, and two hundredth footmen ready to receiue them. Our Generall marvelled that they came in so great a number and all armed, and therefore with a flagge of truce sent to them to knowe their pleasure: and they answered him with many faire promises and othes, that their pretence was all true, and that they meant like Gentlemen and Marchantes to trafike with him, declaring also that their Captaine was comming to speake with him; and therefore desired our Generall to come and speake with him himselfe.

With this answer the boate returned, and then our Generall caused his pinnesse to rowe to them, and as he came neere the shoare they came in a great companie with much obeyssance, opening their hands and armes abroade, bowing themselves with their bonnets off, with as much humble salutations outwardly as they might: earnestly desiring our Generall and Marchants to come on lande to them, whereunto he would not agree without sufficient gages of Gentlemen and Marchants. At length they promised to sende two gages to our Generalls contentment, promising fresh water, victuall, money, or Negroes for ware, if it were such as they liked: and therefore desired our Generall and Marchants to sende them a shoare in writing the quantitie of their wares, and the names of them: all which our Generall departed to performe, looking for their answer the morrowe following. And being gone a litle from the shoare, he caused his baces, curriers, and harquebusses to be shot off, and our ships in like case shot off sixe or seuen pieces of great ordnance, and so came aboord to prepare the note. The Portugales most of them departed, saving those that were left to watch and to receiue the note, which about foure or five a clocke in the afternoone was sent, and it was receiued. But all the purposes of the Portugals were villainously to betray vs (as shal appeare hereafter) although we meant in truth and honestie, friendly to trafike with them.

The treason of the Portugals in S. Iago to our men.

There was to the Westwards of vs and about two leagues from vs, a towne behinde a point fast by the sea side, where they had certaine Carauels or shippes and also two Brigandines, whereof they (with all the speede that they might) made ready foure Carauels, and both the brigandines which were like two Gallies, and furnished them both with men and ordnance as much as they could carrie, and as soone as it was night, they came rowing and sailing towarde vs: so that the land being high and the weather somewhat cloudie or mystie, and they comming all the way close vnder the shoare we could not see them till they were right against one of our ships called the May-floure.

By this time it was about one or two of the clocke in the morning, and the May-floure roade neerer them then the other two by a bace shotte, so that they made a sure account either to haue taken her or burnt her. In the meane time our men that had the watch (litle thinking of such villanous treacheries after so many faire wordes) were singing and playing one with the other, and made such a noyse, that (being but a small gale of winde, and riding neere the lande) they might heare vs from the shoare: so that we supposed that they made account that we had clyped them, which in deede we had not, neither had any one piece of ordnance primed, or any other thing in a readinesse.

They came so neere vs that they were within gunshot of vs, & then one of our men chanced to see a light, & then looking out spied the 4 ships, and suddenly cried out, Gallies, gallies, at which cry we were all amazed, and forthwith they shot at vs all the great ordnance that they had, and their harquebusses, and curriers, and so lighted certaine tronkes or pieces of wilde fire, and all of them with one voice (as well they on the shoare as they in the shippes) gaue a great shoute, and so continued hallowing with great noyses, still appoaching neerer and neerer vnto the May-floure. We (with all the speede that we might) made ready one piece of ordnance and shotte at them, which caused them somewhat to stay, so they charged their ordinance and shot at vs freshly againe, and while they shotte this second time at vs, we had made ready three pieces which we shot at them, but they approached still so nere, that at last we might haue shot a shafe arrowe to them. Whereupon we hauing a gale of winde off the shoare hysed our fore sayle, and cut our cable at the hawse, and went towarde our Admirall, and they continued following and shooting at vs, and sometime at our Admirall, but our Admirall shotte one such piece at them, that it made them to retire, and at length to warpe away like traiterous villaines, and although they thus suddenly shot all their shot at vs, yet they hurt neither man nor boy of ours, but what we did to them we know not.

The Isle of Fuego.

But seeing the villanie of these men we thought it best to stay there no longer, but immediatly set sayle to wards an Island called Fuego, 12 leagues from the said Island of S. Iago. At which Island of Fuego we came to an anker the 11 day of this moneth, against a white chappell in the West end of the sayd Island, within halfe a league of a litle towne, and within a league or thereabout of the uttermost point of the said Island.

In this Island is a maruelous high hill which doth burne continually, and the inhabitants reported that about three yeeres past the whole Island was like to be burned with the abundance of fire that came out of it.

Mill.

About a league from the said chappell to the Westward is a goodly spring of fresh water, where we had as much as we would. Wheate they haue none growing here, but a certaine seede that they call Mill, and certaine peason like Guinie peason, which Mill maketh good breade, but they haue here good store of rother beasts and goates. Their marchandize is cotton, which groweth there.

The inhabitants are Portugals which haue comendement from the king to trafike neither with Englishmen nor Frenchmen for victuall or any other thing, except they be forced so to doe.

The Isle of Braua.

There lieth off this Island another called Iha Braua, which is not passing two leagues ouer, it hath good store of goates and many trees, but there are not passing three or foure persons dwelling in it.

They returne
March.

The 25 day of February we departed towarde the Islands of Azores: and on the 23 day of March we had sight of one of them called Flores, and then wee might see another Island to the Northward of it called Cueruo, lying two leagues or thereabouts off the other.

The 27 we came to an anker in Cueruo ouer against a village of about twelue simple houses: but in the night by a gale of winde, which caused vs to drawe our anker after vs, we hysed sayle and went to the afore sayd Island of Flores, where we sawe strange streames of water running downe from the high cliffes by reason of the great abundance of raine that had suddenly fallen.

The 29 day we came againe to Cueruo and cast anker, but a storme arose and continued seuen or eight houres together, so that we let slip a cable and anker, and after the storme was alayed we came againe thinking to haue recouered the same, but the Portugals had either taken it, or spoiled it: the cable was new and neuer wet before, and both the cable and anker were better worth then 40 li. So that we accompt our selues much beholding to the honest Portugales.

April.

The 18 day of April we tooke in water at the Island of Flores, and hauing ankered, our cable was fretted in sunder with a rocke and so burst, where wee lost that cable and anker also, and so departed to our coast.

Then wee set sayle to an Islande named Faial, about the which lie three other Islands, the one called Pico, the other Saint George, and the other Graciosa, which we had sight of on the eight and twentieth day.

Woad.

May.

The 29 we came to an anker in the Southwest side of Faial in a faire bay, and 22 fadom water against a litle towne where we had both fresh water and fresh victuall. In this Island by the report of the inhabitants, there groweth certaine greene woad, which by their speeches is farre better then the woad of S. Michael or of Tercera.

A Portugall
400 runnes.

The 8 day of May we came to Tercera where we met with a Portugall ship, and being destitute of a cable and anker, our Generall caused vs to keepe her companie, to see if she could conveniently spare vs any. The next morning we might see bearing with vs a great shippe and two Carauels, which we iudged to be of the king of Portugals Armada, and so they were, whereupon we prepared our selues for our defence. The said ship was one of the kings Gallasses, about the burden of foure hundred runnes, with about three hundred men in her, the shippe being well appointed with brasse pieces both great and small, and some of them so bigge that their shot was as great as a mans head, the other two Carauels were also very warlike and well appointed both with men and munition.

As soone as they were within shoote of vs, they waied vs amaine with their swords, we keeping our course, the greatest shippe shot at vs freely and the carauell also, and we prepared our selues, and made all things cleare for our safegard as neere as we could. Then the great shippe shot at vs all her broad side, and her foure greatest peeces that lay in her sterne, and therewith hurt sonie of our men, and we did the best we could with our shot to requite it. At last two other Carauels came off the shoare, and two other pinnelles full of men, and deliuered them aboord the great shippe, and so went backe againe with two men in a peece of them. The ship and the Carauell gaue vs the first day thzee fights, and when the night was come they left off shooting, yet not withstanding kept hard by vs all the night. In the meane time we had as much as we could doe all the night to mende our ropes, and to strengthen our bulwarkes, putting our trust in God, and resoluing our selues rather to die in our defence then to bee taken by such wretches.

A fight betwene one English ship and 7 Portugals

The next day being the 10 of May in the morning, there were come to aide the said Portugals foure great Armadas of Carauels moze which made seuen, of which 4 thzee of them were at the least 100 tunnes a peece, the other not so bigge, but all well appointed and full of men. All these together came bearing with vs being in our Admirall, and one of the great Carauels came to lay vs aboord (as we iudged) for they had prepared their false meetings, and all things for that purpose, so that the Gallias came by in our starboord side, and the Carauell in our larboord side.

Our Captaine and Master perceiuing their pretence, caused our gunners to make all our ordnance readie with crossebarres, chaineshoote and hailehot: so the ship and Carauell came by, and as soone as they were right in our sides, they shotte at vs as much ordnance as they could, thinking to haue layde vs presently aboord: whereupon we gaue them such a heate with both our sides, that they were both glad to fall asterne of vs, & so paused the space of two or thzee houres being a very small gale of winde.

Then came by the other five and shot all at vs, and so fell all asterne of vs, & then went to edwellsell together.

Then our small barke named the George came to vs, and wee conferred together a great space. And as the Portugall Shippes and Carauels were comming to vs againe, our barke minding to fall asterne of vs and so to come by againe, fell quickly vpon the lee, and by reason of the litle winde, it was so long before she could fill her sailes againe, that both the shippe and Carauels were come by to vs, and she falling in among them made reasonable shift with them, but they got a head of her, so that she could not fetch vs: then 5 of the Carauels followed her, but we saw she defended her selfe against them all.

Then came the great shippe and the Carauell to vs, and fought with vs all that day with their ordnance.

The May-floure our other consort being very good by the winde, tooke the benefite thereof and halde all that day close by the winde; but could not come neere vs. So when night againe was come, they gaue ouer their fight and followed vs all the night.

In these many fights it coulde not other wise be but needes some of our men must be slaine, (as they were indeede) and diuers hurt, and our tackle much spoyled: yet for all this we did our best indoutour to repaire all things, and to stand to it to the death with our assured trust in the mercie and helpe of God.

This night the May-floure came by to vs, and our Captaine tolde them his harmes and spoyles, and wished them if they could spare halfe a dosen fresh men to hoyle out their boate and sende them to him, but they could not spare any, and so bare away againe. Which when our enemies sawe in the next morning that we were one from another, they came by to vs againe and gaue vs a great fight with much hallowing and hooping, making accompt either to boorde vs or els to sinke vs: but although our companie was but small, yet least they should see vs any whit dismayed, when they hallowed we hallowed also as fast as they, and waned to them to come and boorde vs if they durst, but that they would not, seeing vs still so couragious: and hauing giuen vs that day foure fights, at night they forooke vs with shame, as they came to vs at the first with pride.

The 7 Portugals depart with shame from one English ship.

They had made in our ship some leakes with their shot which we againe stopped with al speed, and that being done, we tooke some rest after our long labour and trouble.

The next day in the morning the May-floure came to vs, and brought vs fire men in her boate which did vs much pleasure, and we sent to them some of our hurt men.

Then we directed our course for our owne countrey, and by the second day of June we were neere to our owne coast and sounded being thwart the Lizard.

June.

The third day we had sight of a shippe which was a Portugall, who bare with vs, and at his comming comming to vs (the weather being calme) our Captaine caused him to hoys his boate to come aboord to speake with him, and at their comming our Captaine and Marchants demanded of them what ware they had, and whither they were bound, and they made answer that their lading was sugar and cotton. Then our Captaine and Marchants shewed them fine Negroes that we had, and asked them whether they would buy them, which they were very desirous to doe, and agreed to giue for them 40 chests of sugar, which chests were small hauing not aboue 26 loaves in a piece: so they with their boate did fetch fine of the chests and deliuered them and went for more, and when they had laden their boate and were come againe, we might see bearing with vs a great ship and a small, which our Captaine supposed to be men of warre or Rouers, and then willed the Portugales to carie their sugar to their ship againe, purposing to make our selues ready for our defence. But the Portugales earnestly intreated our Captaine not so to forsake them, and promised him (if he would safegard them) to giue him aboue the bargain ten chests of sugar: whereupon our Captaine was content, and the Portugall not being good of sayle, we spared our topsayles for her; so at last the foresaid ship bare with vs, and (seeing that we did not feare them) gaue vs ouer. And the next morning came two others bearing with vs, and seeing vs not about to flie a foot from them forooke vs also.

The 5 day of June we had sight of the Sterre, and about noone we were thwart of the bay of Lime, and so sounded and had 35 fadom water.

The first day we came in at the Needles and so came to an anchor under the Isle of Wight at a place called Meadhole, and from thence sayled to Southhampton where we made an ende of this voyage.

The Ambassage of M. Edmund Hogan, one of the sworne Esquires of her Maiesties person, from her Highnesse to Mully Abdelmelech Emperour of Marocco, and king of Fes and Sus: in the yeere 1577, written by himselfe,

Ed. Hogan his arrivall at Azafi in Barbarie.
May.

Edmund Hogan being appointed Ambassadour from the Queenes Maiestie to the aboue named Emperour and King Mully Abdelmelech, departed with my company and seruants from London the two and twentieth day of Aprill 1577, being imbarked in the good ship called the Gallion of London, and arrived in Azafi a port of Barbarie the one and twentieth day of May next following. Immediately I sent Leonell Edgerton a boare with my letters directed to Iohn Williams and Iohn Bampton, who dispatched a Trottero to Marocco to knowe the kings pleasure for my repaire to the Court, which letters came to their hands on the Thursday night.

They with all speede gaue the king vnderstanding of it, who being glad thereof speeded the next day certaine Captaines with souldiers and tents, with other prouision to Azafi: so that vpon Whitsunday at night the said Captaines with Iohn Bampton, Robert Washborne, and Robert Lion, and the kings officers came late to Azafi.

In the meane time I remained a boord, and caused some of the goods to be discharged for lighting of the shippe, and I wrote in my letter that I would not lande, till I knewe the Kings pleasure.

The 22 day being Saturday, the Make-speede arrived in the roade about two of the clocke in the afternoone.

The 27 day, being Whitsunday, came aboord the Gallion Iohn Bampton, and others, giuing me to vnderstande how much the King reioyced of my safe arrivall, comming from the Queenes Maiestie, and how that for my safe conduct to the Court he had sent foure Captaines and an hundred souldiers well appointed, with a horse furnished which he vsed himselfe to ride on with all other furniture accordingly: they wished mee also to come on lande in the best order I could, as well for my selfe as my men, which I did, hauing to the number of tenne men, whercof three were trumpeters.

The ships being foure appointed themselves in the best order they could for the best shew, and shot off all their ordinance to the value of twentieth Markes in powder.

At my comming a boare, I found all the souldiers well appointed on horsebacke, the Captaines and the Gouvernour of the towne standing as neere the water side as they could, with a Zennet of the kings, and receiued mee from the boate declaring how glad his Maiestie was of my safe arrivall, comming from the Queenes Maiestie my Distresse, and that hee had sent them to attend vpon me, it being his pleasure that I should tarie there on boare fure of five dayes for my refreshing.

So being mounted vpon the Iemmet, they conducted mee through the Towne into a faire felds vpon the Sea-side where was a tent prouided for mee, and all the ground spread with Turkie carpets, and the Castle discharged a peale of ordnance, and all things necessarie were brought into my tent, where I both tooke my table and lodging, and had other conuenient tents for my seruants.

The souldiers encircled the tents, and watched about vs day and night as long as I lay there, although I sought my speedier dispatch.

On the Wednesday towards night, I tooke my horse and trauelled ten miles to the first place of water that we could finde, and there pitched our tents till the next morning, and so trauelled till ten of the clocke, and then pitched our tents till foure, and so trauelled as long as day light would suffer about 26 miles that day.

The next day being Friday I trauelled in like order but eight and twentie miles at the most, and by a Riuer being about six miles within sight of the Citie of Marocco we pitched our tents.

Immediately after came all our English marchants, and the French on horsebacke to meete me, and before night there came an Alcayde from the king with fiftie men, & diuers mules laden with viciuall and banket, for my supper, declaring vnto me how glad the king shewed himselfe to heare of the Queenes Haiesie, and that his pleasure was I should be receiued into his countrey as neuer any Christian the like: and desired to knowe what time the next day I would come into his citie, because he would that all the Christians as also his nobilitie should meete me, and willed Iohn Bampton to be with him early in the morning, which he did.

About seuen of the clocke being accompanied with the French and English marchants, and a great number of souldiers, I passed towards the citie, and by that time I had trauelled 2 miles, there met me all the Christians of the Spaniards and Portugals to receiue me, which I knowe was more by the kings commandement then of any good wils of themselves: for some of them although they speake me faire hing downe their heads like dogs, and especially the Portugales, and I countenanced them accordingly.

So I passed on till I came within two English miles of the Citie, and then Iohn Bampton returned, shewing me that the king was so glad of my coming, that hee could not deuise to doe too much, to shewe the good will that hee did owe to the Queenes Haiesie, and her Realme.

His counsellors met me without the gates, and at the entrie of the gates, his footmen & guard were placed on both sides of my horse, and so brought me to the kings palace.

The king sat in his chaire with his Counsell about him, as well the Moores as the Elchies, and according to his order giuen vnto me before, I there declared my message in Spanish, and made deliuerie of the Queenes Haiesies letters, and all that I spake at that present in Spanish, hee caused one of his Elchies to declare the same to the Moores present, in the Larbe tongue.

Which done, he answered me againe in Spanish, yeelding to the Queenes Haiesie great thanks, and offering himselfe and his countrey to bee at her Graces commandement, and then commaunded certaine of his Counsellors to conduct mee to my lodging, not being farre from the Court.

The house was faire after the fashion of that countrey, being daily well furnished with al kind of virtuall at the kings charge.

The same night he sent for mee to the Court, and I had conference with him about the space of two houres, where I thoroughly declared the charge committed vnto mee from her Haiesie, finding him conformable, willing to pleasure and not to vexe her Haiesie with any demaundes, more then conveniently shee might willingly consent vnto, hee knowing that out of his countrey the Realme of England might be better serued with larkes, then hee in comparison from vs.

Further he gaue me to vnderstand, that the king of Spaine had sent vnto him for a licence, that an Ambassadour of his might come into his countrey, and had made great meanes that if the Queenes maiesty of England sent any vnto him, that he would not giue him any credit or intertainment, albeit (said he) I know what the king of Spaine is, and what the Queene of England and her Realme is: for I neither like of him nor of his religion, being so gouerned by the Inquisition that he can doe nothing of himselfe.

Wherefore when he commeth vpon the licence which I haue granted, he shall well see how little account I will make of him and Spaine, and how greatly I will extoll you for the Queenes Haiesie of England.

In Babary they haue no fimes but they lodge in open fieldes where they can find water.

The singular humane of the king to our Ambassadour.

The Spaniards and Portugales were comans ded by the king in paine of death, to meete the English Ambassadour.

The king of Spaine sought to disgrace the Queene & her Ambassadour.

He shall not come to my presence as you haue done, and shall dayly: for I munde to accept of you as my companion and one of my house, whereas he shall attend twentie dayes after he hath done his message.

After the end of this speech I deliuered Sir Thomas Greshams letters, when as he tooke me by the hand, and led me downe a long court to a palace where there ranne a faire fountaine of water, and there sitting himselfe in a chaire, he commanded me to sit downe in another, and there called for such simple Musicians as he had.

The king of Barbarie sent into England foure Musicians.

Then I presented him with a great base Lute, which he most thankfully accepted, and then he was delirious to heare of the Musicians, and I tolde him that there was great care had to prouide them, and that I did not doubt but vpon my returne they should come with the first ship. He is willing to giue them good intertainment with prouision of victuall, and to let them liue according to their law and conscience wherein he vygeth none to the contrary.

I finde him to be one that liueth greatly in the feare of God, being well exercised in the Scriptures, as well in the olde Testament as also in the New, and he beareth a greater affection to our Nation then to others because of our religion, which forbiddeth worship of Idols, and the Moores called him the Christian king.

A rich gift be-shewed vpon our Ambassadour.

The same night being the first of Iune, I continued with him till twelue of the clocke, and he seemed to haue so good liking of me, that he tooke from his girdle a short dagger bring set with 200 stones, rubies and turkies, and did bestow it vpon me, and so I being conducted returned to my lodging for that time.

The next day because he knew it to be Sunday & our Sabbath day he did let me rest. But on the munday in the afternoone he sent for me, and I had conference with him againe, and musicke.

Likewise on the tuesday by thye of the clocke he sent for me into his garden, finding him layd vpon a silke bed complayning of a soze leg: yet after long conference he walked into another Orchard, whereas hauing a faire banketing-house and a great water, and a new gallie in it, he went aboard the gallie andooke me with him, and passed the space of two or three houres, shewing the great experience he had in Gallies, wherein (as he said) he had exercised himselfe eigheteene yeres in his youth.

After supper he shewed me his hozles and other commodities that he had about his house, and since that night I haue not scene him, for that he hath kept in with his soze legge, but he hath sent to me dayly.

June.

The 13 of Iune at five of the clocke at night I had againe audience of the king, and I continued with him till midnight, hauing debated as well for the Queenes commission as for the well dealing with her marchants for their traffike here in these parts, saying, he would do much more for the Queenes maiesty and the Realme, offering that all English ships with her subiects may with good securitie enter into his ports and dominions as well in trade of marcadize, as for victuall & water, as also in time of warre with any her enemies to bring in prizes and to make sales as occasion should serue, or else to depart againe with them at their pleasure.

the king to our English merchants.

Likewise for all English ships that shall passe along his coast of Barbarie, & thozow the straites into the Leuant seas, that he would graunt safe conduct that the said ships and marchants with their goods might passe into the Leuant seas, and so to the Turkes dominions, and the king of Argiers, as his owne, and that he would write to the Turke and to the king of Argier his letters for the well vsing of our ships and goods.

Also that hereafter no Englishmen that by any meanes may be taken captiues, shall be solde within any of his dominions: whereupon I declared that the Queenes maiesty accepting of these his offers was pleased to confirme the intercourse & trade of our marchants within this his countrey, as also to pleasure him with such commodities as he should haue need of, to furnish the necessities and wants of his countrey in trade of marchandize, so as he required nothing contrarie to her honour and law, and the breach of league with the Christian princes her neighbours.

uision.

The same night I presented the king with the case of combes, and desired his maiestie to haue special regard that the ships might be laden backe againe, for that I found little store of salt-peter in readinesse in Iohn Bamprons hands. He answered me that I should haue all the assistance therein that he could, but that in Sus he thought to haue some store in his house there, as also that the Mountayners had made much in a crabinesse: I requested that he would send downe, which he promised to doe.

The eighteenth day I was with him againe and so continued there till night, and he shewed me his house with pastime in ducking with water-Spaniels, and baiting buls with his English dogges.

At this time I moued him againe for the sending downe to Sus, which he granted to doe, and the the 24. day there departed Alcayde Mammie, with Lionell Edgerton, and Rowland Guy to Sus, and caried with them for our accompts and his company the kings letters to his brother Muly Hammet, and Alcayde Shauan, and the Viceroy.

The 23. day the king sent me out of Marocco to his garden called Shersbonare, with his gard, and Alcayde Mamoure, and the 24. at night I came to the court to see a Bozris dance, and a play of his Elchies. He promised me audience the next day being Tuesday, but he put it off till Thursday: and the Thursday at night I was sent for to the king after supper, and then he sent Alcayde Rodwan, and Alcayde Gowry to conferre with me, but after a little talke I desired to be brought to the King for my dispatch. And being brought to him, I preferred two bills of Iohn Bamprons which he had made for provision of Salt-peter: also two bills for the quiet traffique of our English Marchantes, and bills for sugars to be made by the Iewes, as well for the debtes past, as hereafter, and for good order in the Ingenios. Also I mooued him againe for the Salt-peter, and other dispatches, which he referred to be agreed vpon by the two Alcaydes. But the Friday being the 20. the Alcaydes could not intend it, and vpon Saturday Alcayde Rodwan fell sicke, so on Sunday we made meanes to the King, and that afternoone I was sent for to conferre vpon the bargain with the Alcaydes and others, but did not agree.

Vpon Tuesday I wrote a letter to the King for my dispatch, and the same afternoone I was called againe to the Court, and referred all things to the King, accepting his offer of Salt-peter.

That night againe the King had me into his Gallie, and the Spaniels did hunt the ducke.

The Thursday I was appointed to way the 300. kintals grosse of Salt-peter, and that afternoone the Tabybe came vnto me to my lodging, shewing mee that the king was offended with Iohn Bampton for diuers causes.

The Sunday night late being the 7. of July, I got the King to forgive all to Iohn Bampton, and the King promised me to speake againe with me vpon Monday.

Vpon Tuesday I wrote to him againe for my dispatch, and then hee sent Fray Lewes to mee, and said that he had order to write.

Vpon Wednesday I wrote againe, and he sent me word that vpon Thursday I should come and be dispatched, so that I should depart vpon Friday without faile, being the twelfth of July.

So the Friday after according to the kings order & appointment I went to the court, & where as motion and petition was made for the confirmation of the demaunds which I had preferred, they were all granted, and likewise the priuileges which were on the behalfe of our English marchants requested, were with great fauour and readinesse yeelded vnto. And whereas the Iewes there resident were to our men in certaine round summes indebted, the Emperors pleasure and commandement was, that they should without further excuse or delay, pay and discharge the same. And thus at length I was dismissed with great honour and speciall countenance, such as hath not ordinarily bene shewed to other Ambassadors of the Christians.

And touching the priuate affaires intreated vpon betwixt her Maiestie and the Emperour, I had letters from him to satisfie her highnesse therein. So to conclude, hauing receiued the like honourable conduct from his Court, as I had for my part at my first landing, I embarked my selfe with my foresaid company, and arriuing not long after in England, I repaired to her Maiesties court, & ended my Ambassage to her highnesse good liking, with relation of my seruice perforced.

The Emperour of Maroco his priuileges to the English.

The voyage of Thomas Stukeley, wrongfully called Marques of Ireland, into Barbary 1578. Written by Iohannes Thomas Freigius in Historia de cæde Sebastiani Regis Lusitania.

Venerant autem ad regem etiam sexcenti Itali, quos Papa subministrat, Comiti Irlandiæ: qui cum Vlsiponem tribus instructis nauibus appulisset Regi operam suam condixit, eumque in bellum sequi promisit. Cap. 7.

Totum exercitum diuisit in quatuor acies quadratas: In dextro latere primum agmen erat Velitum & militum Tingitanorum, eosque ducebat Aluarius Peresius de Tauara: sinistram aciem seu mediam tenebant Germani & Itali, quibus imperabat Marchio Irlandiæ, &c. Cap. 11.

Inter nobiles qui in hoc prelio ceciderunt, fuerunt, præter regem Sebastianum, dux de Auero, Episcopi Conimbricensis & Portuensis, Commissarius generalis à Papa missus Marchio Irlandiæ, Christophorus de Tauora, & plures alij. Cap. 13.

The same in English.

There came also to Don Sebastian the King of Portugal 600. Italians, whom the Pope sent under the conduct of the Marques of Ireland: who being artiued at Lisbon with thre tall ships, ships proffered his seruice to the king, and promised to attend vpon him in the warres, &c.

He diuided the whole Armie into 4. Squadrons: vpon the right wing stood the first Squadron, consisting of men lightly armed of skirmishers and of the souldiers of Tangier, Generall of whom was Don Aluaro Perez de Tauara: the left or middle Squadron consisted of Germanes and Italians, vnder the command of the Marques of Irland, &c. cap. 7.

Of Noblemen were slaine in this battell (besides Don Sebastian the king) the duke de Aue-ro, the two bishops of Coimbra & of Porto, the Marques of Irland sent by the Pope as his Com-missary generall, Christopher de Tauara, and many others, cap. 13.

It is further also to be remembred, that diuers other English gentlemen were in this battell, whereof the most part were slaine; and among others M. Christopher Lyster was taken cap-tiue, and was there long detained in miserable seruitude. Which gentleman although at length he happily escaped the cruel hands of the Moores; yet returning home into England, and for his manifold good parts being in the yeere 1586, employed by the honourable the Earle of Cum-berland, in a voyage intended by the Sreights of Magellan for the South sea, as Viceadmirall, (wherein he shewed singular resolution and courage) and appointed afterward in diuers places of speciall command and credite, was last of all miserably drowned in a great and rich Spanish prize vpon the coast of Cornwall.

Certaine reports of the prouince of China learned through the Portugals there imprisoned, and chiefly by the relation of Galeotto Perera, a Gentleman of good credit, that lay prisoner in that Countrey many yeeres. Done out of Italian into English by Richard Willes.

Fuquien.

His land of China is parted into 13. Shires, the which sometimes were ech one a kingdome by it selfe, but these many yeeres they haue bene all subiect vnto one King. Fuquien is made by the Portugals the first Shire, because there their troubles began, & they had occasion thereby to know the rest. In this shire be 8. cities, but one principally more famous then others called Fuquieo, the other seuen are reasonably great, the best known whereof vnto the Portugals is Cinceo, in respect of a certaine haueu topning thereunto, whither in time past they were wont for merchandise to resort.

Cinceo.

Cantan.

Cantan is the second shire, not so great in quantitie, as well accompted of, both by the king thereof, and also by the Portugals, for that it lieth neerer vnto Malacca then any other part of China, and was first discried by the Portugals before any other shire in that prouince: this shire hath in it seuen Cities.

Chequeam.

Chequeam is the third shire, the chiefeſt Citie therein is Donchion, therein also standeth Li-ampo, with other 13. or 14. boroughes: countrey townes therein are too too many to be spoken of.

Xutiamfu.

The fourth shire is called Xutiamfu, the principall Citie thereof is great Pachin, where the King is alwayes resident. In it are fifteene other very great Cities: of other townes therein, and boroughes well walled and trenched about, I wil say nothing.

Chelim.

The fift shire hath name Chelim: the great Citie Nanquin chiefe of other fifteene cities was herein of ancient time the rovall seat of the Chinish kings. From this shire, & from the aforesaid Chequeam forward bare rule the other kings, vntil the whole region became one kingdome.

Quianci. or,
Quinzi.

The 6. shire beareth the name Quianci, as also the principal City thereof, wherein the fine clay to make vessels is wrought. The Portugals being ignorant of this Countrey, and finding great abundance of that fine clay to be selde at Liampo, and that very good cheape, thought at the first that it had bene made there, howbeit in time they perceived that the standing of Quinzi more neere vnto Liampo then to Cinceo or Cantan was the cause of so much fine clay at Liampo: within the compass of Quinzi shire be other 12. cities.

The 7. shire is Quicin, the 8. Quanh, the 9. Confu, the 10. Vman, the 11. Sichiuu. In the first hereof there be 16. Cities, in the next 15: how many Townes the other 3. haue, wee are ignorant as yet, as also of the proper names of the 12. and 13. shires, and the townes therein.

This finally may be generally said hereof, that the greater shires in China prouince may bee compared with mightie kingdomes.

In ech one of these shires bee set Ponchiassini and Anchiassini, before whom are handled the matters of other Cities. There is also placed in ech one a Turan, as you would say, a gouernour, and a Chian, that is a iustice, as it were: whose office is to goe in circuit, and to see iustice exactly done. By these meanes so vprightly things are ordered there, that it may be worthily accompted one of the best gouerned prouinces in all the world.

Pachin.

The king maketh alwayes his abode in the great city Pachin, as much to say in our language, as by the name thereof I am aduertised, the towne of the kingdome. This kingdome is so large, that vnder five monethes you are not able to traualle from the Townes by the Sea side to the Court, and backe againe, no not vnder three monethes in poste at your vrgent businesse. The post-houles in this Countrey are kille of body, but swift of foote. Many doe trauelle the greater part of this iourney by water in certaine light barkes, for the multitude of Riuers commodious for passage from one Citie to another.

The King, notwithstanding the hugeness of his kingdome, hath such a care thereof, that euery Poone (for by the Poones they reckon their monethes) he is aduertised fully of what soeuer thing happeneth therein, by these meanes following.

The whole prouince being diuided into shires, and ech shire hauing in it one chiefe and principall Citie, wherunto the matters of all the other Cities, Townes and boroughes, are brought, there are drawn in euery chiefe Citie aforesaid intelligences of such things as doe monethly fall out, and be sent in writing to the Court. If happely in one moneth euery post be not able to goe so long a way, yet doeth there notwithstanding once euery moneth arrive one post out of the shire. Who so cometh befoze the new moone stayeth for the deliury of his letters until the moone be changed. Then likewise are dispatched other posts backe into all the 13. shires againe.

Before that we doe come to Cinceo wee haue to passe through many places, and some of great importance. For this Countrey is so well inhabited neere the Sea side, that you cannot goe one mile but you shal see some Towne, borough or holly, the which are so abundantly prouided of all things, that in the Cities and townes they liue ciuily. Neuertheless such as dwell abrode are very poore, for the multitude of them euery where is so great, that out of a tree you shal see many times swarme a number of children, where a man would not haue thought to haue found any one at all.

From these places in number infinite, you shall come vnto two Cities very populous, and, being compared with Cinceo, not possibly to be discerned which is the greater of them. These cities are as well walled as any Cities in all the world. As you come in to either of them, there standeth so great and mighty a bridge, that the like thereof I haue neuer scene in Portugal nor else where. I heard one of myr fellowes say, that hee tolde in one bridge 40. arches. The occasion wherefore these bridges are made so great is, for that the Countrey is toward the sea very plaine and low, and ouerflowed euer as the sea water entreaseth. The breadth of the bridges, although it bee well proportioned vnto the length thereof, yet are they equally built, no higher in the middle then at either ende, in such wise that you may see directly from the one ende to the other: the sides are wonderfully well engraued after the maner of Rome-workes. But that we did most maruelle at was therewithall the hugeness of the stones, the like whereof, as we came in to the Citie, we did see many set up in places dis-habited by the way, to no small charges of theirs, howbeit to little purpose, whereas no body seeth them but such as doe come by. The arches are not made after our fashion, vaulted with stonyp stones set together: but paved, as it were, whole stones reaching from one pillar to another, in such wise that they lye both for the arches heads, and galantly serue also for the high way. I haue bene assented to beholde the hugeness of the aforesaid stones: some of them are xii. pases long and vppward, the least 11. good pases long, and an halfe.

The wayes echwhere are galantly paved with fouresquare stone, except it be where for want of stone they vse to lay byckc: in this voyage wee traualled ouer certaine hilles, where the wayes were pitched, and in many places no worse paved then in the plaine ground. This causeth vs to thinke, that in all the world there bee no better workemen for buildings, then the inhabitants of China. The Countrey is so well inhabited, that no one foote of ground is left vntilled: small fozes of cattell haue we seene this day, we saw onely certaine oxen wherewithall the countrey men do plow their ground. One ore draweth the plough alone, not onely in this shire, but in other places also, wherein is greater fozes of cattell. These countrey men by arte do that in tillage, which we are constrained to doe by force. Here be solde the boydings of close stooles, although there wanteth not the dung of beastes: and the excrements of man are good marchandise throughout all China. The dungfermers seek in euery strete by exchange to buy this durtie ware for herbs and wood. The custome is very good for keeping the Citie cleane. There is great abundance of hennes, geese, duckes, swine, and goates, wethers haue they none: the hennes are solde by weight, and so are all other things. Two pound of hennes flesh, geese, or ducke, is worth two fo of their money, that is, 8. ob. sterling. Swines flesh is sold at a penie the pound. Berse beareth the same price, for the scarcitie thereof, howbeit norward from Fuquiao and farther off from the sea-coast, there is beefe more plentie and solde better cheape; We haue had in all the Cities we passed through, great abundance of all these victuals, beefe onely excepted. And if this Countrey were like vnto India, the inhabitants whereof eate neither hennes, beefe, nor porke, but keepe that onely for for the Portugals and Moores, they would be sold here for nothing. But it so falling out, that the Chineans are the greatest eaters in all the world, they do feed upon all things, specially on porke, which, the fatter it is, is unto them the lesse lothsome. The highest price of these things aforesaid I haue set downe, better cheape shal you sometimes buy them for the great plentie thereof in this countrey. Frogs are solde at the same price that is made of hennes, and are good nicate amongst them, as also dogs, cats, rats, snakes, and all other unclean meetes.

The Cities be very gallant, specially neere vnto the gates, the which are marueilously great, and covered with iron. The gatchouses are built on high with towers, & the lower part thereof is made of bricke & stone, proportionally with the walls, from the walls upward the building is of timber, and many stories in it one above the other. The strength of their townes is in the mightie walles and ditches, artillerte haue they none.

The streetes in Cinceo, and in all the rest of the Cities we haue scene are very faire, so large and so straight, that it is wonderfull to behold. Their houses are built with timber, the foundations onely excepted, the which are layd with stone: in each side of the streetes are pentiles or continuall porches for the marchantes to walke vnder: the breadth of the streets is neuer the lesse such, that in them 15. men may ride commodiously side by side. As they ride they must needs passe vnder many high arches of triumph that crosse ouer the streetes made of timber, and carued diuersly, covered with tiles of fine clay: vnder these arches the Mercers do utter their smaller wares, & such as list to stand there are defended from raine and the heate of the Sunne. The greater gentlemen haue these arches at their doozes: although some of them be not so mightily built as the rest.

Lourea.

I shall haue occasion to speake of a certaine order of gentlemen that are called Loureas. I will first therefore expound what this word signifieth. Lourea is as much to say in our language as Sir, and when any of them calleth his name, he answereth Sir: and as we do say, that the king hath made some gentleman, so say they, that there is made a Lourea. And for that amongst them the degrees are diuers both in name and office, I will tell you onely of some pincipals, being not able to aduertise you of all.

The maner how gentlemen are created Loureas, and do come to that honour and title, is by the giuing of a broad girdle, not like to the rest, and a cap, at the commandment of the king. The name Lourea is moze generall & common vnto mo, then the equalitie of honour thereby signified agreeth withall. Such Loureas as doe serue their pince in weightie matters for iustice, are created after trial made of their learning: but the other which serue in smaller affaires, as Captaines, constables, sergeants by land and sea, receivers and such like, whereof there be in euery citie, as also in this, very many, are made for fauour: the chiefe Loureas are serued kneeling.

The whole prouince of China is diuided, as I haue said, into 13. shires, in euery shire at the least is one gouernour called there Turan, in some shires there be two.

Chian, or, Chien.

Chiefe in office next vnto them be certaine other named Chians, that is, high Commissioners as you would say, or visiters, with full authoritie in such wise, that they doe call vnto an accompt the Turans themselves, but their authoritie lasteth not in any shire longer then one yere. After the lesse in euery shire being at the least 7. cities, yea, in some of them 15. or 16. beside other boroughes and to wnes not well to be numbred, these visiters where they come are so honoured and feared, as though they were some great pinces. At the yeres end, their circuit done, they come vnto that Citie which is chiefe of others in the shire, to do iustice there: finally busying themselves in the searching out of such as are to receiue the order of Loureas, whereof moze shalbe said in another place.

Ponchiaffi.

Quer and besides these officers, in the chiefe City of ech one of these aforesaid 13. prouinces, is resident one Ponchiaffi, Capitaine thereof, and treasurer of all the kings reuenues. This Magistrate maketh his abode in one of the foure greatest houses that be in all these head Cities. And although the principall part of his function be to be Capitaine, to be treasurer of the reuenues in that prouince, & to send these reuenues at appointed times to the Court: yet hath he notwithstanding by his office also to meddle with matters appertaining vnto iustice.

Anchiaffi, or, Hexaffi.

In the second great house dwelleth an other Magistrate called Anchiaffi, a great officer also, for he hath dealings in all matters of iustice. Who although he be somewhat inferior in dignitie vnto the Ponchiaffi, yet for his great dealings and generall charge of iustice, whosoener seeth the affaires of the one house and the other might iudge this Anchiaffi to be the greater.

Tuzi.

Tuzi, an other officer so called, lieth in the thirde house, a magistrate of importance, specially in things belonging vnto warfare, for thereof hath he charge.

Taisu.

There is resident in the 4. house a fourth officer, bearing name Taisu. In this house is the principall prison of all the Citie. Ech one of these Magistrates aforesaid may both lay euill doers in prison, & deliuer them out againe, except fact be heinous & of importance: in such a case they can do nothing, except they do meet al together. And if the deed deserueth death, all they together cannot deter:

determine thereof, without recourse made vnto the Chian wheresoener hee be, or to the Tucan; and estoones it falleth out, that the case is referred vnto higher power. In all Cities, not onely chiefe in ech Shire, but in the rest also, are meanes found to make Loureas. Many of them do study at the prince his charges, wherefoe at the peeres ende they resort vnto the head Cities, whither the Chians doe come, as it hath bene earst saide, as well to giue these degrees, as to sit in iudgement ouer the prisoners.

The Chians go in circuit euery yere, but such as are to be chosen to the greatest offices meete not but from three peeres to three peeres, and that in certaine large halles appointed for them to be examined in. Many things are asked them, whereunto if they doe answer accordingly, and be found sufficient to take their degree, the Chian by and by granteth it them: but the Cap and girdle, whereby they are known to be Loureas, they weare not befoze that they be confirmed by the king. Their examination done, and triall made of them, such as haue taken their degree wont to be giuen them with all ceremonies, vse to banquet and feast many dayes together (as the Chineans fashion is to ende all their pleasures with eating and drinking) and so remaine chosen to do the king seruice in matters of learning. The other examinares founde insufficient to proceed are sent backe to their studie againe. Whose ignorance is perceiued to come of negligence and default, such a one is whipped, and sometimes sent to prison, where lping that yere when this kinde of acte was, we found many thus punished, and demanding the cause thereof, they saide it was for that they knew not how to answer vnto certaine things asked them. It is a way to see how these Loureas are serued and feared, in such wise, that in publike assemblies at one shrike they giue, all the seruitors belonging vnto iustice tremble thereat. At their being in these places, when they list to mooue, be it but euen to the gate, these seruitors doe take them vp, and carry them in seates of beaten gold. After this sort are they borne when they goe in the City, either for their owne businesse abroad, or to see ech other at home. For the dignitie they haue, and office they doe beare, they be all accompanied: the very meanest of them all that goeth in these seates is vshered by two men at the least, that cry vnto the people to giue place, howbeit they neede it not, for that reuerence the common people haue vnto them. They haue also in their company certaine Sergeants with their Faces either siluered or altogether siluer, some two, some foure, or ther five, other eight, conueniently for ech one his degree. The more principall and chiefe Loureas haue going orderly befoze these Sergeants, many other with staves, and a great many catchpoules with rods of Indish canes dragged on the ground, so that the streets being paured, you may heare a farre off as well the noyse of the rods, as the voyce of the criers. These fellows serue also to appzehend others, and the better to be knownen they weare liuery red girdles, and in their caps peacocks feathers. Behinde these Loureas come such as doe beare certaine tables hangd at staves endes, wherein is written in siluer letters, the name, degree, and office of that Lourea, whom they follow. In like manner they haue borne after them hattes agreeable vnto their titles: if the Lourea be meane, then hath he brought after him but one hat, and that may not be yealow; but if he be of the better sort, then may he haue two, three, or foure: the principall and chiefe Loureas may haue all their hats yealow, the which among them is accounted great honour. The Lourea for warres, although he be but meane, may not withstanding haue yealow hats. The Tutans and Chians, when they goe abroad, haue besides all this befoze them ledde three or foure horses with their guard in armour.

Furthermoze the Loureas, yea and all the people of China, are wont to eat their meate sitting on stools at high tables as we doe, and that very cleanly, although they vse neither table-clothes nor napkins. Whatsoener is set downe vpon the boord is first carued befoze that it be brought in: they feede with two sticks, refraining from touching their meate with their hands, euen as we do with forks: for the which respect they lesse do neede any table clothes. It is the nation only ciuill at meate, but also in conuersation, and in courtesie they seeme to exceede all other. Like wise in their dealings after their maner they are so ready, that they farre passe all other Gentiles and Moores: the greater states are so vaine, that they line their clothes with the best silke that may be found. The Loureas are an idle generation, without all maner of exercises and pastimes, except it be eating and drinking. Sometimes they walke abroad in the fields to make the souldiers shoot at pickes with their bowes, but their eating passeth: they will stand eating euen when the other do draw to shoot. The pickie is a great blanket spread on certaine long poles, he that striketh it, hath of the best man there standing a piece of crimson Taffata, the which is knit about his head: in this sort the winners be honoured, and the Loureas with their bellies full returne home againe. The inhabitants of China be very great Idolaters, all generally doe worship the heauens: and, as wee are wont to say, God knoweth it: so say they at euery word, Tien Tante, that is to say, The heauens doe know it. Some doe worship the Sonne, and some the Moone, as they thinke good, for none are bound more to one then to another. In their temples, the which they do call Meani, they haue a great altar in the same place as we haue, true it is that one may goe round about it. There for they by the image of a certaine Lourea of that countrey, whom they haue in great reuerence for certaine notable things he did. At the right hand standeth the diuel much more vgly paired then we doe vse to set him out, whereunto great homage is done by such as come into the temple to aske counsell, or to draw lottes: this opinion they haue of him, that he is malicious and able to do euil. If you aske them what they do thinke of the soules departed, they will answere that they be immortall, and that as soone as any one departeth out of this life, he be commeth a diuel if hee haue liued well in this world, if otherwise, that the same diuel changeeth him into a busse, ore, or dogge. Wherefore to this diuel they doe much honour, to him doe they sacrifice, praying him that he will make them like vnto himselfe, and not like other beastes. They haue moreover another sort of temples, wherein both vpon the altars and also on the walls do stand many idols well proportioned, but bare headed: these beare name Omichofon, accounted of them spirits, but such as in heauen do neither good nor euil, thought to be such men and women as haue chafly liued in this world in abstinance from fish and flesh, fed onely with rise and salates. Of that diuel they make some account: for these spirits they care little or nothing at all. Again they holde opinion that if a man do well in this life, the heauens will giue him many temporal blessings, but if he doe euil, then shall he haue infirmities, diseases, troubles, and penurie, and all this without any knowledge of God. Finally, this people knoweth no other thing then to liue and die, yet because they be reasonable creatures, all seemed good vnto them we speake in our language, though it were not very sufficient: our maner of praying especially pleased them, and truly they are well ynough disposed to receiue the knowledge of the truth. Our Lord grant for his mercy all things so to be disposed, that it may sometime be brought to passe, that so great a nation as this is perish not for want of helpe.

Our maner of praying so well liked them, that in prison importunately they besought vs to write for them somewhat as concerning heauen, the which we did to their contentation wth such reasons as we knew, howbeit not very cunningly. As they do their idolatry they laugh at themselves. If at any time this countrey might be ioyned in league with the kingdome of Portugale, in such wise that free accesse were had to deale with the people there, they might all be soone conuerted. The greatest fault we do finde in them is Sodomie, a vice very common in the meaner sort, and nothing strange amongst the best. This sinne were it left of them, in all other things so well disposed they be, that a good interpreter in a short space might do there great good: If, as I said, the countrey were ioyned in league with vs.

Furthermore the Loureas, with all the people of China, are wont to solemnize the dayes of the new and full Moones in visiting one another, and making great banquets: for to that end, as I earst said, do tend all their pastimes, and spending their dayes in pleasure. They are wont also to solemnize ech one his birth day, whereunto their kindred and friends do resort of custome, with presents of iewels or money, receiuing againe for their reward good cheare. They keepe in like maner a generall feast with great banquets that day their king was borne. But their most principall and greatest feast of all, and best cheare, is the first day of their new yeere, namely the first day of the new Moone of February, so that their first moneth is March, and they reckon the times accordingly, respect being had vnto the reigne of their princes: as when any deed is written, they date it thus, Hade such a day of such a moone, and such a yeere of the reigne of such a king. And their ancient writings beare date of the yeeres of this or that king.

Now will I speake of the maner which the Chineans doe obserue in doing of iustice, that it may be known how farre these Gentiles do herein exceed many Christians, that be more bounden then they to deale iustly and in trueth. Because the Chiniish king maketh his abode continually in the City Pachin, his kingdome so great, & the shires so many, as tofore it hath bene said: in it therefore the gouernours and rulers, much like vnto our Shyriffes, be appointed so suddenly and speedily discharged againe, that they haue no time to grow naught. Furthermore to keepe the state in more securitie, the Loureas that gouerne one shire are chosen out of some other shire distant farre off, where they must leaue their wiues, childzen and goods, carrying nothing with them but themselves. True it is, that at their comming thither they doe finde in a readinesse all things necessary, their house, furniture, seruants, and all other things in such perfection and plenty, that they want nothing. Thus the king is well serued without all feare of treason.

In the principall Cities of the shires be foure chiefe Loureas, before whom are brought all matters of the inferiour Townes, throughout the whole Realme. Diuers other Loureas haue the managing of iustice, and receiuing of rents, bound to peeble an accompt thereof vnto the greater officers. Other do see that there be no euil rule kept in the Citie: ech one as it behoueth him.

Generally

Generally all these doe imprison malefactours, cause them to be whipped and racked, hysling them by and downe by the armes with a cord, a thing very vsuall there, and accompted no shame. These Louteas do vse great diligence in the apprehending of theeues, so that it is a wonder to see a theefe escape away in any City, towne or village. Upon the sea neere vnto the shoare many are taken, and looke euen as they are taken, so be they first whipped, and afterwarde layde in prison, where shortly after they all die for hunger and cold. At that time when we were in prison, there died of them about threescore and ten. If happily any one, hauing the meanes to get food, do escape, he is set with the condemned persons, and prouided for as they be by the King, in such wise as hereafter it shalbe said.

The Italians
call it the stradopado.

Their whips be certaine pieces of canes, cleft in the middle, in such sort that they seeme rather plaine then sharpe. He that is to be whipped lieth grouel long on the ground: vpon his thighes the hangman layeth on blowes mightily with these canes, that the standers by tremble at their cruelty. Ten stripes draw a great deale of blood, 20. or 30. spoile the flesh altogether, 50. or 60. will require long time to bee healed, and if they come to the number of one hundred, then are they incurable.

The Louteas obserue mozeouer this: when any man is brought before them to be examined, they aske him openly in the hearing of as many as be present, be the offence neuer so great. Thus did they also behaue themselves with vs: For this cause amongst them can there be no false witness, as dayly amongst vs it falleth out. This good cometh thereof, that many being alwayes about the Iudge to heare the euidence, and heare witness, the processe cannot be falsified, as it happeneth sometimes with vs. The Moores, Gentiles, and Iewes haue all their sundry othes, the Moores do sweare by their Mossafos, the Brachmans by their Fili, the rest likewise by the things they do worship. The Chineans though they be wont to sweare by heauen, by the Moone, by the Sunne, and by all their Idoles, in iudgement neuertheless they sweare not at all. If for some offence an othe be used of any one, by and by with the least euidence he is tormented, so be the witnesses he bringeth, if they tell not the trueth, or do in any point disagree, except they be men of worship and credit, who are beleueed without any further matter: the rest are made to confesse the truth by force of tormentes and whips. Besides this order obserued of them in examinations, they do feare so much their King, and he where he maketh his abode keepeth them so close, that that they dare not once stirre. Again, these Louteas as great as they be, notwithstanding the multitude of Notaries they haue, not trusting any others, do write all great processees and matters of importance themselves. Mozeouer one vertue they haue worthy of great praise, and that is, being men so wel regarded and accompted as though they were princes, yet they be patient aboue measure in giuing audience. The poore strangers brought before them might say what we would, as all to be lyes and fallaces that they did write, ne did we stand before them with the vsuall ceremonies of that Countrey, yet did they beare with vs so patiently, that they caused vs to wonder, knowing specially how little any aduocate or Iudge is wont in our Countrey to beare with vs. For wheresoever in any Towne of Christendome should be accused unknown men as we were, I know not what end the very innocents cause would haue: but we in a heathen Countrey, hauing our great enemies two of the chiefeest men in a whole Towne, wanting an interpreter, ignorant of that Countrey language, did in the end see our great aduersaries cast into prison for our sake, and depriued of their Offices and honour for not doing iustice, yea not to escape death: for, as the rumour goeth, they shalbe beheaded. Somewhat is now to be said of the lawes that I haue bene able to know in this Countrey, and first, no theft or murther is at any time pardoned: adulterers are put in prison, and the fact once proued, are condemned to die, the womans husband must accuse them: this order is kept with men & women found in that fault, but theeues and murderers are imprisoned as I haue said, where they shortly die for hunger and cold. If any one happily escape by bribing the Gailer to giue him meate, his processe goeth further, and cometh to the Court where he is condemned to die. Sentence being giuen, the prisoner is brought in publique with a terrible band of men that lay him in Irons hand and foot, with a boord at his necke one handfull broad, in length reaching downe to his knees, cleft in two parts, and with a hole one handfull downeward in the table fit for his necke, the which they inclose by therein, nailing the boord fast together; one handfull of the boord standeth by behinde in the necke: The sentence and cause wherefore the fellow was condemned to die, is written in that part of the table that standeth before.

boord.

This ceremony ended, he is laid in a great prison in the company of some other condemned persons, the which are found by the king as long as they do liue. The boord aforesaid so made tormenteth the prisoners very much, keeping them both from rest, & eke letting them to eat comodiously, their hands being manacled in irons vnder that boord, so that in fine there is no remedie but death.

In the chiefe Cities of euery shire, as we haue erst said, there be foure principall houses, in ech of them a prison: but in one of them, where the Taissu maketh his abode, there is a greater and a more principal prison then in any of the rest: and although in euery City there be many, neuertheless in thre of them remaine onely such as be condemned to die. Their death is much prolonged, for that ordinarily there is no execution done but once a yeere, though many die for hunger and cold, as we haue seene in this prison. Execution is done in this maner. The Chian, to wit, the high Commissioner or Lord chiefe Justice, at the yeres end goeth to the head City, where he heareth againe the causes of such as be condemned. Many times he deliuereth some of them, declaring y boord to haue bene wronfully put about their necks: the visitation ended, he chooseth out seven or eight, not many more or lesse of the greatest malefactors, the which, to feare and keepe in awe the people, are brought into a great market place, where all the great Loureas meete together, and after many ceremonies and superstitions, as the vse of the Countrey is, are beheaded. This is done once a yeere: who so escapeth that day, may be sure that he shall not be put to death all that yeere following, and so remaineth at the kings charges in the greater prison. In that prison where we lay were alwayes one hundred and mo of these condemned persons, besides them that lay in other prisons.

These prisons wherein the condemned captives do remaine are so strong, that it hath not bene heard, that any prisoner in all China hath escaped out of prison, for in deed it is a thing impossible. The prisons are thus builded. First all the place is mightily walled about, the walles be very strong and high, the gate of no lesse force: within it thre other gates, before you come where the prisoners do lye, there many great lodgings are to be seene of the Loureas, Notaries, Parthions, that is, such as do there keepe watch and ward day and night, the court large and paved, on the one side whereof standeth a prison, with two mightey gates, wherein are kept such prisoners as haue committed enormous offences. This prison is so great, that in it are streetes and Market places wherein all things necessary are sold. Ye some prisoners liue by that kinde of trade, buying and selling, and letting out beds to hire: some are dayly sent to prison, some dayly deliuered, wherefore this place is neuer void of 7. or eight hundred men that go at libertie.

Into one other prison of condemned persons shall you go at thre yron gates, the court paved and vaulted round about, and open aboue as it were a cloister. In this cloister be eight roomes with yron doores, and in ech of them a large gallerie, wherein euery night the prisoners do lie at length, their feet in the stocks, their bodies hampered in huge wooden grates that keep them from sitting, so that they lye as it were in a cage, sleepe if they can: in the morning they are loosed againe, that they may go into the court. Notwithstanding the strength of this prison, it is kept with a garrison of men, part whereof watch within the house, part of them in the court, some keepe about the prison with lanterns and watch-bells answering one another five times euery night, and giuing warning so lowd, that the Lourea resting in a chamber not nere thereunto, may heare them. In these prisons of condemned persons remaine some 15, other 20. peres imprisoned, not executed, for the loue of their honorable friends that seeke to prolong their liues. Many of these prisoners be shoemakers, and haue from the king a certaine allowance of rife: some of them worke for the keeper, who suffereth them to go at libertie without fetters and boords, the better to worke. Howbeit when the Lourea calleth his checke roll, & with the keeper vieweth them, they all weare their liueries, that is, boords at their necks, pruned hand and foot. When any of these prisoners dieth, he is to be seene of the Lourea and Notaries, brought out of a gate so narrow, that there can but one be drawen out there at once. The prisoner being brought forth, one of the aforesaid Parthions striketh him thyside on the head with an yron sledge, that done he is deliuered into his friends, if he haue any, otherwise the king hireth men to carphim to his buriall in the fields.

Thus adulterers and thecues are vled. Such as be imprisoned for debt once knowen, lie there until it be paid. The Taissu or Lourea calleth them many times before him by the vertue of his office, who vnderstanding the cause wherefore they do not pay their debts, appointeth them a certaine tyme to do it, within the compasse whereof if they discharge not their debts being debtors in deed, then they be whipped and condemned to perpetuall imprisonment: if the creditors be many, and one is to be paid before another, they do, contrary to our maner, pay him first of whom they last borrowed, and so ordinarily the rest, in such sort that the first lender be the last receiuer. The same order is kept in paying legacies: the last named receiueh his portion first. They accompt it nothing to shew fauour to such a one as can do the like againe: but to do good to them that haue little or nothing, that is worth thanks, therefore pay they the last before the first, for that their intent seemeth rather to be vertuous then gainefull.

When I said, that such as be committed to prison for theft and murther were iudged by the Court, I ment not them that were apprehended in the deed doing, for they need no trial, but are are brought immediately before the Tutan, who out of hand giueth sentence. Other not taken so openly, which do need trial, are the malefactors put to execution once a yeere in the chiefe cities, to keepe in awe the people: or condemned, do remaine in prison, looking for their day. The cues being taken are caried to prison from one place to another in a chest vpon mens shoulders, hited therfore by the king, the chest is 6. handfuls high, the prisoner sitteth therein vpon a bench, the corner of the chest is two boozes, amid them both a pillery-like hole, for the prisoners necke, there sitteth he with his head without the chest, and the rest of his body within, not able to mooue or turne his head this way or that way, nor to plucke it in: the necessities of nature he doydeeth at a hole in the bottom of the chest, the meate he eateth is put into his mouth by others. There abideth he day and night during his whoie iourney: if happily his porters stumble, or the chest do iogge or be set downe carelesly, it turneth to his great paines that sitteth therein, al such motions being vnto him hanging as it were. Thus were our companions caried fro Cincoo, 7. daies iourney, neuer taking any rest as afterward they told vs, & their greatest griefe was to stay by the way: as soone as they came, being taken out of the chests, they were not able to stand on their feet, and two of them died shortly after. When we lay in prison at Fuquico, we came many times abroad, & were brought to the pallaces of noble men, to be seene of them & their wiues, for that they had neuer seene any Portugale before. Many things they asked vs of our Country, and our fashions, & did write euery thing, for they be curious in nouelties about measure. The gentlemen shew great courtesie vnto strangers, and so did we finde at their hands, and because that many times we were brought abroad into the City, somewhat will I say of such things as I did see therein, being a gallant City, and chiefe in one of the 13. shires aforesaid. The City Fuquico is very great, & mightily walled with square stone both within and without, and, as it may seeme by the breadth thereof, filled vp in the middle with earth, layd ouer with bricke & couered with tyle, after the maner of porches or galleries, that one might dwell therein. The staires they be are so easily made, that one may go them vp and downe a horse-backe, as eftsloones they do: the streets are paved, as already it hath bin said: there be a great number of Merchantes, euery one hath written in a great table at his doore such things as he hath to sel. In like maner euery artificer painteth out his craft: the market places be large, great abundance of al things there be to be sold. The city standeth vpon water, many streames run through it, the banks pitched, & so broad that they serue for streets to the cities be.ouer the streams are sundry bridges both of timber & stone, which being made leuel with the streets, hinder not the passage of the barges too and fro, the channells are so deepe. Where the streames come in and go out of the city, be certaine arches in the wal, there go in and out their Parai, that is a kind of barges they haue, & that in the day time only: at night these arches are closed vp with gates, so do they shut vp al the gates of the City. These streames and barges do ennobleth very much the City, and make it as it were to seeme another Venice. The buildings are euen, wel made, high, not lofted, except it be some wherein marchandise is sold. It is a world to see how great these cities are, and the cause is, for that the houses are built euen, as I haue said, & do take a great deale of roome. One thing we saw in this city that made vs al to wonder, and is worthy to be noted: namely, ouer a porch at the coming in to one of the aforesaid 4. houses, which the king hath in euery shire for his gouernors, as I haue erst said, standeth a tower built vpon 40. pillars, ech one whereof is but one stone, ech one 40. handfuls or spans long: in bredth or compasse 12, as many of vs did measure them. Besides this, their greatnesse is such in one picce, that it might seeme impossible to worke them: they be moreouer cornered, and in colour, length and bredth so like, that the one nothing differeth from the other. This thing made vs all to wonder very much.

We are wont to call this country China, and the people Chineans, but as long as we were prisoners, not hearing amongst them at any time that name, I determined to learne how they were called: and asked sometimes by them thereof, for that they vnderstood vs not when we called them Chineans, I answered them, that al the inhabitants of India named them Chineans, wherefore I praised them that they would tel me, for what occasiō they are so called, whether peraduenture any city of theirs bare that name. Hereunto they alwayes answered me, y they haue no such name, nor euer had. Then did I aske them what name the whole Country beareth, & what they would answer being asked of other nations what countrymen they were: It was told me that of ancient time in this country had bin many kings, & though presently it were al vnder one, ech kingdom nevertheless enioyed that name it first had, these kingdomes are the prouinces I spake of before. In conclusion they said, that the whole country is called Tamen, & the inhabitants Tamegines, so that this name China or Chineans, is not heard of in y country. I thinke that the neernesse of another prouince therabout called Cochinchina, & the inhabitants thereof Cochineses, first discovered before China was lying not far from Malacca, did giue occasion to ech of the nations, of that name Chineans, as also the whole country to be named China. But their proper name is that aforesaid.

Fuquico.

Vercof tosoyt.

Parai.

Tamen the proper name of China.

I haue heard mozeouer that in the City of Nanquim remaineth a table of gold, and in it written a kings name, as a memory of that residence the kings were wont to keepe there. This table standeth in a great pallace, couered alwayes, except it be on some of their festiual dayes, at what time they are wont to let it be seene, couered neuerthelesse as it is, all the nobilitie of the City going of duerie to doe it euery day reuerence. The like is done in the head Cities of all the other Shires in the pallaces of the Ponchiassini, wherein these aforesaid tables doe stand with the kings name written in them, although no reuerence be done thereunto but in solemne feastes.

I haue likewise vnderstood that the City Pachin, where the king maketh his abode, is so great, that to go from one side to the other, besides the Suburbs, the which are greater then the City it selfe, it requireth one whole day a horseback, going hackney pale. In the suburbs be many wealthy marchants of all sorts. They told me furthermore that it was moted about, and in the motes great stoze of fish, whereof the king maketh great games.

It was also told me that the king of China had no king to wage battel withall, besides the Tartars, with whom he had concluded a peace moze then 80. yeres ago. Neuerthelesse their friendship was not so great, that the one nation might marry with the other. And demanding with whom they married, they said, that in olde time the Chinish kings when they would marry their daughters, accustomed to make a solemne feast, whereunto came all sorts of men. The daughter that was to be married, stood in a place where she might see them all, and looke whom she liked best, him did she chuse to husband, and if happely he were of a base condition, hee became by and by a gentleman: but this custome hath bene left long since. Now a dayes the king marieth his daughters at his owne pleasure, with great men of the kingdome: the like order he obserueth in the marriage of his sonnes.

They haue mozeouer one thing very good, and that which made vs all to marueile at them being Gentiles: namely, that there be hospitals in all their Cities, alwayes full of people, we neuer saw any pooze body begge. We therefore asked the cause of this: answered it was, that in euery City there is a great circuit, wherein be many houses for pooze people, for blinde, lame, old folke, not able to trauaile for age, nor hauing any other meanes to liue. These folke haue in the aforesaid houses euery plentie of rice during their liues, but nothing else. Such as be receiued into these houses, come in after this maner. When one is sicke, blinde or lame, he maketh a supplication to the Ponchiassi, and prouing that to be true he writeth, he remaineth in the aforesaid great lodging as long as he liueth: besides this they keepe in these places swine and hennies, whereby the pooze be relieved without going a begging.

I said befoze that China was full of riuers, but now I minde to confirme the same anew: for the farther we went into the Countrey, the greater we found the riuers. Sometimes we were so farre off from the sea, that where we came no sea fish had bene seene, and salt was there very deare, of fresh water fish yet was there great abundance, and that fish very good: they keepe it good after this maner. Where the riuers do meete, and so passe into the sea, there lieth great stoze of boats, specially where no salt-water commeth, and that in March and April. These boats are so many that it seemeth wonderfull, ne serue they for other then to take small fish. By the riuers sides they make leynes of fine and strong nettes, that lye thre handfuls vnder water, and one about to keepe and nourish their fish in, vntill such time as other fishers do come with boats, bringing for that purpose certaine great chests lined with paper, able to holde water, wherein they cary their fish up and downe the river, euery day renewing the chest with fresh water, and selling their fish in euery City, towne and village where they passe, vnto the people as they neede it: most of them haue net leynes to keepe fish in alwayes for their prouision. Where the greater boats cannot passe any further forwarde, they take lesser, and because the whole Countrey is very well watered, there is so great pleny of diuers sorts of fish, that it is wonderfull to see: assuredly we were amazed to behold the maner of their prouision. Their fish is chiefly nourished with the dung of Wisses and oren, that greatly fatteth it. Although I said their fishing to be in March and April at what time we saw them do it, neuerthelesse they told vs that they fished at all times, for that vsually they do feed on fish, wherefoze it behoueth them to make their prouision continually.

When we had passed Fuquien, we went into Quicin shire, where the fine clay bestell is made, as I said befoze: and we came to a City, the one side whereof is built vpon the foote of a hill, whereby passeth a river nauigable: there we tooke boat, and went by water toward the Sea: on each side of the river we found many Cities, Townes and villages, wherein we saw great stoze of marchandize, but specially of fine clay: there did we land by the way to buy victuals and other necessities. Going downe this river Southward, we were glad that wee dyew neere vnto a warmer Countrey, from whence we had bene farre distant: this Countrey we passed throught in eight dayes, for our iourney lay downe the streame. Befoze that I doe say any thing of that shire we came came into, I will first speake of the great City of Quicim, wherein alwayes remaineth a Turan; that is a gouernour, as you haue seene, though some Turans do gouerne two or thre shires.

That Turan that was condemned for our cause, of whom I spake before, was boine in this Countrey, but he gouerned Foquien shire: nothing it auailed him to be so great an officer. This Countrey is so great, that in many places where we went, there had bene as yet no talke of his death, although he were executed a whole yere before. At the Citie Quanche whither we came, the riuer was so great that it seemed a Sea, though it were so litle where we tooke water, that we needed small boats. One day about 9. of the clocke, beginning to row neere the walls with the streame, we came at noone to a bidge made of many barges, ouerlinked al together with two mighty cheines. There stayed we untill it was late, but we saw not one go either by thereon or downe, except two Loueas that about the going downe of the Sunne, came and set them downe there, the one on one side, the other on the other side. Then was the bidge opened in many places, and barges both great and small to the number of sixe hundred began to passe: those that went by the streame at one place, such as came downe at an other. When all had thus shot the bidge, then was it shut vp againe. We heare say that euery day they take this order in all principall places of marchandize, for paying of the Custome vnto the king, especially for salt, whereof the greatest reuenues are made that the king hath in this Countrey. The passages of the bidge where it is opened, be so neere the shoare, that nothing can passe without touching the same. To stay the barges at their pleasure, that they goe no further forward, are vfed certaine iron instruments. The bidge consisteth of 112. barges, there stayed we untill the euenng that they were opened, lothsomely oppressed by the multitude of people that came to see vs, so many in number, that we were enforced to go aside from the banke untill such time as the bidge was opened: howbeit we were neuertheless thronged about with many boates full of people. And though in other Cities and places where we went, the people came so importunate vpon vs, that it was needfull to withdraw our selues: yet were we here much moze molested for the number of people: & this bidge is the principall way out of the Citie vnto another place so wel inhabited, that were it walled about, it might be compared to the Citie. When we had shot the bidge, we kept along the Citie vntill it was night, and then met we with an other riuer that ioyned with this, we rowed by that by the walls untill we came to another bidge gallantly made of barges, but lesse a great deale then that other bidge ouer the greater streame: here stayed we that night, and other two dayes with moze quiet, being out of the plesse of the people. These riuers do meet without at one corner point of the Citie. In either of them were so many barges great and small, that we all thought them at the least to be about three thousand: the greater number thereof was in the lesser riuer, where we were. Amongst the rest here lay certaine greater vessels, called in their language Parai, that serue for the Turan, when he taketh his voyage by other riuers that ioyne with this, towards Pachin, where the king maketh his abode. For, as many times I haue erst said, all this Countrey is full of riuers. Desirous to see those Parai we got into some of them, where we found some chambers set forth with gilded beds very richly, other furnished with tables and seats, and all other things so neat and in perfection, that it was wonderfull.

Quicim shire, as farre as I can perceiue, lieth vpon the South. On that side we kept at our first entry thereinto, traaueling not farre from the high mountaines we saw there. Asking what people dwelleth beyond those mountaines, it was told me that they be theues & men of a strange language. And because that vnto sundry places neere this riuer the mountaines doe appoach, whence the people issuing downe do many times great harme, this order is taken at the entry into Quicim shire. To guard this riuer whereon continually go to & fro Parai great & small fraught with salt, fish poudred with pepper, and other necessaries for that countrey, they do lay in diuers places certaine Parai, and great barges armed, wherein watch and ward is kept day and night on both sides of the riuer, for the safety of the passage, & securitie of such Parai as do remaine there, though the traauellers neuer go but many in company. In euery rode there be at the least thirtie, in some two hundred men, as the passage requireth. This guard is kept vsually untill you come to the City Onchio, where continually the Tucan of this shire, and eke of Cantan, maketh his abode. From that City byward, where the riuer waxeth moze narrow, and the passage moze dangerous, there be attaynes armed one hundred and fiftie Parai, to accompany other vessels fraught with marchandize, and all this at the Kings charges. This seemed to me one of the strangest things I did see in this Countrey.

When we lay at Fuquien, we did see certaine Moores, who knew so litle of their secte, that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moore, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore, with some other wordes of their Alcoran, wherewithall, in abstinence from swines flesh, they liue untill the diuel take them all. This when I saw, & being sure that in many Chinich Cities the reliques of Mahomet are kept, as soone as we came to the City where these fellowses be, I enformed my selfe of them, and learned the truely.

These Moores, as they tolde me, in times past came in great ships fraught with marchandise from Pachin ward, to a port granted vnto them by the king, as hee is wont to all them that traffique into this Countrey, where they being arrived at a little Towne standing in the hauens mouth, in time conuerted vnto their sect the greatest Lourea there. When that Lourea with all his family was become Moorish, the rest began likewise to doe the same. In this part of China the people be at libertie, euery one to worship and follow what him liketh best. Wherefore no body tooke heed thereto, vntill such time as the Moores perswading that many followed them in superstition, and that the Lourea fauoured them, they began to forbid wholly the eating of Swines flesh. But all these countrey men and women chosing rather to forsake father and mother, then to leaue off eating of pork, by no meanes would yeeld to that proclamation. For besides the great desire they all haue to eate that kinde of meate, many of them do liue thereby: and therefore the people complained vnto the Magistrates, accusing the Moores of a conspiracie pretended betwixt them and the Lourea against their king. In this countrey, as no suspicion, no not one traitterous word is long borne withall, so was the king speedily aduertised thereof, who gaue commandement out of hand that the aforesaid Lourea should be put to death, and with him the Moores of most importance: the other to be layde first in prison, and afterward to be sent abroad into certaine Cities, where they remained perpetuall slaves vnto the king. To this City came by happe men and women threescore and odd, who at this day are brought to fife men and foure women, for it is now twenty yeeres since this happened. Their offspring passeth the number of two hundred, and they in this City, as the rest in other Cities whither they were sent, haue their ^{*}Moscheas, whereunto they all resort euery Friday to keepe their holy day. But, as I thinke, that will no longer endure, then whiles they doe liue that came from thence, for their posteritie is so confused, that they haue nothing of a Moore in them but abstinence from Swines flesh, and yet many of them doe eate thereof pynily. They tell mee that their natiue Countrey hath name Camarian, a firme land, wherein be many kings, and the Indish countrey well known vnto them. It may so be: for as soone as they did see our seruants (our seruants were Preuzarettes) they iudged them to be Indians: many of their wordes sounded vpon the Persian tongue, but none of vs coulde vnderstand them. I asked them whether they conuerted any of the Chinish nation vnto their secte: they answered mee, that with much a doe they conuerted the women with whom they doe marry, peelding me no other cause thereof, but the difficultie they finde in them to be brought from eating Twines flesh and drinkeing of wine. I am perswaded therefore, that if this Countrey were in league with vs, forbidding them neither of both, it would be an easie matter to draw them to our Religion, from their superstition, whereat they themselves do laugh when they do their idolatry.

I haue learned moreouer that the Sea, whereby these Moores that came to China were wont to traualle, is a very great gulfe, that falleth into this Countrey out from Tartaria and Persia, leauing on the other side all the Countrey of China, and land of the Mogores, drawing alwayes toward the South: and of all likelihood it is euen so, because that these Moores, the which we haue seene, be rather browne then white, whereby they shewe themselves to come from some warmer Countrey then China is neere to Pachin, where the riuers are frozen in the Winter for colde, and many of them so vehemently, that carts may passe ouer them.

We did see in this Citie many Tartars, Mogores, Brames, and Laoynes, both men and women. The Tartars are men very white, good horsemen and archers, confining with China on that side where Pachin standeth, separated from thence by great mountaines that are betwixt these kingdomes.ouer them be certaine wayes to passe, and for both sides, Castles continually kept with Souldiers: in time past the Tartars were wont alwayes to haue warres with the Chineans, but these fourescore yeeres past they were quiet, vntill the second yeere of our impi-sonment. The Mogores be in like maner white, and heathen, we are aduertised that of one side they border vpon these Tartars, and confine with the Persian Tartars on the other side, whereof wee saue in them some tokens, as their maner of clothes, and that kinde of hat the Saracens doe weare. The Moores affirmed, that where the king lyeth, there be many Tartars and Mogores, that brought into China certaine beekes of great value: all we thought it to be Vanil of Cambaia wont to be sold at Ormus. So that this is the true situation of that Countrey, not in the North parts, as many times I haue heard say, confining with Germanie.

As for the Brames we haue seene in this city Chenchi certaine men & women, amongst whom there was one that came not long since, hauing as yet her haire tied by after the Pegues fashion: this woman, and other mo with whom a black Moore damsel in our company had conference, and did vnderstand them wel pnuough, had dwelt in Pegu. This new come woman, imagining that we ment to make our abode in that citie, bid vs to be of good comfort, for that her countrey was not distant from thence aboue five dayes iourney, and that out of her countrey there lay a high way for vs home into our owne. Being asked the way, she answered that the first thre daies the way lieth ouer certaine great mountaines & wilderness, afterward people are met withall againe. Thence two dayes iourney more to the Brames countrey. Wherefore I doe conclude, that Chenchi is one of the confines of this kingdome, separated by certaine huge mountaines, as it hath bene already said, that lie out to wards the South. In the residue of these mountaines standeth the prouince of Sian, the Laoyns countrey, Cambodia, Campaa, and Cochinchina.

This citie, chiefe of other sixteene, is situated in a pleasant plaine abounding in all things necessary, sea-fish onely excepted, for it standeth farre from the sea: of fresh fish so much more, that the market places are neuer empty. The walles of this citie are very strong and high: one day did I see the Loureas thereof go vpon the walles to take the view thereof, bozne in their feates which I spake of before, accompanied with a troupe of horsemen that went two and two: It was tolde me they might haue gone thre & thre. We haue siene moreover, that within this aforesayde Citie the king hath more then a thousande of his kinne lodged in great pallaces, in diuerse partes of the Citie: their gates be redde, and the entrie into their houses, that they may be knowen, for that is the kings colour. These Gentlemen, according to their necessity in blood vnto the king, as soone as they be married receiue their place in honour: this place neither increaseth nor diminisheth in any respect as long as the king liueth, the king appointeth them their wiues and familie, allowing them by the moneth all things necessary abundantly, as he doth to his gouernours of shires and Cities, howbeit, not one of these hath as long as he liueth any charge or gouernement at all: They giue themselves to eating and drinking, and be for the most part butly men of bodie, insomuch that espying any one of them whom we had not seene before, we might knowe him to be the King his colin. They be neuertheless very pleasant, courteous, and faire conditioned: neither did we find, all the time wee were in that citie, so much honour and good intertainement any where as at their hands. They bid vs to their houses to eate and drinke, and when they found vs not, or we were not willing to go with them, they bid our seruants and slaues, causing them to sit downe with the first. Notwithstanding the good lodging these Gentlemen haue, so commodious that they want nothing, yet are they in this bondage, that during life they neuer goe abroad. The cause, as I did vnderstand, wherefore the king so vseth his colins is, that none of them at any time may rebell against him: and thus he shutteth them vp in thre or foure other cities. Most of them can play on the Lute, and to make that kinde of pastime peculiar vnto them onely, all other in the cities where they doe liue be forbidden that instrument, the Curisians and blinde folke onely excepted, who be musicians and can play.

This king furthermore, for the greater securitie of his Realme and the auoyding of tumults, letteth not one in all his countrey to be called Lord, except he be of his blood. Manie great estates and gouernours there be, that during their office are lodged Lordlike, and doe heare the port of mightie Princes: but they be so many times displaced and other placed a new, that they haue not the time to become corrupt. True it is that during their office they be well provided for, as afterward also lodged at the kings charges, and in pension as long as they liue, payed them monethly in the cities where they dwell by certaine officers appointed for that purpose. The king then is a Lord onely, not one besides him as you haue seene, except it be such as be of his blood. A Nephew likewise of the king, the kings sisters sonne, lyeth continually within the walles of the citie in a strong pallace built Castlewise, euen as his other colins do, remayning alwayes within dodges, secured by Eunuches, neuer dealing with any matters. On their festiual dayes, new moones, & full moones the magistrates make great banquetes, and so do such as be of the king his blood. The kings Nephew hath to name Vanfuli, his pallace is walled about, the wall is not high but foure-square, and in circuit nothing inferiour to the wals of Goa, the outside is painted red, in euery square a gate, and ouer each gate a tower made of timber excellently well wrought: before the principall gate of the foure that openeth into the high streete no Lourea, be he neuer so great, may passe on horsebacke, or carried in his seat. Amidst this quadrangle standeth the pallace where that Nobleman lyeth, doubtlesse worth the sight, although we came not in to see it. By report the roofes of the towers and house are glazed greene, & the greater part of the quadrangle set with sauage trees, as Okes, Chestnuts, Cypresses, Pine-apples, Cedars, and other such like that we do want, after the manner of a wood, wherein are kept Stags, Deer, and other beasts, for that Lord his recreation neuer going abroad as I haue sayd. One preeminence this citie hath aboue the rest where we haue bene, & that of right, as we do thinke, that besides the multitude of market places wherein all things are to be sold through every euery streete continually are cryed all things necessary, as flesh of all sortes, fresh fish, hearbes, oyle, vinegar, meale, rife: in summa, all things so plentifully, that many houses neede no seruants, euery thing being brought to their doores. Most part of the marchants remaine in the suburbs, for that the cities are shut vp euery night, as I haue sayd. The marchants therefore, the better to attend their businesse, do chuse rather to make their abode without in the suburbs then within the cite. I haue seene in this riuer a petic kinde of fishing, not to be omitted in my opinion, and therefore I will set it downe. The king hath in many riuers good stoe of barges full of sea-crowes that breed, are fedde, and doe die therein, in certaine cages, allowed monethly a certaine prouision of rife. These barges the king bestoweth vpon his greatest magnificates, giuing to some two, to some thre of them as he thinketh good, to fish therewithall after this manner. At the houre appointed to fish, all the barges are brought together in a circle, where the riuer is shallow, and the crowes tyed together vnder the wings are let leape downe into the water, some vnder, some aboue, woorth the looking vpon: each one, as he hath filled his bagge, goeth to his owne barge and emptieth it, which done, he reurneth to fish againe. Thus hauing taken good stoe of fish, they set the crowes at libertie, and do suffer them to fish for their owne pleasure. There were in that cite where I was, twentie barges at the least of these asforesayd crowes. I went almost euery day to see them, yet could I neuer be thoroughly satisfied to see so strange a kind of fishing.

Of the Iland Japan, and other litle Iles in the East Ocean.

By R. Willes.

He extreame part of the knowne world vnto vs is the noble Iland Giapan, written other wise Japon and Iapan. This Iland standeth in the East Ocean, beyond all Asia, betwixt Cathayo and the West Indies fire and thirtie degrees Northward from the Equinoctial line, in the same clime with the South part of Spaine and Portugall, distant from thence by sea fixe thousand leagues: the traualle thither, both for ciuill discorde, great pyracie, and often shipwracks is very dangerous. This countrey is hillie and pestered with snow, wherefoze it is neither so warme as Portugall, nor yet so wealthy, as far as we can learne, wanting oyle, butter, cheese, milke, egges, sugar, honny, vinegar, saffron, cynamom and pepper. Barley-byanne the Ilanders doe vse in stead of ale: medicinable things holtsome for the bodie haue they none at all. Neuerthelesse in that Iland sundry fruites doe growe, not much unlike the fruites of Spaine: and great stoe of Siluer mynes are therein to be seene. The people are tractable, ciuill, wittie, courteous, without deceit, in vertue and honest conuersation exceeding all other nations lately discovered, but so much standing vpon their reputation, that their chiefe Iosle may be thought honour. The contempt thereof causeth among them much discorde and debate, manslaughter and murther: euen for their reputation they doe honour their parents, keepe their promises, abstaine from adulterie and robberies, punishing by death the least robbery done, holding for a principle, that whosoener stealeth a trifle, will, if he see occasion, steale a greater thing. It may be thes is so severely punished of them, for that the nation is oppressed with scarcitie of all things necessary, and so poore, that euen for miserie they strangle their owne children, preferring death before want. These fellows doe neither eate nor kill any foule. They liue chiefly by fish, hearbes, and fruites, so healthfully, that they die very old. Of Rice and Wheat there is no great stoe. No man is ashamed there of his pueritie, neither be their gentlemen therefore lesse honoured of the meaner people, neither will the poorest gentleman there match his child with the baser sort for any gaine, so much they do make more account of gentry then of wealth. The greatest delight they haue is in armour, each boy at fourteene yeeres of age, be he borne gentle or otherwise, hath his sword and dagger: very good archers they be, contemning all other nations in comparison of their manhood and prowesse, putting not vp one iniurie be it neuer so small in word or deed, among themselves. They feede moderately, but they drinke largely. The vse of vines they knowe not, their drinke they make of Rice, vicerly they doe abhorre dice, and all games, accounting nothing more vile in a man, then to giue himselfe vnto those things that make vs greedy and desirous to get other mens goods. At any time they do sweare, for that seldom they are wont to doe, they sweare by the Sunne: many of them are taught good letters, wherefoze they may so much the sooner be brought vnto Christianitie. Each one is contented with one wife: they be all desirous to learne, & naturally inclined vnto honesty & courtesie: godly talke they listen vnto willingly, especially whe they vnderstand it thoroughly. Their gouernment consisteth of 3 estates. The first place is due vnto the high Priest, by whose lawes & decrees all publike and priuate private matters appertaining to religion are decided. The seces of their clergie men, whom they doe call Bonzi, be of no estimation or authoritie except the high Priest by letters patent doe confirme the same: he confirmeth and alloweth of their Tundi, who be as it were Bishops, although in many places they are nominated by sundry Princes. These Tundi are greatly honoured of all sorts: they doe giue benefices vnto inferiour ministers, and do grant licences for many things as to eate flesh vpon those dayes they goe in pilgrimage to their Idoles with such like priuileges. Finally, this high Priest wont to be chosen in China for his wisdom and learning, made in Japan for his gentry and birth, hath so large a Dominion and reuenues so great, that esteemes he beareth the poore Kings and Princes there.

Great stoe of

Their second principal Magistrate, in their language Vo, is the chiefe Verehaught, made by succession and birth, honoured as a God. This Gentleman neuer toucheth the ground with his foote without forfeiting of his office, he neuer goeth abroad out of his house, nor is at all times to be seene. At home he is either carried about in a litter, or els he goeth in wooden Choppines a foote high from the ground: commonly he sitteth in his chaire with a sword in one side, and a bow and arrowes in the other, next his bodie he weareth blacke, his outward garments be red, all shadowed ouer with Cypresse, at his cappe hang certaine Lambeaur much like vnto a Bishops Mitre, his forehead is painted white and red, he eateth his meat in earthen dishes. This Verehaught determineth in all Japan the diuerse titles of honour, wherof in that Island is great plentie, each one particularly known by his badge, commonly seene in sealing by their letters, and dayly altered according to their degrees. About this Vo every Noble man hath his Soliciter, for the nation is so desirous of praise and honour, that they strue among themselves who may be his best. By these meanes the Verehaught groweth so rich, that although hee haue neither land nor any reuenues otherwise; yet may he be accounted the wealthiest man in all Japan. For three causes this great Magistrate may loose his office: first, if he touch the ground with his foote, as it hath bene already said: next, if he kill any body: thirdly, if he be found an enemy vnto peace and quietnesse, howbeit neither of these aforesaid causes is sufficient to put him to death.

Their third chiefe officer is a Judge, his office is to take vp and to end matters in controuersie, to determine of warres and peace, that which he thinketh right, to punish rebels, wherein he may commaund the noble men to assist him vpon paine of forfeiting their goods: neuertheless at all times he is not obeyed, for that many matters are ended rather by might and armes, then determined by law. Other controuersies are decided either in the Temporal Court, as it seemeth good vnto the Princes, or in the Spirituall consistorie before the Tundi.

Rebels are executed in this manner, especially if they be noble men or officers. The king looke what day he giueth sentence against any one, the same day the partie, wheresoeuer he be, is advertised thereof, and the day told him of his execution. The condemned person asketh of the messenger whether it may bee lawfull for him to kill himselfe: the which thing when the king doeth graunt, the partie taking it for an honour, putteth on his best apparell and launcing his body a crosse from the breast downe all the belly, murthereth himselfe. This kind of death they take to be without infamie, neither doe their children for their fathers crime so punished, loose their goods. But if the king referre them to be executed by the hangman, then flocketh he together his children, his seruants, and friends home to his house, to preserue his life by force. The king committeth the fetching of him out vnto his chiefe Judge, who first setteth vpon him with bow and arrowes, and afterward with pikes and swords, vntill the rebell and all his family be flaine to their perpetuall ignominie and shame.

The Indie-writers make mention of sundry great cities in this Island, as Cangozima a hauen towne in the South part thereof, and Meaco distant from thence three hundred leagues northward, the royall seat of the king and most wealthy of all other townes in that Island. The people thereabout are very noble, and their language the best Iaponish. In Meaco are sayd to be vniuersitie houses inhabited and vnto, a famous Vniuersitie, and in it five principall Colleges, besides closes & cloysters of Bonzi, Leguixil, and Hamacata, that is, Priests, Monks and Nunnes. Other five notable Vniuersities there be in Japan, namely, Coia, Negru, Homi, Frenoi, and Bandu. The first foure haue in them at the least three thousand & five hundred scholars: in the fifth are many mo. For Bandu prouince is very great and possessed with five princes, five whereof are vassals vnto the sixt, yet he himselfe subiect vnto the Iaponish king, usually called the great king of Meaco: lesser scholes there be many in diuers places of this Islande. And thus much specially concerning this glorious Island, among so many barbarous nations and rude regions, haue I gathered together in one summe, out of sundry letters written from thence into Europe, by no lesse faithfull reporters than famous travellers, for confirmation wherof, as also for the knowledge of other things not conceyned in the premises, the curious readers may peruse these 4 volumes of Indian matters written long ago in Italian, and of late compendiously made latine, by Petrus Maffieus my olde acquainted friend, entituling the same, De rebus Iaponicis. One whole letter out of the fift booke thereof, specially intreating of that countrey, I haue done into English word for word in such wise as followeth.

Aloisius Froes to his companions in Iesus Christ that remaine in China and India.

The last yeere, deare brethren, I wrote vnto you from Firando, how Cosmus Turrianus had appointed me to trauaile to Meaco to helpe Gaspar Vilela, for that thre the haruest was great, the labourers few, and that I should haue for my companion in that iourney Aloisius Almeida. It seemeth now my part, hauing by the helpe of God ended so long a voyage, to signifie vnto you by letter such things specially as I might thinke you would most delight to know. And because at the beginning Almeida and I so parted the whole labour of writing letters betwixt vs, that he should speake of our voyage, and such things as happened therein, I should make relation of the Meachians estate, & write what I could well learne of the Iapans manners and conditions: setting aside all discourses of our voyage, that which standeth me vpon I will discharge in this Epistle, that you considering how artificially, how cunningly, vnder the pretext of religion, that craftie aduersary of mankind leadeth and draweth vnto perdition the Iapanish mindes, blinded with many superstitions and ceremonies, may the more pittie this Nation.

The inhabitants of Iapan, as men that neuer had greatly to doe with other Nations, in their Geography diuided the whole world into thre parts, Iapan, Sian, and China. And albeit the Iapans receiued out of Sian and China their superstitions and ceremonies, yet do they neuer thelesse contemne all other nations in comparisson of themselves, and standing in their owne conceite doe far preferre themselves before all other sorts of people in wisdome and policie.

Touching the situation of the countrey and nature of the soyle, vnto the things elssoones erst written, this one thing I will adde: in these Ilands, the sommer to be most hot, the winter extreme cold. In the kingdome of Canga, as we call it, falleth so much snow, that the houses being buried in it, the inhabitants keepe within doores certaine moneths of the yeere, hauing no way to come forth except they breake by the tiles. Whirlewindes most behement, earthquakes so common, that the Iapans dread such kind of feares little or nothing at all. The countrey is full of siluer mines other wise barren, not so much by fault of nature, as through the sturthfulness of the inhabitants: howbeit Oren they keepe and that for tillage sake onely. The ayre is hole some, the waters good, the people very faire and well bodied: bare headed commonly. they goe, procuring baldnesse with sorrow and teares, elssoones rooting by with pins all the haire of their heads as it groweth, except it be a little behind, the which they knot and keepe with all diligence. Euen from their childhood they weare daggers and swords, the which they vse to lay vnder their pillowes when they goe to bed: in shew courteous and affable, in deede haughtie and proud. They delight most in warlike affaires, and their greatest studie is armes. Mens apparell diuersely coloured is worne downe halfe the legges and to the elbowes: womens attyre made handsomely like vnto a haile, is somewhat longer: all manner of dicing and theft they doe eschue. The marchant, although he be wealthy, is not accounted of. Gentlemen, be they neuer so poore, recaine their place: most precisely they stande vpon their honour and woorthinesse, ceremoniously strutting among themselves in courtlies and faire speeches. Wherein if any one happily be lesse carefull than he should be, euen for a trifle many times he getteth euill will. Want, though it trouble most of them, so much they doe detest, that poore men cruelly taking pittie of their infants newly borne, especially girles, do many times with their owne fecet strangle them. Noble men, and other like wise of meaner calling generally haue but one wife a peece, by whom although they haue issue, yet for a trifle they diuorce themselves from their wiues, and the wiues also sometimes from their husbands, to marry with others. After the second degree consins may there lawfully marry. Adoption of other mens children is much bled among them. In great towne most men and women can write and read.

This Nation feedeth sparingly, their vsuall meat is rice and salets, and neere the sea side fish. They feast one another many times, wherein they vse great diligence, especially in drinking one to another, insomuch that the better sort, least they might rudely commit some fault therein, doe vse to reade certaine bookes written of duties and ceremonies apperteyning vnto banquets. To be delicate and fine, they put their meate into their mouthes with little forks, accounting it great rudenesse to touch it with their fingers: winter & sommer they drinke water as hot as they may possibly abide it. Their houses are in danger of fire, but finely made and cleane, layde all ouer with strawe-pallets, whereupon they doe both sit in stead of Fooles, and lie in their clothes with billets vnder their heads. For feare of defiling these pallets, they goe either barefoote within doores, or weare strawe pantofles on their buskins when they come abroad, the which they lay aside at their returne home againe. Gentlemen for the most part do passe the night in banketting, misticke, & vaine discourses, they sleepe the day time. In Meaco and Sacato there is good stoepe of beds, but they be very litle, and may be compared vnto our pures.

In bringing vp their childzen they vse words only to rebuke them, admonishing as diligently and aduisedly boyes of sixe or seuen yeeres of age, as though they were olde men. They are giuen very much to intertaine strangers, of whom most curiously they loue to aske euen in riddles what fortaine nations doe, and their fashions. Such arguments and reasons as be manifest, and are made plaine with examples, doe greatly perswade them. They detest all kinde of theft, who-soeuer is taken in that fault may be faine freely of any bodie. No publike prisons, no common gayles, no ordinary Iusticers: priuately each householder hath the hearing of matters at home in his owne house, and the punishing of greater crimes that deserue death without delay. Thus v- finally the people is kept in awe and feare.

About foure hundred yeeres past (as in their olde recordes we finde) all Iapan was subiect vnto one Emperour whose royall seat was Meaco, in the Iaponish language called Cubucama. But the nobilitie rebelling against him, by litle and litle haue taken away the greatest part of his dominion, howbeit his title continually remaineth and the residue in some respect doe make great account of him still, acknowledging him for their superiour. Thus the Emperre of Iapan, in times past but one alone, is now diuiden into sixtie sixe kingdomes, the onely cause of ciuill warres continually in that Iland, to no small hinderance of the Gospell, whilst the kings that dwell neare together inuade one another, each one conueting to make his kingdome greater. Furthermore in the citie Meaco is the pallace of the high Priest, whom that nation honoureth as a God, he hath in his house 366 Idoles, one whereof by course is euery night set by his side for a watchman. He is thought of the common people to holpy, that it may not be lawfull for him to goe vpon the earth: if happily he doe set one foote to the ground, he loseth his office. He is not seruicd very sumptuously he is maintained by almes. The heads and beards of his ministers are shauen, they haue name Cangues, and their authoritie is great throughout all Iapan. The Cubucama sendeth them for Embassadors to decide controuersies betwixt princes and to end their warres, whereof they were wont to make very great gaine. It is now two yeres since or there about, that one of them came to Bungo, to intreat of peace betwixt the king thereof and the king of Amanguzzo. This Agent fauouring the king of Bungo his cause moze then the other, brought to passe that the foresayd king of Bungo should keepe two kingdomes, the which he had taken in warres from the king of Amanguzzo. Wherefore he had for his reward of the king of Bungo about 30000 ducats. And thus fare hereof.

But his almes are bery good.

I come now to other superstitions and ceremonies, that you may see, deare brethren, that which I said in the beginning, how subtilly the deuill hath deceiued the Iaponish nation, and how diligent and readie they be to obey & worship him. And first, al remembrance and knowldege not onely of Christ our Redeemer, but also of that one God the maker of all things is cleane ertingnished and vterly abolished out of the Iapans hearts. Moreover their superstitious sects are many, whereas it is lawfull for each one to follow that which liketh him best: but the principall sects are two, namely the Amidans and Xacaians. Wherefore in this countrey shall you see many monasteries, not onely of Bonzii men, but also of Bonzia women diuersly attired, for some doe weare white vnder, and blacke vpper garments; other goe apparellled in ash colour, and their Idole hath to name Denichi: from these the Amidanes differ very much. Againe the men Bonzii for the most part dwell in sumptuous houses, and haue great reuenues. These fellows are chaste by commaundement, marry they may not vpon paine of death. In the midst of their Temple is erected an altar, whereon standeth a wooden Idole of Amida, naked from the girdle vpwart, with holes in his eares after the manner of Italian gentlewomen, sitting on a wooden rose goodly to behold. They haue great libraries, and halles for them all to dine and sup together, and bels wherwith they are at certaine houres called to prayers. In the euening the Superintendent giueth each one a theame for meditation. After midnight before the altar in their Temple they do say Pattens as it were out of Xaca his last booke, one quier one verse, the other quier an other. Early in the morning each one giueth himselfe to meditation one houre: they shauē their heads and beards. Their cloysters be very large, and within the precinct thereof, Chappels of the Fotoquiens, for by that name some of the Iaponish Saints are called: their holypates peereles be very many. Most of these Bonzii be gentlemen, for that the Iaponish nobility charged charged with many children, vse to make most of them Bonzii, not being able to leane for each one a patrimony good enough. The Bonzii most couetously bene, know all the wayes how to come by money. They sell vnto the people many scrolles of paper, by the helpe whereof the common people thinketh it selfe warrantred from all power of the deuils. They buy likewise money to be repayed with great vsury in an other worlde, giuing by obligation vnto the lender an assurance thereof, the which departing out of this life he may carry with him to hell.

Inamburu.

There is another great company of such as are called Inamburu, with curled and flaring haire. They make profession to finde out againe things either lost or stolen, after this sort. They set before them a child whom the deuill inuadeth, called by thither by charmes: of that child then doe they aske that which they are desirous to know.

These mens prayers both good and bad are thought greatly to preuaile, insomuch that both their blessings and their curses they sell vnto the people. The nouices of this order, before they be admitted, goe together two or three thousand in a company, by a certaine high mountaine to doe penance there, threescorpe dayes voluntarily punishing themselves. In this time the deuill sheweth himselfe vnto them in sundry shapcs: and they like young graduats, admitted as it were fellows into some certaine companie, are set forth with white cassels hanging about their neckes, and blacke Bonnets that scarcely couer any more then the crowne of their heads. Thus attyzed they range abroade in all Iapan, to set out themselves and their cunning to sale, each one beating his bason which he carieth alwayes about with him, to giue notice of their coming in all townes where they passe.

Genguis.

There is also an other sort called Genguis, that make profession to shewe by soothsaying where stolen things are, and who were the theeves. These dwell in the toppe of an high mountaine, blacke in the face: for the continuall heate of the sunne, for the cold windes, and raines they doe continually endure. They marry but in their owne riue and line: the report goeth that they be hoyned beasts. They climbe vp most high rocks and hilles, and go ouer very great riuers by the onely arte of the deuill, who to bring those wretches the more into error, biddeth them to goe by a certaine high mountaine, where they stand miserably gazing and earnestly looking for him as long as the deuill appointeth them. At the length at nonetide or in the euening cometh that deuill, whom they call Amida among them: to shew himselfe vnto them: this shew breedeth in the braines and hearts of men such a kinde of superstition, that it can by no meanes be rooted out of them afterward.

The deuill was wont also in another mountaine to shew himselfe vnto the Iapanish Nation. Who so was more desirous than other to go to heauen and to enioy Paradise, thither went he to see that sight, and hauing seene the deuill followed him (so by the deuill perswaded) into a denne vntill he came to a decept pit. Into this pit the deuill was wont to leape, and to take with him his worshipper whom he there murdered. This deceit was thus percelued. An old man blinded with this superstition, was by his sonne dissuaded from thence, but all in vaine. Wherefore his sonne followed him pryly into that denne with his bow & arrows, where the deuill gallantly appeared vnto him in the Shape of a man. Whilist the old man falleth downe to worshippinge the deuill, his sonne speedily shooting an arrow at the spirit so appearing, strooke a Fore in stead of a man, so suddenly was that shape altered. This olde man his sonne tracking the Fore so running away, came to that pit whereof I spake, and in the bottome thereof he found many bones of dead men, deceiued by the deuill after that sort in time past. Thus deliuered he his father from present death, and all other from so pestilent an opinion.

There is furthermore a place bearing name Coia, very famous for y multitude of Abbyes which the Bonzii haue therein. The beginner and founder whereof is thought to be one Combendaxis a subtle craftie fellowe, that got the name of holiness by cunning speech, although the lawes and ordinances he made were altogether deuillish: he is said to haue found out the Iapanish letters used at this day. In his latter yeeres this Sim subtle buried himselfe in a fouresquare graue, foure cubites deepe, seuerely forbidding it to be opened, for that then he died not, but rested his bodie wearied with continuall businesse, vntill many thousand thousands of yeeres were passed, after the which time a great learned man named Mirozu should come into Iapan, and then would he rise vp out of his graue againe. About his tombe many lampes are lighted, sent thither out of diuerse prouinces, for that the people are perswaded that whosoever is liberall and beneficiall towards the beautifying of that monument, shall not onely increase in wealth in this world, but in the life to come be safe through Combendaxis helpe. Such as giue themselves to worship him, liue in those Monasteries or Abbyes with shaven heads, as though they had forsaken all secular matters, whereas in deede they wallow in all sortes of wickednesse and lust. In these houses, the which are many (as I sayd) in number, doe remaine 6000 Bonzii, or thereabout besides besides the multitude of lay men, women be restrained from thence vpon paine of death. Anoether company of Bonzii dwelleth at Fatonochai. They teach a great multitude of children all tricks & sleights of guile & theft: whom they do find to be of great cowardnes, those do they instruct in all the perigres of princes, and fashions of the nobilitie, in chivalrie and eloquence, and so send them abroad into other prouinces, attired like pong princes, to this ende, that fauining themselves to be nobly bozne, they may with great summes of money borrowed vnder the colour and pretence of nobilitie returne againe. Wherefore this place is so infamous in all Iapan, that if any scholer of that order be happily taken abroad, he incontinenly dieth for it. Neuerthelesse these counsers leaue not daily to vse their woonted wickednesse and knauerie.

32ozth from Iapan, three hundred leagues out of Meaco, lieth a great countrey of farrage men clothed in beasts skines, rough bodied, with huge beards and monstrous muchaches, the which they hold vp with little forks as they drinke. These people are great drinkers of wine, fierce in warres, and much feared of the Iapans: being hurt in sight, they wash their wounds with salt water, other Surgerie haue they none. In their breasts they are sayd to cary looking glasses: their swordes they tie to their heads, in such wise, that the handle doe rest vpon their shoulders. Seruice and ceremonies haue they none at all, onely they are woont to worship heauen. To Aquira a great towne in that Iaponish kingdom, which we call Geuano, they much resort for marchandise, and the Aquiranes likewise doe trauell into their countrey, howbeit not often, for that there many of them are slaine by the inhabitants,

people 300 leagues to the South of Meaco,

Much more concerning this matter I had to write: but to auoyd tediousnesse I will come to speake of the Iapans madnesse againe, who most desirous of vaine glory doe thinke then specially to get immortall fame, when they procure themselves to be most sumptuously and solemnly buried: their burials and obsequies in the citie Meaco are done after this manner. About one houre before the dead body be brought forth, a great multitude of his friends apparellled in their best aray goe before vnto the fire, with them goe their kinswomen and such as bee of their acquaintance, clothed in white (for that is the mourning colour there) with a changeable coloured vaille on their heads. Each woman hath with her also, according to her abilitie, all her familie trimmed vp in white mockado: the better sort and wealthier women goe in litters of Cedar artificially wrought and richly dresed. In the second place marcheth a great company of footemen sumptuously apparellled. Then as farre off cometh one of these Bonzii master of the ceremonies for that superstition, brauely clad in silkes and gold, in a large and high litter excellently well wrought, accompanied with 30 other Bonzii of thereabout, wearing hats, linnen albes, and fine blacke vpper garments. Then attired in ashe colour (for this colour also is mourning) with a long torch of pineaple, he sheweth the dead body the way vnto the fire, lest it either stumble or ignorantly go out of the way. Well neere 200 Bonzii follow him singing the name of that deuill the which the partie deceased chiefly did worship in his life time, and there withall a very great basson is beaten euen to the place of fire in stead of a bell. Then follow two great paper baskets hanged open at stauers ends full of paper roses diuersly coloured, such as beare them doe march but slowly, shaking euer now and then their stauers, that the aforesayd flowers may fall downe by little and little as it were drops of raine: and be whirled about with wind. This shewer say they is an argument that the soule of the dead man is gone to paradise. After al this, eight bearded Bonzii orderly two and two drag after them on the ground long speares, the points backward, with flags of one cubite a piece, wherein the name also of that idole is written. Then there be caried 10 lanterns trimmed with the former inscription, ouercast with a fine vaille, and candles burning in them. Besides this, two yong men clothed in ashe colour beare pineaple torches, not lighted, of three foote length, the which torches serue to kindle the fire wherein the dead corps is to be burnt. In the same colour follow many other that weare on the crownes of their heads faire, little, threesquare, blacke leathen caps tied fast vnder their chinnes (for that is honorable amongst them) with papers on their heads, wherein the name of the deuill I spake of, is written. And to make it the more solenne, after cometh a man with a table one cubite long, one foot broad, covered with a very fine white vaille, in both sides whereof is written in golden letters the aforesayd name. At the length by foure men is brought forth the corps sitting in a gorgeous litter clothed in white, hanging downe his head and holding his hands together like one that prayed: to the rest of his apparell may you adde an vpper gowne of paper, written full of that booke the which his God is sayd to haue made, when he liued in the world, by whose helpe and merites commonly they doe thinke to be saued. The dead man his children come next after him most gallantly set forth, the pongest wherof carich likewise a pineaple torch to kindle the fire. Last of all followeth a great number of people in such caps as I erst spake of.

The Iapanish
funerall.

They dresse their dead.

When they are al come to þ place appointed for the obsequie, al the Bonzii w the whole multi-tube for the space of one houre, beating pannes and balons with great clamours, call vpon the name of that deuill, the which being ended, the Obsequie is done in this maner. In the midst of a great quadrangle raised about, hanged with course linnen, and agreeably vnto the fource partes of the world made with fource gates to goe in and out at, is digged a hole: in the hole is laied good store of wood, whereon is raised gallantly a waued roofo: before that stand two tables furnished with diuers kinde of meates, especially drie Figs, Pomegranates and Cartes good store, but neither fish nor flesh: vpon one of them standeth also a chafer with coales, and in it sweete wood to make perfumes. When all this is readie, the corpe wherewith the litter was caried, is throwen by a long rope into the fire: as many as are present strue to take the rope in their handes, vsing their aforesayd clamours, which done, they goe in procession as it were round about the quadrangle thise. Then setting the litter on the wood built by ready for the fire that Bonzies who then is master of the ceremonies, saierh a verse that no bodie there vnderstandeth, whirling thise about ouer his head a torch lighted, to signifie thereby that the soule of the dead man had neither any beginning, ne shall haue at any time an ende, and throweth away the torch. Two of the dead man his children, or of his neere kinne, take it vp againe, and standing one at the East side of the litter, the other at the West, doe for honour and reuerence reach it to each other thise ouer the dead corpes, and so cast it into the pile of wood: by and by they throw in oyle, sweete wood, and other perfumes, accordingly as they haue plentie, and so with a great flame bring the corpes to ashes: his children in the meane while putting sweete wood into the chafer at the table with odours, doe solemnly and religiously worship their father as a Saint: which being done, the Bonzii are paid each one in his degree. The master of the ceremonies hath for his part fife duckats, sometimes tenne, sometimes twentie, the rest haue tenne Julies a piece, or els a certaine number of other presents called Caxe. The meate that was ordained, as soone as the dead corpes friends and all the Bonzii are gone, is left for such as serued at the obsequie, for the poore and impotent lazars.

The next day returne to the place of obsequie the dead man his children, his kintred and friends, who gathering vp his ashes, bones, and teeth, doe put them in a gilded pot, and so carie them home, to bee set vp in the same pot couered with cloth, in the midst of their houses. Many Bonzii returne likewise to these priuate funerals, and so doe they againe the seuenth day: then cary they out the ashes to bee buried in a place appointed, laying thereupon a foursquare stone, wherein is written in great letters drawn all the length of the stone, the name of that deuill the which the dead man worshipped in his life time. Euery day afterward his children resort vnto the graue with roses and warme water that the dead corpes thirst not. For the seuenth day onely, but the seuenth moneth and yeere, within their owne houses they renue this obsequie, to no small commodities and gaine of the Bonzii: great rich men doe spend in these their funerals 3000 duckats or thereabout, the meaner sort two or thre hundred. Such as for pouertie be not able to go to that charges, are in the night time darkel long without all pompe and ceremonies buried in a dunghill.

They haue another kinde of buriall, especially neere the Sea side, for them that bee not yet dead. These fellowes are such, as hauing religiously with much deuotion worshipped Amida, now desirous to see him, doe slay themselves. And first they goe certaine dayes begging almes, the which they thrust into their sleeves, then preach they in publike a sermon vnto the people, declaring what they mind to doe, with the great good liking of all such as doe heare them: for euery body wondereth at such a kinde of holinesse. Then take they hookes to cut downe byars and thornes that might hinder them in their way to heauen, and so imbarke themselves in a new vessell, tying great stones about their neckes, armes, loines, thighes, and feete: thus they launching out into the maine Sea be either drowned there, their shippe bouged for that purpose, or els doe cast themselves ouer-board headlong into the Sea. The emptie barke is out of hand set a fire for honours sake by their friends that follow them in another boat of their owne, thinking it blasphemie that any mortall creature should afterward once touch the barke that had bene so religiously halowed.

Truly when we went to Meaco, eight dayes before we came to the Ile of Hiu at Fore towne, fire men and two women so died. To all such as die so the people erecteth a Chappell, and to each of them a pillar and a pole made of Pineapple for a perpetuall monument, hanging by many shebes of paper in sticke all the roofo ouer, with many verses set downe in the walles in commendation of that blessed company. Therefore vnto this place both day and night many come very superstitiously in pilgrimage. It happened euen then as Aloisius Almeida and I went to christen a child vnto a trauciler that way at what time foure or fife olde women came forth out of the aforesayd chappell with beades in their handes (for in this point also the deuill counterfeithly reverteth Christianitie) who partly scorned at vs for follie, partly frowned and caunted at our small deuotion, for passing by that holy monument without any reuerence or worship done thereunto at all.

It remaineth now we speake two or three wordes of those Sermons the Bonzii are wont to make, not so many as ours in number, but assuredly very well provided for. The Pulpit is erected in a great temple with a silke Canopie ouer it, therein standeth a costly seate, befoze the seate a table with a bell and a booke. At the houre of Sermon each sect of the Iapans resorteth to their owne doctors in diuers Temples. Up goeth the doctor into the Pulpit, and being set downe, after that hee hath lozblike looked him about, signifieth silence with his bell, and so readeth a fewe wordes of that booke we spake of, the which he expoundeth afterward moze at large. These preachers be for the most part eloquent, and apt to drawe with their speech the mindes of their hearers. Wherefore to this ende chieffie (such is their greedinesse) tendeth all their talke, that the people bee brought vnder the colour of godlinesse to enrich their monasteries, promising to each one so much the moze happinesse in the life to come, how much the greater costes and charges they bee at in Church matters and obsequies: notwithstanding this multitude of superstitious Sects and companies, and the diuersities thereof amongst themselves: yet in this principally all their Superintendents doe trauell so to perswade their Nouices in their owne tales and lies, that they thinke nothing els trueth, nothing els sure to come by euerlasting saluation, nothing els woorth the hearing. Whereunto they adde other subtilities, as in going grauitie, in countenance, apparell, and in all outward shew, comelinesse. Where by the Iapans mindes are so nouelled in wicked opinions, & doe conceiue thereby such trust and hope of euerlasting saluation, that not onely at home, but also abroad in euery corner of the towne continually almost they run ouer their beades, humbly asking of Amida and Xaca, wealth, honour, good health, and euerslasting iopes. Thus then, deare brethren, may you thinke how greatly they need the helpe of God, that either doe bring the Gospell into this countrey, or receiuing it brought vnto them, doe forsake idolatrie and ioint themselves with Christ, being assaulted by so many snares of the deuil, troubled with the daily dissuasions of their Bonzii, and finally, so iniuriously, so hardly, so sharply vexed of their kinned and friends, that except the grace of God obtained by the sacrifices and prayers of the Catholique church doe helpe vs, it cannot be chosen but that the faith and constancie of many, if not of all, in these first beginnings of our churches, will greatly be put in iopardie. So much the moze it standeth you vpon that so earnestly long for the health of soules, to commend specially these Iapanish flocks vnto our Lord.

We came to Sacao the eight and twentie day of January: Aloisius Almeida first for businesse, but afterward let by sicknesse, staid there some while, but I parting the next day from thence came thirteene leagues off to Meaco the last of Januarie. Of my coming all the Christians tooke great comfort, but specially Gaspar Vilela who in 6 yeres had seen none of our company at Meaco: his yeres are not yet fortye, but his gray haire sheweth him to be seuentie, so vehemently is his litle body afflicted and woone with extreme cold. Hee speaketh Iapanish so skilfully after the phrase of Meaco (the which for the renowne of this people and royal seat of the king is best accounted of) that hee doeth both confesse and preach in that language. Certaine godly bookes also he hath done into that speech, not omitting to translate other as laisure suffreth him. To make an ende, our Lord for his goodnesse vouchsafe to preserve vs all continually, and to giue vs ayde both rightly to interpret his will, and well to doe the same. From Meaco the 19 of February 1565.

Other such like matter is handled both in other his letters, and also in the Epistles written by his companions to be seene at large in the aforesaid volume. Amongst the rest this seemed in my iudgement one of the principall, and therefore the rather I tooke vpon me to do it into English.

Of the Iles beyond Iapan in the way from China to the Moluccas.

Amongst other Iles in the Asian sea betwixt Canean a Chinish hauen in Cathaio & the Moluccas, much spoken of in the Indian histories and painted out in Maps, Ainan and Santia-num are very famous, Ainan standeth 19 degrees on this side of the Equinoctiall line nere China, from whence the Chinish nation haue their prouision for shipping and other necessities requisite for their Danie. There staid Balthasar Gagus a great traueiler 5 moneths, who describeth that place after this manner. Ainan is a goodly countrey full of Indian fruites & all kind of virtuels, besides great store of iewels and pearle, well inhabited, the townes built of stone, the people rude in conditions, apparelled in diuers coloured rugs, with two ore hoynes, as it were, made of fine ryppes hanging downe about their eares, and a paire of sharpe cyzers at their foreheads.

The cause wherefore they go in such attire I could not understand, except it bee for that they do counter feite the deuill in the forme of a brute beast, offering themselues vp to him.

Santianum.

Santianum is an Ile neere vnto the haueu Cantan in the confines likewise of China, famous for the death of that woorthy traeller and godly professour and painfull doctor of the Indian nation in matters concerning religion, Francis Xauier, who after great labours, many iniuries, and calamities infinite suffered with much patience, singular ioy and gladnesse of mind, departed in a cabben made of bowes and rushes vpon a desert mountaine, no lesse boyd of all wooldy commodities, then endued with all spirituall blessings, out of this life, the 2 day of December, the yeere of our Lord 1552. after that many thousand of these Easterlings were brought by him to the knowledge of Christ. Of this holy man, his particular vertues, and specially trauell, and wonderful woorks in that region, of other many litle Isles (yet not so litle, but they may right wel be written of at laisure) all the latter histories of the Indian regions are full.

An excellent treatise of the kingdome of China, and of the estate and gouernment thereof: Printed in Latine at Macao a citie of the Portugals in China, An. Dom. 1590. and written Dialogue-wise. The speakers are Linus, Leo, and Michael.

Linus.

Concerning the kingdome of China (Michael) which is our next neighbour, we haue heard and daily do heare so many reports, that we are to request at your hands rather a true then a large discourse and narration thereof. And if there be ought in your knowledge besides that which by continual rumours is wakened among vs, we will right gladly giue diligent eare vnto it.

Michael. Because the report of this most famous kingdome is growen so common among vs, reducing diuers and manifold particulars into order, I will especially aime at the trueth of things receiued from the fathers of the societie, which euen now at this present are conuersant in China. First of all therefore it is not vnknownen, that of all parts of the maine continent this kingdome of China is situate most Easterly: albeit certaine Islands, as our native Iapon, & the Ile of Manila stand moze Easterly then China it selfe. As touching the limites & bounds of this kingdome, we may appoint the first towards the West to be a certaine Ile commonly called Hainan, which standeth in 19 degrees of Northerly latitude. For the continent next adioining vnto this Ile trendeth towards the East, and that especially, where the promontorie of the citie called Nimpo or Liampo doeth extend it selfe. Howbeit, from that place declining Northward, it stretcheth forth an huge length, insomuch that the farthest Chinian inhabitants that way doe behold the North pole eleuated, at least 50 degrees, and perhaps moze also: whereupon a man may easilie coniecture (that I may speake like an Astronomer) how large the latitude of this kingdome is, when as it containeth about moze then 540 leagues in direct extension towards the North. But as concerning the longitude which is accounted from East to West, it is not so exactly found out, that it may be distinguished into degrees. Howbeit certaine it is, that according to the Map wherein the people of China describe the forme of their kingdome, the latitude thereof doeth not much exceed the longitude. This kingdome therefore is, without all peradventure, of all earthly kingdomes the most large and spacious: for albeit diuers other kings vnder their iurisdiction containing in dimensions moze length & breadth then all China, do possesse very many kingdomes & far distant asunder: yet none of the all enioieth any one kingdome so large and so ample, as the most puissant king of China doeth. Now, if we shall make enquire into his reuenues and tributes, true it is, that this king, of all others, is endued with the greatest and the richest, both in regard of the fertilitie & greatness of his dominions, & also by reason of the seuer collection and exaction of his duties: yea, tributes are imposed vpon his subiects, not onely for lands, houses, and impost of marchandise, but also for euery person in each family. It is likewise to be vnderstood, that almost no lord or potentate in China hath authoritie to leue vnto himselfe any peculiar reuenues, or to collect any rents within the precincts of his feignories, at such power belonging onely vnto the king: whereas in Europe the contrary is most commonly seen, as we haue before signified. In this most large kingdome are contained 15 prouinces, euery one of which were in it selfe sufficient to be made one great kingdome. Six of these prouinces do border vpon the sea, namely (as I may vse the names of the Chinians themselves) Coantum, Foquien, Chequiam, Nanquin, Xantum, Paquin: the other 9 be in-land prouinces, namely, Quianh, Huquam, Honan, Xienh, Xanh, Suchuon, Queicheu, Iunan, Coanh. Amongst all the foresayd prouinces, two are allotted for the kings court and seat roial, that is to say, Paquin for his court in the North, and Nanquin for his court in the South. For the kings of China were wont to be resident altogether at the South court: but after ward, by reason of the manifold and cruell warres moued by the Tartars, they were constrained to desire their princely seate and habitation in that extreme prouince of the North. Whereupon it cometh to passe, that those Northen confines of the kingdom doe abound with many moe fortresses, martiall engines, and garrisons of souldiers.

China, & a mar-

wherewith the people of China doe repress and drive backe the Tartars attempting to invade their territories. Michael. Certes that wall which you haue heard tell of is most woorthie of admiration; for it runneth alongst the borders of thre Northerie prouinces, Xienfi, Xanfi, and Paquin, and is sayd to containe almost thre hundred leagues in length, and in such sort to bee built, that it hindereth not the courses and streames of any riuers, their chanel being ouerthwarted and fortified with wonderfull bridges and other defences, Yet is it not unlikely, that the sayd wall is built in such sort, that onely lowe and easie passages bee therewith stopped and enuironed; but the mountaines running betweene those lowe passages are, by their owne naturall strength, and inaccessible heighth, a sufficient fortification agaynst the enemye. Linus. Tell vs (Michael) whether the kingdome of China be so frequented with inhabitants, as wee haue often bene informed, or no?

Michael. It is (Linus) in very deed a most populous kingdom, as I haue bene certified from the fathers of the societie: who hauing seene sundry prouinces of Europe renowned for the multitude of their inhabitants, doe notwithstanding greatly admire the infinite swarmes of people in China. Howbeit these multitudes are not pel-mel and confusedly dispersed ouer the land, but most conveniently and orderly distributed in their townes and famous cities: of which assemblies there are diuers kindes among the Chinians. For they haue certaine principal cities called by the name of Fu: other inferior cities called Cheu: and of a third kind also named Hien, which be indeed walled townes, but are not privileged with the dignities and prerogatiues of cities. To these may be added two other kindes of lesser townes, which are partly villages, and partly garrisons of souldiers. Of the first and principall kind is that most noble cite standing neere vnto the port of Macao, called by the Chinians Coancheu, but by the Portugals commonly termed Cantam, which is rather the common name of the prouince, then a word of their proper imposition. Vnto the third kind appertaineth a towne, which is yet higher vnto the port of Macao, called by the Portugals Ansam, but by the Chinians Hianfanhien. At the foresayd prouinces therefore haue their greater cities named Fu, & their lesser cities called Cheu, vnto both of which the other townes may be added. Moreover, in every prouince there is a certain principall city which is called the Metropolitane thereof, wherein the chief magistrates haue their place of residence, as the principall cite by me last mentioned, which is the head of the whole prouince called Coantum. The number of the greater cities throughout the whole kingdom is more then 150, and there is the same or rather a greater multitude of inferiour cities. Of walled townes not endued with the privileges of cities there are mo then 1120: the villages & garrisons can scarce be numbred: ouer & besides the which conuents it is incredible what a number of countie farmes or granges there be: for it is not easie to find any place desert or void of inhabitants in all that land. Now in the sea, in riuers, & in barks there are such abundance of people, and of whole families inhabiting, that euen the Europeans themselves doe greatly wonder thereat: insonmuch that some (albeit beyond measure) haue bene perswaded that there are as many people dwelling vpon the water as vpon the land. Neither were they induced so to thinke altogether without probability: for whereas the kingdom of China is in all parts thereof interfused with commodious riuers, & in many places consisteth of waters, barges & boats being euery where very common, it might easily bee supposed, that the number of water-men was equal vnto the land-inhabitants. Howbeit, that is to be vnderstood by amplification, whereas the cities do swarme so full with citizens & the countrie with peasants. Leo. The abundance of people which you tell vs of seemeth very strange: whereupon I coniecture the soile to be fertile, the aire to be wholesome, and the whole kingdom to be at peace. Michael. You haue (friend Leo) full iudicially coniectured those thre: for they do all so excel, & which of the thre in this kingdom be more excellent, it is not easie to discern. And hence it is that this common opinion hath bene rise among the Portugals, namely, that the kingdom of China was neuer visited with those thre most heauy & sharpe leougues of mankind, warre, famine, & pestilence. But that opinion is more common then true: sithens there haue bene most terrible intestine and ciuile warres, as in many and most autenticall histories it is recorded: sithens also that some prouinces of the sayd kingdom, euen in these our dayes, haue bene afflicted with pestilence and contagious diseases, and with famine. Howbeit, that the foresaid thre benefits do mightily flourish and abound in China, it cannot be denied. For (that I may first speake of the salubritie of the aire) the fathers of the societie themselves are witnesses, that scarcely in any other realme there are so many found that live vnto decrepite and extreme old age: so great a multitude is there of ancient and graue personages: neither doe they vse so many confections and medicines, nor so manifold and sundry wayes of curing diseases, as wee saw accustomed in Europe. For amongst them they haue no Phlebotomie or letting of blood: but all their cures, as ours also in Iapon, are achieved by fasting, decoctions of herbes, & light or gentle potions. But in this behalfe let euery nation please themselves with their owne customes. Now, in fruitfulness of soile this kingdom certes doth excel, far surpassing all other kingdoms of the East: yet is it nothing comparable vnto the plentie and abundance of Europe, as I haue declared at large in the former treatises. But the kingdom of China is, in this regard, so highly extolled, because there is not any region in the East partes that aboundeth so with merchandise, and from whence so much traffique is sent abroad. For whereas this kingdom is most large & full of nauigable riuers, so that commodities may easilie be conueyed out of one prouince into another: the Portugals doe find such abundance of wares within one and the same Citie, (which perhaps is the greatest Part throughout the whole kingdom) that they are verily persuaded, that the same region, of all others, most aboundeth with merchandise: which notwithstanding is to be understood of the Orientall regions: albeit there are some kindes of merchandise, wherewith the land of China is better stored then any other kingdom. This region affordeth especially sundry kinds of mettals, of which the chiefe, both in excellencie & in abundance, is gold, whereof so many Pezoes are brought from China to India, and to our countrey of Iapon, that I heard say, that in one and the same ship, this present yeere, 2000 such pieces consisting of masse gold, as the Portugals commonly call golden loaves, were brought vnto vs for merchandise: and one of these loaves is worth almost 100 duckats. Hence it is that in the kingdom of China so many things are adorned with gold, as for example, beds, tables, pictures, images, litters wherein nice and daintie dames are caried vpon their seruants backs. Neither are these golden loaves onely bought by the Portugals, but also great plentie of gold-twine and leaues of gold: for the Chinians can very cunningly beate and extenuate gold into plates and leaues. There is also great store of siluer, whereof (that I may omit other arguments) it is no small demonstration, that euery yeere there are brought into the citie commonly called Cantam by the Portugal merchants to brie wares, at the least 400 Sestertium thereof, and yet nothing in a manner is conuicied out of the Chinian kingdom: because the people of China abounding with all necessaries, are not greatly inquisitiue or desirous of any merchandise from other kingdomes. I doe here omit the Siluer mines wherof there are great numbers in China, albeit there is much circumspection vsed in digging the siluer thereout: for the king standeth much in feare least it may bee an occasion to stirre vp the couctous and greedie humour of many. Nowe their siluer which they put to vses is for the most part passing fine, and purified from all dross, and therefore in trying it they vse great diligence. What should I speake of their iron, copper, lead, tinne, and other mettals, and also of their quick-siluer? Of all which in the realme of China there is great abundance, and from thence they are transported into diuers countreys. Whereunto may bee added the wonderfull store of pearles, which, at the Ile of Hainan, are found in shell-fishes taken very cunningly by certaine Diuers, and doe much enlarge the kings reuenues. But now let vs proceed vnto the Silke or Bombycine fleece, whereof there is great plentie in China: so that euen as the husbandmen labour in manuring the earth, and in sowing of Rice; so likewise the women doe employ a great part of their time in preserving of silke-wormes, and in keeming and weaving of Silke. Hence it is that euery yeere the King and Queene with great solemnitie come forth into a publique place, the one of them touching a plough, and the other a Mulberrie tree, with the leanes whereof Silke-wormes are nourished: and both of them by this ceremonie encouraging both men and women vnto their vocation and labour: whereas otherwise, all the whole yeere throughout, no man besides the principall magistrates, may once attaine to the sight of the king. Of this Silke or Bombycine fleece there is such abundance, that three shippes for the most part comming out of India to the port of Macao, & at the least one euery yeere comming vnto vs, are laden especially with this freight, and it is vsed not onely in India, but caried euen vnto Portugal. Neither is the Fleet it selfe onely transported thence, but also diuers & sundry stufes woven thereof, for the Chinians do greatly excel in the Art of weaving, and do very much resemble our weauers of Europe. Moreover the kingdom of China aboundeth with most costlie spices & odours, and especially with cynamom (albeit not comparable to the cynamom of Zeilan) with camphire also & muske, which is very principall & good. But he derieth his name fro a beast of the same name (which beast resembleth a Beuer) fro the parts whereof byused & purified proceedeth a most delicate & fragrant smel which the Portugals highly esteem, commonly calling those parts of the foresaid beasts (because they are like vnto the gorges of foules) Papos, & conuey great plenty plenty of them into India, & to vs of Iapon. But who would beleue, that there were so much gosspine or cotton-wool in China; whereof such variety of clothes are made like unto linnen; which we our selues do so often vse, & which also is conueied by sea into so many regions: Let vs now in-treat of that earthen or pliable matter commonly called porcellan; which is pure white, & is to be esteemed the best stuffe of that kind in the whole world; whereof vessels of all kinds are very curiously framed. I say, it is the best earthen matter in all the world; for thre qualities; namely, the cleanness, the beauty, & the strength thereof. There is indeed other matter to be found more glorious, and more costly, but none so free from uncleannes, and so durable: this I adde, in regard of glasse, which indeed is immaculate and cleane, but may easily be broken in pieces. This matter is digged, not thorowout the whole region of China, but onely in one of the fifteent prouinces called Quianli, wherein continually very many artificers are employed about the same matter:

 neither doe they onely frame thereof smaller vessels, as dishes, platters, salt-sellers, ewers, and such like, but also certaine huge tummes, and vessels of great quantity, being very finely and cunningly wrought, which, by reason of the danger and difficulty of carriage, are not transported out of the realme, but are vsed onely within it, and especially in the kings court. The beauty of this matter is much augmented by variety of picture, which is layed in certaine colours vpon it, while it is yet new, golde also being added thereunto, which maketh the foze sayd vessels to appeare most beautifull. It is wonderfull how highly the Portugals do esteeme thereof, seeing they do, with great difficulty, transport the same, not onely to vs of Iapon and into India, but also into sundry prouinces of Europe. Unto the marchandize aboue-mentioned may be added diuers and sundry plants, the rootes whereof be right hollesome for mens bodies, and very medicinable, which are brought vnto our Isles of Iapon, and vnto many other Islands, amongst the which that wood may be reckoned, which (by a synecdoche) is called The wood of China, being of notable force to expell out of mens bodies those humours, which would breed contagious diseases. To these you may adde sugar-canes (for in the realme of China there is great store of excellent sugar) which is conueyed by the Portugals very plentifully, both into our countrey, and also into India. By speeches vttered immediatly before concerned marchandize onely, in regard whereof this kingdome is beneficiall not to it selfe alone, but most profitable to many other nations also. As for those fruits which pertaine to perely sustenance and common food, they can scarce be numbred: albeit, of those three commodities which they of Europe so greatly account of; namely of coynes, vines, and olives the land of China is not very capable: for the Chinians know not so much as the name of an Olive tree (out of the fruit whereof oile is expessed) neither yet the name of a vine.
 The prouince of Paquin is not altogether destitute of wine, but whether it be brought from other places, or there made, I am not able to say: although it aboundeth with many other, and those not vnpleasant liquours, which may serue in the stead of wine it selfe. Now, as touching cozne, there is indeed wheat sown in all the prouinces; howbeit rise is in farre more vse and requett then it: and so in regard of these two commodities profitable for mans life; namely, wine and cozne; the kingdome of China and our countrey of Iapon may be compared together.
 Leo. You haue discoursed (Michael) of the fruitfulness of China, whereof I haue often heard, that it is no lesse pleasant then fruitful, and I haue bene especially indured so to thinke, at the sight of the Chinian mappe. Michael. The thing it selfe agrees right well with the picture: for they that haue scene the mediterranean or inner parts of the kingdome of China, do repozt it to be a most amiable countrey, adorned with plenty of woods, with abundance of fruits and grasse, and with woonderfull variety of riuers, wherewith the Chinian kingdome is watered like a garden; di-uers of which riuers doe naturally flowe, and others by arte and industry are deuised into sundry places. But now I will treat of the tranquillity and peace of China, after I haue spoken a word or two concerning the maners of the inhabitants. This nation is indued with excellent wit and dexterity for the attaining of all artes, and, being very constant in their owne customes, they lightly regard the customes or fashions of other people. They vse one and the same kinde of vesture, yet so, that there is some distinction betwene the apparell of the magistrate & of the common subiect. They all of them do weare long haire vpon their heads, and, after the maner of women, do curiously keame their daimey locks hanging downe to the ground, and, hauing twined and bound them vp, they couer them with calles, wearing sundry caps thereupon, according to their age and condition. It seemeth that in old time one language was common to all the prouin-ces: notwithstanding, by reason of variety of pronunciation, it is very much altered, and is diuided into sundry idiomes or proprieties of speech, according to the diuers prouinces: howbeit, among the magistrates, and in publike assemblies of iudgement, there is one and the very same kinde of language vsed thorowout the whole realme, from the which (as I haue sayd) the speech of ech prouince differeth not a little. Moreover this people is most loyall and obedient vnto the king

king and his magistrates, which is the principall cause of their tranquillity & peace. For whereas the common sort doe apply themselves vnto the discretion and becke of inferiour magistrates, and the inferiour magistrates of the superiour, and the superiour magistrates of the king himselfe, framing and composing all their actions and affaires vnto that leuell: a world it is to see, in what equability and indifferency of iustice all of them do leade their liues, and how orderly the publike lawes are administred. Which thing notwithstanding shall be handled more at large, when we come to intreat of the gouernment. Linus. Tell vs now (Michael) of the industry of that people, whereof we haue heard great reports. Michael. Their industry is especially to be discerned in manuary artes and occupations, and therein the Chinians do surpasse most of these Easterly nations. For there are such a number of artificers ingeniously and cunningly framing sundry deuices out of golde, silver, and other mettals, as likewise of stone, wood, and other matters conuenient for mans vse, that the streets of cities being replenished with their shoppes and fine worke-manship, are very woonderfull to beholde. Besides whom also there are very many Painters, vbling either the pensill or the needle (of which the last sort are called Embrotherers) and others also that curiously worke golde-twine vpon cloth either of linnen or of cotton: whose operations of all kinds are diligently conueyed by the Portugals into India. Their industry doth no lesse appeare in founding of gunnes and in making of gun-powder, whereof are made many rare and artificiall fire-works. To these may be added the arte of Pynting, albeit their letters be in maner infinite and most difficult, the portraictures whereof they cut in wood or in brasse, and with maruellous facilitie they daily publish huge multitudes of books. Vnto these mechanicall & illiberall crafts you may adde two more; that is to say, navigation and discipline of warre; both of which haue bene in ancient times most diligently practised by the inhabitants of China: for (as we haue before signified in the third dialogue) the Chinians sailing euen as farre as India, subdued some part thereof vnto their owne dominion: howbeit after ward, least they should diminish the forces of their realme by dispersing them into many prouinces, altering their counsell, they determined to containe themselves within their owne limits: within which limits (as I haue sayd) there were in olde time beehem and cruell warres, both betweene the people of China themselves, and also against the Tartarian king, who inuaded their kingdome, and by himselfe and his successours, for a long season, usurped the gouernment thereof. Howbeit the kings of the Tartarian race being woyn out, and their stocke and family being vtterly abolished, the Chinians began to lift vp their heads, and to aduance themselves, inioyng for these 200 yeeres last past exceeding peace and tranquillity, and at this day the posterity of the same king that expelled the Tartars, with great dignity weareth the crowne, and wieldeth the royall scepter. Albeit therefore the people of China (especially they that inhabit Southerly from the prouince of Paquin) are, for the most part, by reason of continuall ease and quiet, growen effeminate, and their courage is abated, notwithstanding they would proue notable and braue souldiers, if they ioynd vse and exercise vnto their naturall fortitude. As a man may easily obserue in them, that maintaine continuall warres against the most barbarous and cruel Tartars. Howbeit in this kingdome of China there is so great regard of military discipline, that no city nor towne there is destitute of a garison, the captaines and gouernours keeping ech man his order; which all of them, in euery prouince, are subiect vnto the kings lieutenant generall for the warres, whom they call Chumpin, and yet he himselfe is subiect vnto the Turan or viceroy. Let vs now come vnto that arte, which the Chinians do most of all professe, and which we may, not vntruly, call literature or learning. For although it be commonly reported, that many liberall sciences, and especially naturall and morall philosophy are studied in China, and that they haue Vniuersities there, wherein such ingenious artes are deliuered and taught, yet, for the most part, this opinion is to be esteemed more popular then true: but I will declare, vpon what occasion this conceit first grew. The people of China doe, aboue all things, professe the arte of literature; and learning it most diligently, they imploy themselves a long time and the better part of their age therein. For this cause, in all cities and townes, yea, and in petty villages also, there are certaine schole-masters hired for stipends to instruct childzen: and their literature being (as ours in Iapon is also) in maner infinite, their childzen are put to schole euen from their infancy and tender yeeres, from whence notwithstanding such are taken away, as are iudged to be vnfit for the same purpose, and are trained vp to merchandise or to manuary sciences: but the residue do so dedicate themselves to the study of learning, that (a strange thing it is to consider) being conuersant in the principall books, they will easily tel you, if they be asked the question, how many letters be contained in euery page, and where ech letter is placed. Now, for the greater progresse and increase of learning, they (as the maner is in Europe) do appoint three degrees to the attaining of noble sciences; that is to say, the lowest, the middle degree, and the highest. Graduates of the first degree are called Siufai, of the second Quigun, Quiugin, and of the the third Chinzu. And in each city or walled towne there is a publique house called the Schoole, and vnto that all they doe resort from all priuate and petty schooles that are minded to obtaine the first degree; where they do amplifie a sentence or theame propounded vnto them by some magistrate: and they, whose stile is more elegant and refined, are, in each city, graced with the first degree. Of such as aspire vnto the second degree triall is made onely in the metropolitane or principall city of the prouince, whereunto, they of the first degree, every third yere, haue recourse, and, in one publique house or place of assembly, doe, the second time, make an oration of another sentence obscurer then the former, and doe vndergo a more seuer examination. Now, there is commonly such an huge multitude of people, that this last yere, in the foresayd famous city of Canteam, by reason of the incredible assembly of persons flocking to that publique act of commencement, at the first entrance of the doores, there were many troden vnder foot, and quelled to death, as we haue bene most certainly informed. Moreover they that sue for the highest degree are subiect vnto a most seuer and exact censure, whereby they are to be examined at the Kings Court onely, and that also every third yere next ensuing the sayd yere wherein graduates of the second degree are elected in each prouince, and, a certaine number being prescribed vnto every particular prouince, they do ascend vnto that highest pitch of dignity, which is in so great regard with the king himselfe, that the three principall graduates do, for honours sake, drinke off a cup filled euen with the Kings owne hand, and are graced with other solemnities. Out of this order the chiefe magistrates are chosen: for after that they haue attained vnto this third degree, being a while trained up in the lawes of the realme, and in the precepts of humanity, they are admitted vnto diuers functions. Neither are we to thinke that the Chinians be altogether destitute of other artes. For, as touching morall philosophy, all those books are fraught with the precepts thereof, which, for their instructions sake, are alwayes conuerfant in the hands of the foresayd students, wherein such graue and pithy sentences are set downe, that, in men void of the light of the Gospel, more can not be desired. They haue books also that intreat of things and causes naturall, but herein it is to be supposed, that as well their books as ours do abound with errors. There be other books among them, that discourse of herbs and medicines, and others of chiuallry and martiall affaires. Neither can I here omit, that certaine men of China (albeit they be but few, and rare to be found) are excellent in the knowledge of astronomy, by which knowledge of theirs the dayes of the new moone incident to every moneth are truly disposed and digested, and are committed to writing and published: besides, they doe most infallibly foretell the eclipses of the Sun and Moone: and whatsoeuer knowledge in this arte we of Iapon haue, it is deriued from them. Leo. We doe freely confesse that (Michael) liethens our books intreating of the same arte are, a great part of them, written in the characters or letters of China. But now, instruct you vs as touching their maner of gouernment, wherein the Chinians are sayd greatly to excell. Michael. That, that, in very deed, is their chiefe arte, and vnto that all their learning and exercise of letters is directed. Whereas therefore, in the kingdom of China, one only king beares rule ouer so many prouinces, it is strange what a number of Magistrates are by him created to administer publique affaires. For (to omit them which in each Towne and City haue iurisdiction ouer the townesmen and citizens) there are three principall Magistrates in every prouince. The first is he that hath to deale in cases criminall, and is called Ganchasu: the second is the Kings Fosterer, and is called Puchinsu: the third is the Lieutenant generall for the warres, named, as we sayd before, Chumpin. These three therefore haue their place of residence in the chiefe City of the prouince: and the two former haue certaine associates of their owne order, but of inferior authority, appointed in diuers Cities and Townes, vnto whom, according to the variety of causes, the Gouernours of Townes, and the Maiors of Cities doe appeal. Howbeit the three so named Magistrates are in subiection vnto the Turan, that is, the Vice-roy, ordained in each prouince. And all these Magistrates beare office for the space of three yeeres together: yet so, that for the gouerning of each prouince, not any of the same prouince, but strangers, that is, men of another prouince, are selected: whereof it commeth to passe, that the Judges may giue sentence with a farre more entire and incorrupt minde, then if they were among their owne kinsfolke and allies. Duer and besides all these, there is an annuall or peere-ly Magistrate, which is called Chaïen, whose duety it is to make inquisition of all crimes, and especially the crimes of Magistrates, and also to punish common offences: but concerning the faults of the great magistrates to admonish the king himselfe. Of this order, every yere, are sent out of the Kings Court, for each prouince, one; and going ouer all the Cities and Townes thereof, they do most diligently ransacke and serch out all crimes, and vpon them which are imprisoned they inflict due punishment, or, being found not guilty, they dismisse them vnpunished. Hence it is, that all Magistrates greatly fearing to be called in question by the Chaïen are well kept within the limits of their callings. Besides all these Magistrates there is at either Court, namely in the North, and in the South, a Senate or honourable assembly of graue counsellors, vnto the which, out of all prouinces, according to the neerenesse and distance of the place, affaires of greater weight and moment are referred, and by their authority diuers Magistrates are created: howbeit the managing and expedition of principall affaires is committed vnto the Senate of Paquin. Moreover there are euery yeere certaine Magistrates appointed in ech prouince, to goe vnto the king: and euery third yeere all the Gouernours of Cities and of Townes do visit him at once, what time triall is made of them that aspire vnto the third degree: vpon which occasion there is at the same time an incredible number of people at the Kings Court. By reason of this excellent order and harmony of Magistrates placed one vnder another, it can scarce be imagined, what sweet peace and tranquillity flourisheth thorowout the whole realme, especially sithens, after speedy inquisition, persons that are guilty be put (as the manner is there) to the punishment of the bastinado: neither yet are suits or actions any long time delayed. Also it is not to be omitted, that for the obtaining of any dignity or magistracy, the way is open, without all respect of gentry or blood, vnto all men, if they be learned, and especially if they haue attained vnto the third and highest degree aforesayd. Neither can it be expressed how obedient and duefull the common sort are vnto their Magistrates, and with what magnificence and pompe the sayd Magistrates come abroad: for the most part of them haue fittie or threescore Sergeants attending vpon them, and going before them, two and two in a ranke: some of them carrying Halberds, Baces, and Battle-axes: some trailing yron chaines vpon the ground: others holding great roddees or stauces of a certaine kinde of reede, wherewith malefactours are punished, in their hands: and two there are that carry, inclosed in a case, the Kings scale peculiar for ech office: and many others also, that shew sundry spectacles vnto the people: whereunto may be added the horrible out-cries and shoutes, which betweene whiles they utter, to strike a terrour into the hearts of all men: and at length come the Magistrates themselves, being carried in a chaine vpon the backs of foure men, sixe men, or eight men, according to the dignity of their office. Now, as concerning their houses, they are very large and stately, being built and furnished with all necessary stuffe, at the Kings owne cost, in the which, so long as their magistracy lasteth, they leade a braue and an honourable life. The sayd houses are without variety of stories one aboue another, which in the kingdome of China and in our Isles of Iapon also are not ordinarily vsed for habitation, but either to keepe watch and ward, or els for solace and recreations sake (for the which purposes, eight most lofty towers of nine stories high are built) or els for the defence of Cities. Howbeit in other regards these buildings doe shew forth no small magnificence: for they haue their cisternes for the receipt of raine-water, which are adorne with beautifull trees, set in order, round about them: and they haue also their places designed for the administration of iustice, and diuers other conuenient roomes to bestow their wiues and families in. Within the doores of the aforesayd habitations a certaine number of Sergeants and officers, hauing cabbins or little houses allotted them on both sides, doe alwayes giue their attendance; and so long as matters of iudgement are in deciding, they be alwayes ready at hand, that, at the direction of the Magistrates they may either beat malefactours, or by torments constrain them to tell the truth. The sayd Magistrates also haue their peculiar barges wherein to take the water; being in breadth and length not much vnlike to the galleys of Europe, but for swiftnesse and multitude of oares, farre inferiour vnto them. The rowers, sitting vpon galleries without the hatches or compasse of the barge, doe mooue it on forward with their oares: wherevpon it cometh to passe, that the middle part of the barge affordeth sufficient room for the Magistrates themselves to abide in, containing chambers therein almost as conuenient and handsome, as in any of their foresayd publique houses, together with butteries and kitchens, and such other places necessary for the provision and stowage of victuals. Leo. All these things agree right well with the reports, which we haue heard of the stately and renowned kingdome of China: I would now right gladly know somewhat concerning the order which is obserued in the obtaining of magistracies.

Michael. You haue enquired of a matter most woorthie to be knowen, which I had almost omitted to encreat of. The Chintians therefore doe vse a kinde of gradation in aduancing men vnto sundry places of authority, which for the most part is performed by the Senatours of Paquin. For first they are made Iudges of Townes: then of Cities: afterward they are elected to be of that order, which decreeth punishments in cases criminall without further appeale, or of their order, that are the kings solicitors. And in both of these Orders, which are very honourable, there are many places and degrees, so that from the inferiour place they must ascend vnto the superiour, vntill they haue attained vnto the highest dignity of all: and immediately after after that they come to be Vice-royes. Howbeit this gradation is not alwayes accomplished in one and the same province, but in changing their offices they change places and provinces also. Howsoever, next after the office of Vice-roy they are capable to be chosen Senators of Nanquin, and last of all to be elected into the Senate of Paquin. Now, there is such an order and methode observed in the ascending unto these dignities, that all men may easily coniecture, what office any one is to undertake. And there is so great diligence and celerity used for the substitution of one into the room of another, that, for the same purpose, messengers are dispatched by land, upon swift post-horses, unto divers provinces, almost twenty dayes journey from the Kings Court. And, to be short, there is such strict severity in degrading those that unjustly or negligently demean themselves, from an honourable unto an inferiour and base office, or altogether in depriving them of the kings authority; that all Magistrates doe stand in feare of nothing in the world more then of that. The same order, almost, is observed among the Captaines and Lieu-tenants generall for the warres: except onely in them, that their birth and offspring is respected: for many there be, who descending by parentage from such men as have in times past achieved brave exploits in warfare, so soone as they come to sufficient yeeres, are created Centurions, Colonels, and Governours, untill at last they attaine to be Lieu-tenants generall and Protectours of some whole province: who notwithstanding (as I have sayd) are in all things subiect unto the Vice-roy. All the foresayd Magistrates both of warre and of peace have a set number of attendants allotted unto them, enjoying a stipend, and carrying certaine ensignes and peculiar badges of their office: and (besides the ordinary watch, which souldiers appointed for the same purpose doe in the night season, after the City gates be shut, keepe in their forts) wheresoever any Magistrate is, either at his house or in his barge, the sayd attendants striking upon a cymball of brass, at certaine appointed times, do keepe most circumference and continuall watch and ward about his person. Linus. You have (Michael) sufficiently discoursed of the Magistrates: in forme vs now of the king himselfe, whose name is fore-named and spread abroad. Michael. Concerning this matter I will say so much onely as by certaine rumours hath come to my knowledge: for of matters appertaining unto the kings Court we have no eye-witnesses, sithens the fathers of the society have not as yet proceeded unto Paquin, who so soone as (by Gods assistance) they shall there be arrived, will by their letters more fully aduertise vs. The king of China therefore is honoured with wonderfull reverence and submission throughout his whole Realme: and whensoever any of his chiefe Magistrates speaketh unto him, he calleth him VAN-SVI, signifying thereby that he wisheth tenne thousands of yeeres unto him. The succession of the kingdome dependeth upon the bloud royall: for the eldest sonne borne of the kings first and lawfull wife obtaineth the kingdome after his fathers decease: neither doe they deprive themselves of the kingly authority in their life time (as the maner is in our Islands of Iapon) but the custome of Europe is there observed. Now, that the safety and life of the king may stand in more security, his yoonger brethren, and the rest borne of concubines are not permitted to live in the kings Court: but places of habitation are by the king himselfe assigned unto them in divers provinces farre distant asunder, where they dwell most commodiously, being comparable unto kings for their buildings and revenues: howbeit they exercise no authority over the people, but all the government of those Cities wherein they dwell, concerneth the Magistrates, who notwithstanding have the sayd Princes in high regard and honour; and doe visit them twice in a moneth, and salute them kneeling upon their knees, and bowing their faces downe to the earth: and yet they communicate nothing unto them as touching the administration of the Common-wealth. These are they which may properly be called the Peeres or Princes of the Realme of China: for they derive their houses and revenues unto their posterity, and so are these royall families continually preferred. But to returne unto the king himselfe, hee is most chary in observing the Chinesian lawes and customes, and diligently exerciseth himselfe in learning so much as concernes his estate, sheweth himselfe daily unto his chiefe Magistrates, and communeth of matters appertaining to the publique commoditie of the Realme. His palace is of wonderfull largenesse and capacity, out of the which he very seldom takes his progresse; and whensoever he doeth so, there are twelve chariots brought forth, all of them most like one to another both in workmanship and in value, that no man may discern in which the king himselfe is placed. He followeth in religion especially the opinions of the Magistrates, attributing diuine power unto heauen and earth as unto the parents of all, and with great solemnity sacrificing unto them. He hath divers most sumptuous Temples dedicated unto his ancestours, whereunto likewise he ascribeth diuine honour, and yet ceaseth hee not to fauour Priests of other sects, yea hee erecteth Temples unto their Patrons, endowing them with most rich revenues; and so often as any urgent necessity requireth, requireth, he enioynes continuall fastings and prayers vnto them : and after this sort he doeth in a manner patronize all the idolatrous sects of his Realme, and shewing himselfe ready to embrace any false religion whatsoeuer, he liueth in sundry and manifolde kindes of superstition. Out of all the former particulars by me alledged, you may easily coniecture that the administration of the kingdome of China doeth, for the most part, agree with the instinct of nature, authority being committed, not vnto rude and vnskillfull persons, but vnto such as haue borne conuictant in the vse and exercise of learning, yea, and in promoting learned men vnto magistracies, great consideration is had of their wisdom, iustice, and of other vertues esteemed by the Chilians : wherefore the way being open for all men, without any respect of degree or parentage, to obtaine any of the foresayd dignities, it can not be but that this most mighty and famous kingdome must needs enioy exceeding peace and tranquillity. Leo. I would not we (Michael) right gladly vnderstand, what kinde of vnbanity or ciuill demeanour both the common people and the Magistrates doe vse one towards another : for it is not likely that where such due administration of iustice is, common ciuility, which so well becometh all men, should be wanting. Michael. You haue hit euen the very naile on the head : for among the fine vertues, which the Chilians principally regard, vnbanity or courtely is one ; the rest are piety, a thankfull remembrance of benefices, true dealing in contracts or bargaines, and wisdom in achieving of matters : with the praises and commendations of which vertues the Chilian bookes are full fraught. Now as touching their vnbanity, it is much vnlike vnto ours in Iapan, and vnto that of Europe : howbeit vnder two principall kindes the rule of their vnbanity or courtely may be comprehended : whereof one is obserued betweene equals, and the other betweene superiours and inferiours. For when men of equall dignity meet together, they stand bending their backes, and bowing their heads downe to the ground, and this they doe either once or twise, or sometimes thyside. Now, when the inferiour meets with his superiour, the sayd inferiour, for the most part kneeling lowly on his knees, enclineth his countenance downe to the earth. But how often and when this obeizance is to be performed it is woonderfull what a number of rules and prescriptions are set downe, which to recount would require a long time. Somewhat also I will say as touching their piety, and especially of the piety which they vse towards their parents, which verily is so exceeding great, that for the space of thre whole yeres together, the sonnes being cladde in mourning vestures doe bewaile the death of their parents, which duty is performed not onely by the common sort, but euen by all the Magistrates themselves, and that most curiously and diligently. And, that all men may wholly giue their attendance vnto this businesse, it is provided by a most inuiolable law among the Chilians ; that Magistrates, vpon the death of their parents, must forthwith renounce their authority, and thre whole yeres, for the performance of their fathers exequies, must betake themselves vnto a private kinde of liuing : which also is most duly put in practise by the Senatours of the Kings owne Councell. For albeit a man be right gracious in the eyes of his Prince, yea, and such an one, as vpon whom the administration of the Realme doeth principally depend ; yet hauing heard of the death of his parents, that is, of his father or his mother ; he hies himselfe immediately home to solemnize their funerals : insomuch that if the king would retaine him still in his office, he should be esteemed by the people, as a transgressor of the lawes and customes of China : which accident (as it is recorded) in ancient times sel out euen so. For when as a certain king most familiarly vsed a certaine Senatour of his about the managing and expedition of publique affaires, and vnderstanding well how necessary the helpe of his foresayd Senatour was, would gladly, after the death of his father ; haue retained him still in his office : yet a certaine other man, being a wellwiller vnto the Chilian lawes, could in no case abide it, but checking his Prince with sharpe rebukes, objected the transgression of the law against him. The king warning wroth menaced present death vnto the man : but when the party being no whit daunted with the terrour of death, persisted still in his sayings, the king changing his determination dismissed the Senatour to mourne for his father, but as for his reprehender he aduanced him vnto an higher dignity. Linus. I perceiue (Michael) that drawing to an end of these dialogues, and being weary of your long tale, you begin to affect breuity : yet let it not seeme troublesome vnto you to speake somewhat of the religion of China, which onely thing seemes to be wanting in this present dialogue. Michael. I confesse indeed that I endenour to be brieue, not so much in regard of wearisomnesse, as for feare least I haue bene ouer tedious vnto you : howbeit I will not faile but accomplish that which I haue vnderaken, and (according to your request) adde somewhat moze concerning religion. Whereas therefore the kingdome of China hath hitherto bene destitute of true religion, and now the first beginnings thereof are included in most narrow bounds, that nation being otherwise a people most ingenious, and of an extraordinary and high high capacity, hath alwayes liued in great errors and ignorance of the trueth, being distracted into sundry opinions, and following manifold sects. And among these sects there are three more famous then the rest: the first is of them that profess the doctrine of one Confucius a notable philosopher. This man (as it is reported in the history of his life) was one of most upright and incorrupt manners, whereof he wrote sundry treatises very pithily and largely, which aboue all other books, are seriously read and perused by the Chinians. The same doctrine do all Magistrates embrace, and others also that giue their mindes to the study of letters, a great part whereof Confucius is sayd to haue inuented: and he is had in so great honour, that all his followers and clients, vpon the dayes of the new and full Moone, doe assemble themselves at the common Schoole, which I haue aboue mentioned, and before his image, which is worshipped with burning of incense and with tapers, they doe thise bend their knees, and bow their heads downe to the ground; which not onely the common scholars, but the chiefe Magistrates do performe. The summe of the foresayd doctrine is, that men should follow the light of nature as their guide, and that they should diligently endeavour to attaine vnto the vertues by me before mentioned: and lastly, that they should employ their labour about the orderly gouernment of their families and of the Common-wealth. All these things are in very deed praise-worthy, if Confucius had made any mention of almighty God and of the life to come, and had not ascribed so much vnto the heauens, and vnto fatal necessity, nor yet had so curiously intreated of worshipping the images of their forefathers. In which regard he can very hardly or not at all be excused from the crime of idolatry: notwithstanding it is to be granted, that none other doctrine among the Chinians appoacheth so neere vnto the trueth as this doeth. The second sect is of them which follow the instructions of Xaquam, or as the Chinians call him Xequiam, whose opinions, because they are well known amongst vs, it were bootlesse for me to reprat; especially sithens, in the Catechisme composed by our graue visitor, they are notably refuted. This doctrine doe all they embrace, which are in China called Cen, but with vs at Iapon are named Bonzi. For this I doe briefly and by the way giue you to vnderstand, that all words of the Chinians language are of one syllable onely, so that if there be any word that consisteth of more syllables then one, it consisteth also of more wordes then one. These sectaries called Cen doe shauē their beards and their heads, and doe for the most part, together with diuers of their associates, inhabit the Temples of Xaquam, or of others which in regard of the same profession haue in their Kalenders beene canonized for Saints, and doe rehearse certaine prayers after their manner, either vpon books or beads, vsing other ceremonies after the manner of our Bonzi. These men haue some iudgement of the life to come, and of the rewardes of good men, and the punishments of the wicked: howbeit all their assertions are fraught with errors. The third sect is of them which are called Tauzu: and those doe imitate a certaine other man, to be adored, as they thinke, for his holinesse. These also are Priests after their kinde, howbeit they let their haire grow, and doe in other obseruations differ from the former. Nowe, because the sect of Confucius is the most famous of all the three, and the two other sects called Cen and Tauzu are not much addicted vnto learning, their religion preuailing onely among the common sort, the Priests of both the sayd sects doe leade a most base and seruile life amongst the Chinians, inso-much that they kneele downe before the Magistrates, and are not permitted to sit beside them, and sometimes, if the Magistrate please, are abased vnto the punishment of the bastinado: whereas in our Isles of Iapon it is farre otherwise, Priests, euen of false religion, being had in so great honour among vs. Leo. I heard also (Michael) that the Saracens superstition takes place in China: now, whether it doth or no, you can resolue vs. Michael. That foreyn superstition was brought into China what time the Tartars inuaded the kingdome, and vsurped the gouernment thereof. All the Saracens therefore in China are originally descended of the Tartars, who, because they were an infinite number, could not utterly be expelled and rooted out of the kingdome; but remaining still there, haue propagated their posterity, though not their religion. These therefore are soldiers for the greater part of them, and sometimes doe obtaine martiall dignities: and except a few ceremonies of their superstition which is now become stale and almost worne out, they doe liue altogether after the Chinians fashion, their predecessors being brought into the same kingdome about foure hundred yeeres agoe. Linus. Now (Michael) let vs heare you say somewhat of the Christian religion, which as we hope hath set most happy footing in that kingdome. Michael. I could say much concerning those most wished and acceptable beginnings, were they not already published in Iapon by the letters of the fathers: howbeit I will make a brieue rehearsall of all things, that I may not seeme altogether to haue abandoned this labour. You know that from the time wherein the fathers of the society arrived in our Islands, to the end they might augment Christian religion, they were in like sort most carefull how they might insinuate themselves into the innermost parts of the kingdome of China. In the midst of this endeavour and trauell Francis Xavier, a most deuout man of the foresayd society, departed out of this present life at the Ile of Sancian (which some call Sangiam) leauing an example vnto the rest of his associates, how they should likewise doe their best to plant the religion of Christ in that nation. This man was seconded by others, who vsed all meanes, and left no practise vnattempted, that they might bring these good beginnings vnto a prosperous issue: howbeit they were greatly hindered by reason of an ancient custome in China, in regard whereof they doe not without great difficulty and circumspection admit any strangers into their dominions, except those which hauing a long time executed the office of ambassadours doe ordinarily euery third yeere present themselves before the king: in the admission of whom likewise there is marvellous care vsed, that they may not easily espie and become acquainted with the affaires of the Realme. Whereunto may be added, that the Chinians are great conteiners of other nations, and most constant obseruers of their owne lawes and customes: in all which respects it came to passe, that there was woonderfull labour and diligence employed aboue thirty yeeres together, onely to get an entrance, vntill in the yeere one thousand five hundred fourescore and thre, two fathers of the foresayd society, that had pretty skill in the letters and language of China, utterly despairing of mans helpe, and depending vpon the prouidence of almighty God, obtained licence of the Turan or Vice-roy to build them an house and a Church in the City of Xauquin, which by reason of the commodiousnesse thereof is the seat of the Vice-roy himselfe. This worke being begunne, the sayd fathers of the society, for the noueltie thereof, were a few yeeres right well entreated by the Magistrates: insomuch that two others out of India had free and easie access vnto them, one couple remaining still in their foresayd house at Xauquin, and the other two taking their iourney for the inner prouinces, to conuert more people vnto the faith: who notwithstanding afterward, other Magistrates not approving of their attempts, were constrained to retire. Nowe all the time wherein the foresayd fathers abode at Xauquin (being more then five yeeres) certaine of the common people were restrained from false superstition to Christian religion, and senenty persons were baptized. But the enuie of mankinde, who omitteth none opportunity for the hinderance of Christian religion, suggested into the mindes of the Chinians (being, as I sayd, of their owne nature, a people estranged from the traffique and acquaintance of other nations, and alwayes being too too suspicious of strangers) that they should exhibite letters of supplication vnto the Caen and the Turan their principall Magistrates, to haue the fathers expelled out of Xauquin: which Magistrates repairing vnto their foresayd house and Church entered consultation how they might bannish them out of the sayd City of Xauquin: in which thing verily they vsed great moderation, not any way offending or exasperating the mindes of the fathers, but onely signifying that they had regard vnto the estate of their Common-wealth. For the Turan or Vice-roy calling the fathers vnto him, and (to let passe other accidents) vsing courteous and familiar conference with them, declared by many arguments, that their habitation in the City of Xauquin was not conuenient, especially sithens so many Magistrates resorted vnto that City, who would take great offence at the presence of strangers. For the which cause he perswaded them to accept some part of the money which they had bestowed in the building of their house, and so to returne either home into their owne countrey, or vnto the port of Macao. Howbeit, such was the instant supplication of the fathers, and so woorthy of compassion, that the Turan or Vice-roy, in the extreame and mediterrane borders of the prouince of Coantum, assigned vnto them a new habitation at the city called Xaucheo, commending them also to a certaine Magistrate, who was come from the same place to salute him. Thither therefore the sayd fathers, not without great sorrow and griefe of the Christians, bled themselves, and as we are informed by their last letters, they haue euen now layed the foundation of their first building, and haue also written that they are like to liue much more peaceably and conueniently for the propagating of Christian religion. These be the first beginnings of Christianity in China, where, euen as in other places of the Christian Common-wealth, the seed is to be sown with great labour and teares, that acceptable fruites may be reaped with gladnesse. Leo. It is euen as you haue sayd (Michael) and nowe for this your pleasant and eloquent discourse we do acknowledge our selues much bounden vnto you.

A Letter written from Goa, the principall City of all the East Indies, by one Thomas Steuens an English man, and sent to his father, M. Thomas Steuens: Anno 1579.

After most humble commendations: These shall be to craue your daily blessing, with like commendations vnto my mother; and withall, to certifie you of my being: according to your will and my duty. I wrote vnto you taking my Iourney from Italy to Portugall, which letters I thinke are come to your hands, so that presuming therupon, I thinke I haue the lesse need at this time to tell you the cause of my departing, which neuerthelesse in one word I may conclude, if I do but name obedience. I came to Lisbon toward the end of March, eight dayes before the departure of the shippes, so late that if they had not bene stayed about some weighty matters, they had bene long gone before our coming: insomuch that there were others ordained to goe in our places, that the kings promise on and ours also might not be in vaine. Neuerthelesse our sudden coming tooke place, and the fourth of Aprill five shippes departed for Goa, wherein besides shipmen and souldiers, there were a great number of children which in the seas beate out better then men, and no maruell, when that many women also passe very well. The setting forth from the poze I need not to tell how solemn it is with trumpets, and shooting of ordinance, you may easily imagine it, considering that they go in the maner of warre. The tenth of the foresayd moneth we came to the sight of Porto Santo neere vnto Madera, where an English shippe set vpon ours (which was then also alone) with a few shots, which did no harme, but after that our ship had layed out her greatest ordinance, they straight departed as they came. The English shippe was very faire and great, which I was soyy to see so ill occupied, for she went roring about, so that we saw her againe at the Canarian Isles, vnto the which we came the thirteenth of the sayd moneth, and good leisure we had to woonder at the high mountaine of the Island Tenerif, for we wandred betweene that and great Canaria foure dayes by reason of contrary windes: and briefly, such euill weather we had vntill the foureteenth of May, that they despaired to compasse the Cape of Good hope that yeere. Neuerthelesse, taking our voyage betweene Guinea and the Islands of Capo Verde, without seeing of any land at all, we arriued at length vnto the coast of Guinie, which the Portugals so call, which is that part of the burning Zone, which is from the first degree vnto the Equinoctiall, in which partes they suffered so many inconueniences of heats, and lacke of windes, that they thinke themselves happy when they haue passed it: for sometimes the ship standeth there almost by the space of many dayes, sometime she goeth, but in such order that it were almost as good to stand still. And the greatest part of this coast not cleare, but thicke and cloudy, full of thunder and lightening, and raine so vnholosome, that if the water stand a litle while, all is full of wormes, and falling on the meat which is hanged by, it maketh it straight full of wormes. Along all that coast we oftentimes saw a thing swimming vpon the water like a cocks combe (which they call a ship of Guinea) but the colour much fairer; which combe standeth vpon a thing almost like the swimmer of a fish in colour and bignesse, and beareth underneath in the water, strings, which saue it from turning ouer. This thing is so poisonous, that a man cannot touch it without great perill. In this coast, that is to say, from the first degree vnto the Equinoctiall, we spent no lesse then thirty dayes, partly with contrary windes, partly with calme. The thirtieth of May we passed the Equinoctiall with contentation, directing our course as well as we could to passe the promontory, but in all that gulfe, & in all the way beside, we found so often calmes, that the expertest mariners wondred at it. And in places where are alwayes wont to be most horrible tempests, we found most quiet calmes which was very troublesome to those ships which be the greatest of all other, and cannot go without good windes. Insomuch, that when it is tempest almost intollerable for other ships, and maketh them maine all their sailes, these hoise by, and saile excellent well, vnlesse the waters be too too furious, which seldeome happened in our nauigation. You shall vnderstand, that being passed the line, they cannot straightway go the next way to the promontory: but according to the winde, they draw alwayes as neere South as they can to put themselves in the latitude of the point, which is 35 degrees and an halfe, and then they take their course towards the East, and so compasse the point. But the winde serued vs so, that at 33 degrees we did direct our course toward the point or promontory of Good hope.

You know that it is hard to saile from East to West, or contrary, because there is no fixed point in all the skie, whereby they may direct their course, wherefoze I shall tell you what helps God provided for these men. There is not a fowle that appereth, or signe in the aire, or in the sea, which they haue not written, which haue made the voyages heretofore. Wherefoze, partly by their owne experience, and pondering withall what space the ship was able to make with such a winde, and such direction, and partly by the experience of others, whose books and navigations they haue, they gesse whereabouts they be, touching degrees of longitude, for of latitude they be alwayes sure: but the greatest and best industry of all is to marke the variation of the needle or compasse, which in the Meridian of the Island of S. Michael, which is one of the Azores in the latitude of Lisbon, is iust North, and thence swarveth towards the East so much, that betwixt the Meridian aforesayd, and the point of Africa it carrieth three or foure quarters of 32. And againe in the point of Africke, a little beyond the point that is called Cape das Agulias (in English the needles) it returneth againe vnto the North, and that place passed, it swarveth againe toward the West, as it did before proportionally. As touching our first signes, the nearer we came to the people of Africke, the more strange kindes of fowles appeared, inso much that when we came within no lesse then thirty leagues (almost an hundred miles) and five hundred miles as we thought from any Island, as good as three thousand fowles of sundry kindes followed our ship: some of them so great that their wings being opened from one point to the other, contained seven spannes; as the Mariners sayd. A marvellous thing to see how God provided, so that in so wide a sea these fowles are all fed, and nothing wanteth them. The Portugals haue named them all according to some propriety which they haue: some they call Rushtailes, because their tailles be not proportionable to their bodies, but long and small like a rush, some forked tailles because they be very broad and forked, some Velvet fletters, because they haue wings of the colour of velvet, and bowe them as a man boweth his elbow. This bird is alwayes welcome, for he appeareth nearest the Cape; I should neuer make an end if I should tell all particulars: but it shall suffice briefly to touch a few, which yet shall be sufficient, if you marke them, to giue occasion to glorifie almighty God in his wonderfull works, and such variety in his creature. And to speake some what of fishes in all places of calme, especially in the burning Zone; neere the line (for without we neuer saw any) there waited on our ship fishes as long as a man, which they call Tuberones, they come to eat such things as from the shippe fall into the sea, not refusing nien themselves if they light vpon them. And if they finde any meat tied in the sea, they take it for theirs. These haue waiting on them six or seven small fishes (which neuer depart) with gardes blew and Greene round about their bodies; like comely serving men: and they go two or three before him, and some on euery side. Moreover, they haue other fishes which cleaue alwayes vnto their body, and seeme to take such superfluities as grow about them; and they are sayd to enter into their bodies also to purge them if they need. The Mariners in time past haue eaten of them, but since they haue seene them eate more their stomacks abhorre them. Neerthelittle, they draw them vp with great hooks, & kill of them as many as they can, thinking that they haue made a great reuenge. There is another kind of fish as bigge almost as a herring, which hath wings and flieth, and they are together in great number. These haue two enemies, the one in the sea, the other in the aire. In the sea the fish which is called Albocore, as big as a Salmon, followeth them with great swiftnesse to take them. This peoyle fish not being able swim fast, for he hath no finnes, but swimmeth with moouing of his taile, fluting his wings, lifteeth himselfe above the water, and flieth not verhye: the Albocore seeing that, although he haue no wings, yet he giueth a great leape out of the water, and sometimes catcheth him, or els he keepeth himselfe vnder the water going that way on as fast as he flieth. And when the fish being weary of the aire, or thinking himselfe out of danger, returneth into the water, the Albocore meeteth with him: but sometimes his other enemy the sea-crow, catcheth him before he falleth. With these and like sights, but alwayes making our supplications to God for good weather and saluation of the ship, we came at length vnto the point, so famous & feared of all men: but we found there no tempest, only great waues, where our Pilot was a little ouerleene: for where as commonly at other neuer come within sight of land, but seeing signes ordinary, and finding bot-come, go they way sure and safe, he thinking himselfe to haue winde at will, yet so nigh the land that the winde turning into the South, and the waues being exceeding great, rolled vs so nere the land, that the ship stood in lesse then 14 fadoms of water, no more then five miles from the Cape, which is called Das Agulias, and there we stood as vtterly cast away: for vnder vs were rocks of maine stone so sharpe, and cutting, that no ancre could hold the ship, the shore so cruell, that nothing could take land, and the land itselfe so full of Tigers, and people that are sauage, and killers of all strangers, that we had no hope of life nor comfort, but onely in God and a good conscience. Notwithstanding, after we had lost ancre, hoisting by the sailes for to get the ship a coast in some safer place, or when it should please God, it pleased his mercy suddenly, where no man looked for helpe, to fill our sailes with wind from the land, & so we escaped, thanks be to God. And the day following, being in the place where they are alwayes wont to catch fish, we also fell a fishing, and so many theyooke, that they serued all the ship for that day, and part of the next. And one of them pulled vp a cozall of great bignesse and price. For there they say (as we saw by experience) that the

corals doe grow in the maner of stalks vpon the rocks in the bottome, and were hard and red. The day of perill was the nine and twentieth of Iulij. And you shall vnderstand that the Cape passed, there be two wayes to India: one within the Ile of S. Laurence, which they take willingly, because they refresh themselves at Mosambique a fortnight or a moneth, not without great need, and thence in a moneth more land in Goa. The other is without the Ile of S. Laurence, which they take when they set forth so late, and come so late to the point, that they haue no time to take the foresayd Mosambique, and then they goe heavily, because in this way they take no port. And by reason of the long nauigation, and want of food and water, they fall into sundry diseases, their gummies were great, and swell, and they are faine to cut them away, their legges swell, and all the body becommeth sore, and so benumbed, that they can not stirre hand nor foot, and so they die for weakenesse, others fall into flures and agues, and die thereby. And this way it was our chance to make: yet though we had more then one hundred and fifty sick, there died not past seuen and twenty; which losse they esteemed not much in respect of other times. Though some of ours were diseased in this sort, yet, thanks be to God, I had my health all the way, contrary to the expectation of many: God send me my health so well in the land, if it may be to his honour and seruice. This way is full of many roekes and quicke-sands, so that sometimes we durst not saile by night, but by the prouidence of God we saw nothing, nor neuer found bottome untill we came to the coast of India. When we had passed againe the line, and were come to the third degree or some what more, we saw crabs swimming on the water that were red as though they had bene sodden: but this was no signe of land. After, about the eleuenth degree, the space of many dayes, more then ten thousand fishes by estimation followed round about our ship, whereof we caught so many, that for fifteene dayes we did care nothing els, and they serued our turne very well: for at this time we had neither meat nor almost any thing els to eate, our nauigation growing so long that it drew neere to seuen moneths, where as commonly they goe it in fise, I meane when they saile the inner way. But these fishes were not signe of land, but rather of deepe sea. At length we tooke a couple of birds, which were a kinde of Hawks, whereof they spoyled much, thinking that they had bene of India, but indeed they were of Arabia, as we found afterward. And we that thought we had bene neere India, were in the same latitude neere Zocotora, an Ile in the mouth of the Red sea. But there God sent vs great winds from the North-east or North-north-east, whereupon unwillingly they bare vp toward the East, and thus we went tenne dayes without seeing signe of land, whereby they perceived their error: for they had directed their course befoze alwayes North-east, coueting to multiply degrees of latitude, but partly by the difference of the Needle, and most of all the running seas, which at that time ran North-west, had drawen vs to this other danger, had not God sent vs this winde, which at length wared larger, and restored vs to our right course. These running seas be so perillous that they deceiue the most part of the gouernours, and some be so little curious, contenting themselves with ordinary experience, that they care not to seeke out any meanes to know when they swarue, neither by the compasse, nor by any other triall. The first signe of land were certaine fowles which they knew to be of India: the second, boughes of palmes and sedges: the third, snakes swimming on the water, and a substance which they call by the name of a coine of money, as broad and as round as a groat, woonderfully printed and stamped of nature, like vnto some coine. And these two last signes be so certaine, that the next day after, if the winde serue, they see land, which we did to our great joy, when all our water (for you know they make no beere in those parts) and victuals began to faile vs. And to Goa we came the foure and twentieth day of October, there being receiued with passing great charity. The people be tawny, but not disfigured in their lips & noses, as the Moors and Cafres of Ethiopia. They that be not of reputation, or at least the most part, goe naked, sauing an apizon of a span long, and as much in breadth befoze them, and a lace two fingers broad befoze them, girted about with a string and no more: and thus they thinke them as well as we with all our trimming. Of the fruits and trees that be here I cannot now speake, for I should make another letter as long as this. For hitherto I haue not seene a tree here, whose like I haue seene in Europe, the vine excepted, which neuertheless here is to no purpose, so that all the wines are brought out of Portugall. The drinke of this countrey is good water, or wine of the Palme tree, or of a fruit called Cocos. And this shall suffice for this time. If God send me my health, I shall haue opportunity to write to you once againe. Now the length of my letter compelleth me to take my leaue: and thus I wish your most prosperous health. A briefe relation of the great magnificence and rich traffike of the kingdome of Pegu beyond the East India, written by Frey Peter of Lisbon, to his coulin Frey Diego of Lisbon, from Cochin.

The coast of India greatly troubled with Moories.

Abundance of golde, silver, pearles, & precious stones in Pegu.

The great gaine of the Portugals in Pegu.

Pegu the best & richest countrey in all the East India.

A prophesie of an Indian against Spaine.

I Received your letters in the harbour of Damaon by a carauell of aduise that came from Malacca, which brought shot, powder, and other prouision for the furnishing of foure gallies and a great gallion, which are now in building, to keepe our coast for feare of great store of men of warre, being Moories, which trouble vs very sore. At that instant when I receiued your letters I was newly come from the kingdome of Pegu, where I had remained one yeere and an halfe, and from thence I departed to the city of Cochin in October 1587. The newes which I can certifie you of concerning these countreys are: That this king of Pegu is the mightiest king of men, & the richest that is in these parts of the world: for he bringeth into the field at any time, when he hath warres with other princes, aboute a million of fighting men: howbeit they be very leane and small people, and are brought vnto the field without good order. He is lord of the Elephants, and of all the golde and silver mines, and of all the pearles and precious stones: so that he hath the greatest store of treasure that euer was heard of in these parts. The countrey people call him The God of trueth and of iustice. I had great conference with this king, and with the head captaine of the Portugals, which is one of the countrey. They demanded of me many questions as touching the law and faith of Iesus Christ, and as touching the Ten Commandements. And the king gaue his consent that our Order should build a Church in his countrey, which was halfe builded; but our peruerse and malicious Portugals plucked it downe againe: for whereas it is a countrey wherein our nation gaine very much by their commodities, they fearing that by the building of this Church there would be greater resort thither, and so their trade should be impaired, if their great gaines should be known vnto others then those which found this countrey out first, therefore they were so vntwilling that the building of this Church should goe forward. Our Portugals which are here in this realme are woorse people then the Gentiles. I preached diuers times among those heathen people; but being obstinate they say, that as their fathers beleued so they will beleue: for if their forefathers went to the diuell so they will. Whereupon I returned backe againe to our monastery to certifie our father prouinciall of the estate of this new found countrey. It is the best and richest countrey in all this East India; and it is thought to be richer then China.

I am afraide that the warres which his Maiesty hath with England will be the vtter vndoing and spoile of Spaine: for these countreys likewise are almost spoiled with ciuill warres, which the Moories haue against the Gentiles: for the kings here are vp in armes all the countrey ouer. Here is an Indian which is counted a Prophet, which hath prophesied that there will a Dragon arise in a strange countrey, which will do great hurt to Spaine. Now it will fall out, onely God doth know. And thus I rest: from this monastery of Cochin the 28 of December, 1589.

Your good coulin and assured friend frier Peter of Lisbon.

A voyage with three tall ships, the Penelope Admirall, the Marchant royall Viceadmirall, and the Edward Bonauenture Rereadmirall, to the East Indies, by the Cape of Buona Speransa, to Quitangone neere Mosambique, to the Iles of Comoro and Zanzibar on the backside of Africa, and beyond Cape Comori in India, to the Iles of Nicobar and of Gomes Polo within two leagues of Sumatra, to the Ilands of Pulo Pinaom, and thence to the maine land of Malacca, begunne by M. George Raymond, in the yeere 1591, and performed by M. Iames Lancaster, and written from the mouth of Edmund Barker of Ipswich, his lieutenant in the sayd voyage, by M. Richard Hakluyt.

Our fleet of the three tall ships abouenamed departed from Plimouth the 10 of April 1591, and arrived at the Canarie Ilands the 25 of the same, from whence we departed the 29 of April. The second of May we were in the height of Cape Blanco. The fift we passed the tropique of Cancer. The eight we were in the height of Cape Verde. All this time we went with a faire winde at North-east, alwayes before the winde vntill the 13 of the same moneth, when we came within 8 degrees of the Equinoctiall line, where we met with a contrary winde. Here we lay off and on in the sea vntill the first of June, on which day we passed the sayd line. While we lay thus off off and on, we tooke a Portugal Carauel laden by marchants of Lisbon for Brasile, in which Carauel we had some 60 tunnes of wine, 1200 iarrs of oyle, about 100 iarrs of olives, certaine barrels of capers, three fatts of peason, with diuers other necessaries fit for our voyage: which wine, oyle, olives and capers were better to vs then gold. We had two men died before we passed the line, and diuers sicke, which tooke their sicknesse in those hote climates: for they were wonderful vnholtsome from 8 degrees of North to the line, at that time of the yeere: for we had nothing but Ternados, with such thunder, lightning, and raine, that we could not keep our men drie 3 houres together, which was an occasion of the infection among them, and their eating of salt victuals, with lacke of clothes to shift them. After we passed the line, we had the wind still at Eastsoutheast, which caried vs along the coast of Brasil 100 leagues from the maine, til we came in 26 degrees to the Southward of the line, where the wind came vp to the North, at which time we did account, that the Cape of Buona esperansa did beare off vs East and by South, be- twixt 900 and 1000 leagues. Passing this gulfe from the coast of Brasil vnto the Cape we had the wind often variable as it is vpon our coast, but for the most part so, that we might lie our course. The 28 of Iuly we had sight of the foresayd Cape of Buona esperansa: vntill the 31 wee lay off and on with the wind contrary to double the Cape, hoping to double it, & so to haue gone seuentie leagues further to a place called Agoada de S. Bras, before we would haue sought to haue put in to any harbour. But our men being weake and sicke in all our shippes, we thought good to seeke some place to refresh them. With which consent we bare vp to the land to the Northward of the Cape, and going along the shore, we espied a goodly Baie with an Island lying to Seawards of it, into which we did beare, and found it very commodious for our ships to ride in. This Baie is called Agoada de Saldanha, lying 15 leagues Northward on the hither side of the Cape. The first of August being Sunday we came to an anchor in the Baie, sending our men on land, and there came vnto them certaine blacke Saluages very brutish which would not stay, but retired from them. For the space of 15 or 20 dayes we could find no reliefe but onely foules which wee killed with our pieces, which were cranes and geese: there was no fish but mullets and other shel- fish, which we gathered on the rockes. After 15 or 20 dayes being here, our Admirall went with his pinnasse vnto the Island which lieth off this Baie, where hee found great store of Penguins & Seales, whereof he brought good plenty with him. And eue after that we sent certain of our men, which at both times brought their boes lading vnto our ships. After we had bene here some time, we got here a Negro, whom we compelled to march into the country with vs, making signs to bring vs some cattell; but at this time we could come to the sight of none, so we let the Negro goe with some trifles. Within 8 dayes after, he with 30 or 40 other Negros, brought vs downe some 40 bullocks and oxen, with as many sheepe: at which time we bought but few of the. But within 8 dayes after they came downe with as many more; & then we bought some 24 oxen with as many sheepe. We bought an ore for two knives, a stirke for a knife, and a sheepe for a knife, and some we bought for lesse value then a knife. The oxen be very large and well fleshed, but not fat. The sheepe are very big and very good meat, they haue no woll on their backs but haire, and haue great tailed like the sheepe in Syria. There be diuers sorts of wild beasts, as the Antelope, (whereof M. Lancaster killed one of the bignes of a yong colt) the red & fallow Deere, with other great beasts vnknewen vnto vs. There are also great store of ouer-grown monkeys. As touching our proceeding vpon our voyage, it was thought good rather to proceed with two ships wel man- ned, then with three euill manned: for here wee had of sound and whole men but 198, of which there went in the Penelope with the Admirall 101, and in the Edward with the worshipfull M. capitaine Lancaster 97. We left behind 50 men with the Roiall marchant, whereof there were many pretily well recouered, of which ship was master and gouernour Abraham Kendal, which for many reasons we thought good to send home. The discafe that hath consumed our men hath bene the skurue. Our souldiers which haue not bene vled to the Sea, haue best held out, but our mariners dyopt away, which (in my iudgement) proceeded of their euill diet at home.

Sire dayes after our sending backe for England of the Marchant Roiall from Agoada de Saldanha, our Admirall M. capitaine Raimond in the Penelope, and M. James Lancaster in the Edward Bonauenture, set forth to double the Cape of Buona esperansa, which they did very speedily. But being passed as far as Cape dos Corrientes, the 14 of September we were encount- red with a mighty storme and extreme gulfs of wind, wherein we lost our Generals companie, and could neuer heare of him nor his ship any more, though we did our best endeavour to seeke him vp and downe a long while, and staied for him certaine dayes at the Island of Comoro, where we appointed to stay one for another. Foure dayes after this vncomfortable seperation in the mo- ning toward ten of the clocke we had a terrible clap of thunder, which slew foure of our men out- right, their necks being wryung in sonder without speaking any word, and of 94 men there was not one vntouched, whereof some were stricken blind, others were bzuised in their legs & armes, and others in their bytts, so that they voided blood two dayes after, others were drawn out at length as though they had bene racked. But (God be thanked) they all recovered sauing onely the foure which were slaine out right. Also with the same thunder our maine masse was tozned very grievously from the head to the verke, and some of the spikes that were ten inches into the timber, were melted with the extreme heate thereof. From thence wee shaped our course to the North-east, and not long after we fell vpon the North-west end of the mighty Island of S. Laurence: which one of our men espied by Gods good blessing late in the evening by Moone light, who seeing as farre off the breaking of the Sea, and calling to certaine of his fellowes, asked them what it was: which ctsloones told him that it was the breaking of the Sea vpon the Shoulds. Whereupon in very good time we cast about to auoyd the danger which we were like to haue incurred. Thus passing on forward, it was our lucke to our-shoote Mozambique, and to fall with a place called Quirangone two leagues to the Northward of it, and we tooke three or foure Barkes of Moores, which Barkes in their language they call Pangaias, laden with Milio, hennes, and ducks, with one Portugall boy, going for the prouision of Mozambique. With in few dayes following we came to an Island an hundred leagues to the North-east of Mozambique called Comoro, which we found exceeding full of people, which are Moores of tawnie colour and good stature, but they be very trecherous and diligently to be taken heed of. Here wee desired to stoze our selues with water, whereof we stood in great need, and sent sixteene of our men well armed on those in our boate: whom the people suffered quietly to land and water, and diuers of them with their king came aboard our ship in a gowne of crimosine Sattin pinked after the Moorish fashion downe to the knee, whom we entertained in the best maner, and had some conference with him of the state of the place and marchandises, vsing our Portugall boy which we had taken befoze for our interpreter, and in the end licensed the king and his company to depart, and sent our men againe for moze water, who then also dispatched their businesse, & returned quietly: the third time likewise we sent them for moze, which also returned without any harme. And though we thought our selues furnished, yet our master William Mace of Radcliffe pretending that it might be long befoze we should finde any good watering place, would needes goe himselfe on those with thirtie men, much against the will of our captaine, and hee and 16 of his company, together with one boat which was all that we had, and 16 others that were a washing ouer-against our ship, were betrayed of the perfidious Moores, and in our sight for the most part slaine, we being not able for want of a boat to peeld them any succour. From hence with heauie hearts we shaped our course for Zanzibar the 7 of Nouember, where shortly after wee arriued and made vs a new boat of such boards as we had within board, and rid in the road vntill the 15 of February, where, during our aboad, we sawe diuers Pangaias or boates, which are pinned with wooden pinnes, and sowed together with Palmito cordes, and calked with the huskes of Cocos shels beaten, whereof they make Decaim. At length a Portugal Pangaiia comming out of the harborow of Zanzibar, where they haue a small Factorie, sent a Canoa with a Moore which had bene christened, who brought vs a letter wherein they desired to know what wee were, and what we sought. We sent them word we were Englishmen come from Don Antonio vpon businesse to his friends in the Indies: with which answer they returned, and would not any moze come at vs. Whereupon not long after wee manned out our boat and tooke a Pangaiia of the Moores, which had a priest of theirs in it, which in their language they call a Sherife: whom we vsed very curteously: which the king tooke in very good part, hauing his priests in great estimation, and for his deliuerance furnished vs with two moneths victuals, during all which time we detained him with vs. These Moores informed vs of the false and spitefull dealing of the Portugals towards vs, which made them belceue that we were cruell people and men-eaters, and willed them if they loued their safetie in no case to come neere vs. Which they did onely to cut vs off from all knowledge of the state and traffique of the countrey. While we roade from the end of Nouember vntill the middle of February in this harborow, which is sufficient for a ship of 500 tuns to ride in, we set vpon a Portugall Pangaiia with our boat, but because it was very litle, & our men not able to stirre in it, we were not able to take the sayd Pangaiia, which was armed with 10 good shot like our long forling pieces. This place for the goodnesse of the harborow and watering, and plentifull refreshing with fish, whereof we tooke great stoze with our nets, and for sundry sorts of fruits of the countrey, as Cocos and others, which were brought vs by the Moores, as also for oren and hennes, is carefully to be sought for by such of our ships, as shall hereafter passe that way. But our men had need to take good heed of the Portugals: for while we lay here the Portugall Admiral of the coast from Melinde to Mozambique, came to victuall and to betray our boat if he could haue taken at any time aduantage, in a gallie frigate of ten tunnes with 8 or 9

oares on a shoer. Of the strength of which Frigate and their trecherous meaning we were aduertised by an Arabian Hoore which came from the king of Zanzibar diuers times vnto vs about the deliuerie of the priest aforesayd, and afterward by another which we caried thence along with vs: for wherefoeuer we came, our care was to get into our hands some one or two of the countreys to learne the languages and states of those partes where we touched. Hooreouer, here againe we had another clap of thunder which did shake our fozenmast very much, which wee fildt and repaired with timber from the shoer, whereof there is good store thereabout of a kind of trees somefortie foote high, which is a red and tough wood, and as I suppose, a kind of Cedar. Here our Surgeon Arnold negligently catching a great heate in his head being on land with the master to seeke oren, fell sicke and shortly died, which might haue bene cured by letting of blood before it had bin fetled. Before our departure we had in this place some thousand weight of pitch, or rather a kind of gray and white gumme like vnto frankincense, as clamme as turpentine, which in melting groweth as blacke as pitch, and is very brittle of it selfe, but we mingled it with oile, whereof wee had 300 iarrs in the prize which we tooke to the Northward of the Equinoctiall, not farre from Guinie, bound for Brasil. Sixe dayes before wee departed hence, the Cape merchant of the Factorie wrote a letter vnto our capitaine in the way of friendship, as he pretended, requesting a iarre of wine, and a iarre of oyle, and two or thzee pounds of gunpowder, which letter hee sent by a Negro his man, and Moore in a Canoa: we sent him his demaunds by the Moore, but tooke the Negro along with vs because we vnderstood he had bene in the East Indies and knew somewhat of the countrey. By this Negro we were aduertised of a small Barke of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moores call a Tunco) which was come from Goa thither laden with Pepper for the Factorie and seruire of that kingdome. Thus hauing trimmed our shippe as we lay in this road, in the end we set forward for the coast of the East India, the 15 of February aforesayd, intending if we could to haue reached to Cape Comori, which is the headland of Promontorie of the maine of Malauar, and there to haue lien off and on for such ships as should haue passed from Zeilan, Sant Tome, Bengala, Pegu, Malacca, the Moluccos, the coast of China, and the Ile of Iapan, which ships are of exceeding wealth and riches. But in our course we were very much deceiued by the currents that set into the gulfe of the Red sea along the coast of Melinde. And the windes shortening vpon vs to the Northeast and Easterly, kept vs that we could not get off, and so with the putting in of the currents from the Westward, set vs in further vnto the Northward within fourescore leagues of the Ile of Zocotora, farre from our determined course and expectation. But here we neuer wanted abundance of Dolphins, Bonitos and flying fishes. Now while we found our selues thus farre to the Northward, and the time being so farre spent, we determined to goe for the Red sea, or for the Island of Zocotora, both to refresh our selues, and also for some purchase. But while wee were in this consultation, the winde very luckily came about to the Northwest and caried vs directly toward Cape Comori. Before we should haue doubled this Cape, we were determined to touch at the Islands of Mamale, of which we had aduertisement, that one had victuals, standing in the Northerly latitude of twelue degrees. Howbeit it was not our good lucke to finde it, which fell out partly by the obstinacie of our master: for the day before we fell with part of the Islands the wind came about to the Southwest, and then shifting our course we missed it. So the wind increasing Southerly, we feared we should not haue bene able to haue doubled the Cape, which would haue greatly hazarded our casting away vpon the coast of India, the Winter season and Westerne Monsons already being come in, which Monsons continue on that coast vntil August. Neuertheles it pleased God to bring the wind more Westely, & so in the moneth of May 1592, we happily doubled Cape Comori without sight of the coast of India. From hence thus hauing doubled this Cape, we directed our course for the Islands of Nicubar, which lie North and South with the Westerne part of Sumatra, and in the latitude of 7 degrees to the Northward of the Equinoctiall. From which Cape of Comori vnto the aforesayd Islands we ranne in sixe dayes with a very large wind though the weather were soule with extreme raine and gulfes of windes. These Islands were missed through our masters default for want of due obseruation of the South starre. And we fell to the Southward of them within the sight of the Islands of Gomes Polo, which lie hard vpon the great Island of Sumatra the first of Iune, and at the Northeast side of them we lay two or thzee dayes becalmed, hoping to haue had a Pilote from Sumatra, within two leagues whereof wee lay off and on. Now the Winter comming vpon vs with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Islands of Pulo Pinaou, (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malaian tongue signifieth an Island) at which Islands wee arrived about the beginning of Iune, where we came to an anker in a very good harborough betwene thzee Islands: at which time our men were very sicke and many fallen. Here we determined to stay vntill the Winter were ouerpass. This place is in 6 degrees and a halfe to the Northward, and some five leagues from the maine betweene Malacca and Pegu. Here we continued vntill the end of August. Our refreshing in this place was very small, onely of oysters growing on rocks, great wilks, and some few fish which we tooke with our hookes. Here we landed our sicke men on these vnihabited Islands for their health, neuertheless 26 of them died in this place, whereof John Hall our master was one, and M. Rainold Golding another, a marchant of great honestie and much discretion. In these Islands are abundance of trees of white wood, so right and tall, that a man may make mastes of them being an hundred foote long. The winter passed and hauing watered our ship and fitted her to goe to Sea, wee had left vs but 33 men and one boy, of which not past 22 were found for labour and helpe, and of them not past a third part sailers: thence we made saile to seeke some place of refreshing, and went ouer to the maine of Malacca. The next day we came to an anker in a Baie in six fadomes water some two leagues from the shoze. Then master James Lancaster our capitaine, and M. Edmund Barker his lieutenant, and other of the companie manning the boat, went on shoze to see what inhabitants might be found. And coming on land we found the tracking of some barefooted people which were departed thence not long before: for we sawe their fire still burning, but people we sawe none, nor any other living creature, saue a certaine kind of foule called ore birds, which are a gray kind of Sea-foule, like a Snite in colour, but not in beake. Of these we killed some eight dozen with baile-shot being very tame, and spending the day in search, returned toward night aboard. The next day about two of the clocke in the afternoone we espied a Canoa which came neere vnto vs, but would not come aboard vs, hauing in it some sixteen naked Indians, with whom neuertheless going after ward on land, we had friendly conference and promise of victuals. The next day in the morning we espied thre ships, being all of burthen 60 or 70 tunnes, one of which wee made to strike with our very boate: and understanding that they were of the towne of Marrabam, which is the chiefe hauien towne for the great citie of Pegu, and the goods belonging to certaine Portugal Iesuites and a Biscuit baker a Portugal, we tooke that ship & did not force the other two, because they were laden for marchants of Pegu, but hauing this one at our command, we came together to an anker. The night folowing all the men except twelue, which we tooke into our ship, being most of them borne in Pegu, fled away in their boate, leauing their ship and goods with vs. The next day we weighed our anker and went to the Leeward of an Island hard by, and tooke in her lading being pepper, which thee and the other two had laden at Pera, which is a place on the maine 30 leagues to the South. Besides the aforesaid thre ships, we tooke another ship of Pegu laden with pepper, and perceiuing her to bee laden with marchants goods of Pegu onely, wee dismissed her without touching any thing.

Winter

Thus hauing staied here 10 daies and discharged her goods into the Edward, which was about the beginning of September, our sicke men being somewhat refreshed and lustie, with such reliefe as we had found in this ship, we weighed anker, determining to runne into the streights of Malacca to the Islands called Pulo Sambilam, which are some five and forty leagues Northward of the citie of Malacca, to which Islands the Portugals must needs come from Goa or S. Thome, for the Malucos, China, and Iapan. And when wee were there arrived, we lay too and agayne for such shipping as should come that way. Thus hauing spent some five dayes, vpon a Sunday we espied a saile which was a Portugall ship that came from Negapatan a towne on the maine of India ouer-against the Northeast part of the Ile of Zeilan; and that night we tooke her being of 250 tunnes: she was laden with Rice for Malacca. Capitaine Lancaster commanded their capitaine and master aboard our shippe, and sent Edmund Barker his lieutenant and seuen more to keepe this prize, who being aboard the same, came to an anker in thirtie fadomes water: for in that chancell thre or foure leagues from the shoze you shall finde good ankorage. Being thus at an anker and keeping out a light for the Edward, another Portugall ship of Sant Thome of foure hundred tunnes, came and ankered hard by vs. The Edward being put to Leeward for lacke of helpe of men to handle her sailes, was not able the next morning to fetch her vp, vntill we which were in the prize with our boate, went to helpe to man our shippe. Then coming aboard we went toward the shippe of Sant Thome, but our ship was so foule that she escaped vs. After we had taken out of our Portugall prize what we thought good, we turned her and all her men away except a Pilot and foure Moores. We continued here vntill the sixt of October, at which time we met with the ship of the capitaine of Malacca of seuen hundred tunnes which came from Goa: we shot at her many shot, and at last shooting her maine-yard through, she came to an anker and yeilded. We commaunded her Capitaine, Master, Pilot and Purser to come aboard vs. But the Capitaine accompanied with one souldier onely came, and after certaine conference with him, he made excuse to fetch the Master and Purser, which he sayd would not come unless he he went for them : but being gotten from vs in the edge of the euening, he with all the people which were to the number of about three hundred men, women and children, gore a shooe with two great boates and quite abandoned the ship. At our comming aboard we found in her sixteen pieces of brasse, and three hundred butts of Canarie wine, and Rhipar wine, which is made of the palme trees, and raisin wine which is also very strong : as also all kind of Haberdasher wares, as hats, red caps knit of Spanish wooll, woisted stockings knit, shoes, beluets, cassakes, chamlers, and silkes, abundance of suckets, rice, Venice glasses, certaine papers full of false and counterfeit stones which an Italian brought from Venice to deceive the rude Indians withall, abundance of playing cardes, two or three packs of french paper. Whatsoever became of the treasure which usually is brought in roials of plate in this gallion, we could not find it. After that the mariners had disordredly pilld this rich shippe, the Captaine because they would not follow his commandement to unlade those excellent wines into the Edward, abandoned her & let her driue at Sea, taking out of her the choicest things that she had. And doubting the forces of Malacca, we departed thence to a Baie in the kingdom of Insalaom, which is betweene Malacca and Pegu eight degrees to the Northward, to seeke for pitch to trimme our ship. Here we sent our souldier, which the captaine of the aforesaid gallion had left behind him with vs, because he had the Malaian language, to deale with the people for pitch, which hee did faithfully, and procured vs some two or three quintals with promise of moze, and certaine of the people came unto vs. We sent commodities to their king to barter for Amber-griese, and for the hoznes of Abach, whereof the king onely hath the traffique in his hands. Now this Abach is a beast which hath one hozne onely in her forehead, and is thought to be the female Unicoine, and is highly esteemed of all the Moores in those parts as a most soueraigne remedie against popson. We had onely two or three of these hoznes which are of the colour of a browne gray, and some reasonable quantitie of Amber-griese. At last the king went about to betray our Portugall with our marchandise : but he to get aboard vs, told him that we had gilt armour, whirtes of maile and halberds, which things they greatly desire : for hope whereof he let him returne aboard, and so he escaped the danger. Thus we left this coast and went backe againe in sight of Sumatra, and thence to the Islands of Nicubar, where we arrived and found them inhabited with Moores, and after wee came to an anker, the people daily came aboard vs in their Canoas, with hennes, Cocos, plantans and other fruits: and within two dayes they brought unto vs roials of plate, giuing vs them for Calicut cloth: which roials they finde by diuing for them in the Sea, which were lost not long before in two Portugall ships which were bound for China and were cast away there. They call in their language the Coro Calambe, the Plantane Pison, a Pen lam, a fish Iecan, a Hog Babee. From thence we returned the 21 of November to goe for the Island of Zeilan, and arrived there about the third of December 1592. and ankered vpon the Southside in five fadomes water, where we lost our anker, the place being rockie and soule ground. Then we ranne along the Southwest part of the said Island, to a place called Punta del Galle, where we ankered, determining there to haue remained untill the comming of the Bengala Fleet of seuen or eight ships, and the fleet of Pegu of two or three sailes, and the Portugall shippes of Tanaseri being a great Baie to the Southward of Martaban in the kingdom of Siam: which ships, by diuers intelligences which we had, were to come that way within foureteene dayes to bring commodities to serue the Caraks, which commonly depart from Cochin for Portugall by the middelt of Januarie. The commodities of the shippes which come from Bengala bee fine pauillions for beds, wrought quilts, fine Calicut cloth, Pintados and other fine woakes, and Rice, and they make this voiage twice in the yeere. Those of Pegu bring the chiefest stones, as Rubies and Diamants, but their chiefest freight is Rice and certaine cloth. Those of Tanaseri are chiefly freighted with Rice and Rhipar wine, which is very strong, and in colour like unto rocke water somewhat whitish, and verphote in taste like unto Aqua vitæ. Being shot vp to the place aforesaid, called Punta del Galle, wee came to an anker in soule ground and lost the same, and lay all that night a drift, because we had now but two ankers left vs, which were unstocked and in hold. Whereupon our men tooke occasion to come home, our Captaine at that time lying very sicke moze like to die then to liue. In the morning wee set our foresaile determining to lie by to the Northward and there to keepe our selues to and againe out of the current, which otherwile would haue let vs off to the Southward from all known land. Thus hauing set our foresaile, and in hand to set all our other sayles to accomplish our aforesaid determination, our men made answere that they would take their direct course for England and would stay there no longer. Nowe seeing they could not bee perswaded by any meanes possible, the captaine was constrained to giue his consene to returne, leauing all hope of so great possibilities. Thus the eight of December 1592. wee set saile for the Cape of Buona Speransa, passing by the Islands of Maldina, and leauing the mightie Island of S. Laurence on the Narreboord of Northward in the latitude of 26 degrees to the South. In our passage ouer from S. Laurence to the maine we had exceeding great store of Bonitos and Albocores, which are a greater kind of fish: of which our captain, being now reco- uered of his sicknesse, tooke with an hooke as many in two or thre howers as would serue fortie persons a whole day. And this skole of fish continued with our ship for the space of five or six weekes, all which while we tooke to the quantitie aforesayd, which was no small refreshing to vs. In February 1593. we fell with the Eastermost land of Africa at a place called Baia de Agoa some 100 leagues to the North-east of the Cape of Good Hope: and finding the winds con- trary, we spent a moneth or five weekes before we could double the Cape. After wee had dou- bled it in March following, wee directed our course for the Island of Santa Helena, and arrived there the third day of Aprill, where wee staid to our great comfort nineteene dayes: in which meane space some one man of vs tooke thirtie goodly Congers in one day, and other rockie fishe and some Bonitos. After our arrivall at Santa Helena, J. Edmund Barker went on shore with foure or five Peguins or men of Pegu which we had taken, and our Surgion, where in an house by the Chappell I found an Englishman one John Segar of Burie in Suffolke, who was left there eightene moneths before by Abraham Kendall, who put in there with the Roiall marchant, and left him there to refresh him on the Island, being otherwise like to haue perished on shipboord: and at our comming wee found him as fresh in colour and in as good plight of body to our see- ming as might be, but crazed in minde and halfe out of his wits, as afterward wee perceiued: for whether he were put in fright of vs, not knowing at first what we were, whether friends or foes, or of sudden ioy when he vnderstood we were his olde comforts and countrey men, hee be- came idle-headed, and for eight dayes space neither night nor day tooke any naturall rest, and so at length died for lacke of sleepe. Here two of our men, whereof the one was diseased with the skurvie, and the other had bene nine moneths sicke of the fluxe, in short time while they were on the Island, recovered their perfect health. We found in this place great store of very holseme and excellent good greene figs, oranges, and lemons very faire, abundante of goates and hogs, and great plentie of partridges, Guineacocks, and other wilde foules. Our mariners somewhat discontented being now watered and hauing some prouision of fish, contrary to the will of the capitaine, would straight home. The capitaine because he was desirous to goe for Phernambuc in Brasil, granted their request. And about the 12 of Aprill 1593. we departed from S. Hele- na, and directed our course for the place aforesayd. The next day our capitaine calling vpon the sailers to finish a foresaile which they had in hand, some of them answered that vnesse they might goe directly home, they would lay their hands to nothing; whercupon he was constrained to so- low their humour. And from thence-foorth we directed our course for our countrey, which we kept untill we came 8 degrees to the Northward of the Equinoctiall, betwene which 8 de- grees and the line, we spent some six weekes, with many calme and contrary winds at North, and sometimes to the Eastward, & sometimes to the Westward: which losse of time and expense of our victuals, whereof we had very smal store, made vs doubt to keepe our course: and some of our men growing into a mutinie threathed to brake vp other mens chests, to the ouerthrow of our victuals and all our selues, for every man had his share of his victuals before in his owne custody, that they might be sure what to trust to, and husband it more thriftily. Our capitaine seeking to pzeuent this mischiefe, being aduertised by one of our companie which had bene at the Ile of Tri- nidada in D. Chidleis voyage, that there we should be sure to haue refreshing, hereupon directed his course to that Island, and not knowing the currents, we were put past it in the night into the gulfe of Paria in the beginning of June, wherein we were 8 dayes, finding the current continually setting in, and oftentimes we were in 3 fadomes water, and could find no going out until the cur- rent had put vs ouer to the Westernside vnder the maine land, where we found no current at all, and more deep water; and so keeping by the shore, the wind off the shore euery night did helpe vs out to the Northward. Being cleare, within foure or five dayes after we fell with the Ile of Mo- na where we ankred and rode some eightene dayes. In which time the Indians of Mona gaue vs some refreshing. And in the meane space there arrived a french ship of Cane in which was capitaine one Monsieur de Barbarerre, of whom wee bought some two butts of wine and beead, and other victuals. Then wee watered and fitted our shippe, and stopp'd a great leake which broke on vs as we were beating out of the gulfe of Paria. And hauing thus made ready our ship to goe to Sea, we determined to goe directly for New-found-land. But before wee departed, there arose a storme the winde being Northerly, which put vs from an Anker and forced vs to the Southward of Santo Domingo. This night we were in danger of shipwacke vpon an Island called Sauona, which is environed with flats lying 4 or 5 miles off: yet it pleased God to cleare vs of them, & so we directed our course Westward along the Island of Santo Domingo, and doubled Cape

Cape Tiberon, and passed through the old chanell betwene S. Domingo and Cuba for the cape of Florida: And here we met againe with the French ship of Caen, whose Captaine could spare vs no more victuals, as he said, but only hides which he had taken by traffike vpon those Islands, where with we were content and gaue him for them to his good satisfaction. After this, passing the Cape of Florida, and cleere of the chanell of Bahama, we directed our course for the banke of Newfoundland. Thus running to the height of 36 degrees, and as farre to the East as the Isle of Bermuda the 17 of September finding the winds there very variable, contrarie to our expectation and all mens iudgings, we lay there a day or two the winde being northerly, and increasing continually more and more, it grew to be a storme and a great frece of wind: which continued with vs some 24 houres, with such extremitie, as it caried not onely our sayles away being furl'd, but also made much water in our shippe, so that wee had sixe foote water in holde, and hauing freed our ship thereof with baling, the winde shifted to the North-west and became duller: but presently vpon it the extremitie of the storme was such that with the labouring of our ship we lost our foremast, and our ship grew as full of water as before. The storme once ceased, and the winde contrary to goe our course, we fell to consultation which might be our best way to saue our liues. Our victuals now being vtterly spent, & hauing eaten hides 6 or 7 daies, we thought it best to beare back againe for Dominica, & the Islands adioyning, knowing that there we might haue some reliefe, whereupon we turned backe for the said Islands. But before we could get thither the winde scanted vpon vs, which did greatly endanger vs for lacke of fresh water and victuals: so that we were constrained to beare vp to the Westward to certaine other Isles called the Nueblas or cloudie Islands, towards the Ile of S. Iuan de porto Rico, where at our arriuall we found land-crabs and fresh water, and toptoyles, which come most on lande about the full of the moone. Here hauing refreshed our selues some 17 or 18 daies, and hauing gotten some small store of victuals into our ship, we resolved to returne againe for Mona: vpon which our determination fine of our men left vs, remaining still on the Isles of Nueblas for all perswasions that we could vse to the contrary, which after ward came home in an English shippe. From these Isles we departed and arriued at Mona about the twentieth of Nouember 1593, and there comming to an anker toward two or thre of the clocke in the morning, the Captaine, and Edmund Barker his Lieutenant with some few others went on land to the houses of the olde Indian and his thre sonnes, thinking to haue gotten some foode, our victuals being all spent, and we not able to proceede any further untill we had obteyned some new supply. We spent two or thre daies in seeking pprovision to cary aboord to relieue the whole companie. And comming downe to go aboord, the winde then being northerly and the sea somewhat growne, they could not come on shoare with the boate, which was a thing of small succour and not able to rowe in any rough sea, whereupon we stayed untill the next morning, thinking to haue had lesse winde and safer passage. But in the night about twelue of the clocke our ship did driue away with five men and a boy onely in it, our carpenter secretly cut their owne cable, leauing nineteene of vs on land without boate or any thing, to our great discomfort. In the middelt of these miseries reposing our trust in the goodness of God, which many times before had succoured vs in our greatest extremities, we contented our selues with our pooze estate, and sought meanes to preserve our liues. And because one place was not able to sustaine vs, we tooke our leaues one of another, diuiding our selues into seuerall companies. The greatest reliefe that we sixe which were with the Captaine could finde for the space of nine and twentie daies was the stalkes of purselaine boyled in water, and nowe and then a pompion, which we found in the garden of the olde Indian, who vpon this our second arriuall with his thre sonnes stole from vs, and kept himselfe continually aloft in the mountaines. After the ende of nine and twentie daies we espied a French shippe, which afterwarde we understood to be of Diepe, called the Luisa, whose Captaine was one Mounseur Felix, vnto whom wee made a fire, at sight whereof he tooke in his topsayles, bare in with the land, and shewed vs his flagge, whereby we iudged him French: so comming along to the Westerne ende of the Island there he ankered, we making downe with all speede vnto him. At this time the Indian and his thre sonnes came done to our Captaine Master James Lancaster, and went along with him to the shippe. This night he went aboord the French man, who gaue him good entertainment, and the next day fetched eleuen more of vs aboord entreating vs all very courteously. This day came another French shippe of the same towne of Diepe which remayned there untill night expecting our other seuen mens comming downe: who, albeit we caused certaine pieces of ordnance to be shot off to call them, yet came not downe. Whereupon we departed thence, being deuided sixe into one ship, and sixe into another, and leauing this Island, departed for the Northside of Saint Domingo, where we remained untill Aprill following 1594, and spent some two monethes in traffike with the inhabitants by permission for hides and other marchandises of the Countrey. In this meane while there came a shippe of New-hauen to the place where we were, whereby we had intelligence of our seuen men which wee left behinde vs at the Isle of Mona: which was, that two of them brake their neckes with ventring to take foules vpon the cliffes, other thre were slaine by the Spaniards, which came from Saint Domingo, vpon knowledge giuen by our men which went away in the Edward, the other two this man of New-hauen had with him in his shippe, which escaped the Spaniards bloody hands. From this place Captaine Lancaster and his Lieutenant Master Edmund Barker, shipped themselves in another shippe of Diepe, the Captaine whereof was one Iohn La Noe, which was readie first to come away, and leauing the rest of their companie in other ships, where they were well intreated, to come after him, on Sunday the seuenth of April 1594 they set homeward, and disbocking through the Caijcos from thence arriued safely in Diepe within two and fortie dayes after, on the 19 of May, where after we had staped two dayes to refresh our selues, and giuen humble thanks vnto God, and vnto our friendly neighbours, we tooke passage for Rie and landed there on Friday the 24 of May 1594, hauing spent in this voyage three yeeres, fire weekes and two dayes, which the Portugales performe in halfe the time, chiefly because wee lost our fit time and season to set forth in the beginning of our voyage.

We vnderstood in the East Indies by certaine Portugales which we tooke, that they haue lately discovered the coast of China to the latitude of nine and fiftie degrees, finding the sea still open to the Northward: giuing great hope of the Northeast or Northwest passage. Witnesse Master Iames Lancaster.

Certaine remembrances of an intended voyage to Brasill, and the Riuer of Plate, by the Edward Cotton, a ship of 260 Tunnes of Master Edward Cotton of Southhampton, which perished through extreme negligence neare Rio grande in Guinie, the 17 of Iuly 1583.

A Articles of Couenants agreed vpon betwene Edward Cotton Esquier, owner of the good ship called the Edward Cotton of Southhampton, and of all the marchandizes in her laden, of the one part, and William Huddie gentleman, Captaine of the said ship, Iohn Hooper his Lieutenant, Iohn Foster Master, Hugh Smith Pilot for the whole voyage, and William Cheelman marchant, on the other part.

1  Obserue and keepe the daily order of Common prayer aboard the ship, and the companie to be called thereunto, at the least once in the day, to be pronounced openly.

2  Item, that they be ready with the first faire winde, to set saile and sailes in the voyage, and not to put into any port or harbour, but being forcibly constrained by weather, or other apparant and vrgent cause.

3 Item, that they take in, at or about the Isles of Cape Verde, to the quantitie of 25 or 30 tuns of salt, to be employed among other the owners marchandize, at Santos, and S. Vincent, to his onely behoofe, and the rest of the salt, so much as shall be needed for victuall, and for sauing of the hides to be kept aboard, & the same salt to be provided either at the fishermens hands neere the said Isles for trucke of commodities, or els to be taken in at the aforesaid Isles, at the discretion of the abouenamed.

4 Item, vpon the due performance of this voyage, the owner bindeth himselfe by this deede, to yeeld vnto any such of the companie, as shall refuse their shares befoze they depart from the coast of England, 20 markes a single share, for the dutie of the whole voyage, making not aboue 75. shares single in the whole.

5 Item, the company according as they be appointed by the officers of the said ship aboue named, shall at all times be most ready to doe their painfull seruice, not onely aboard, but in all labours at the land, according to the direction giuen by the aboue named officers, vpon paine of forfeiture of their shares and wages, the same to be diuided amongst the company.

6 Item, that the shares be taken at their returne out of all the traine oile, and hides of the seales, and of all other commodities gotten by their handie labour, and of the salt that shall be vendeb and other commodities, at, or neere the coast of Brasill, to allow after 9 li. the tunne freight, whereof one third to goe to the companie.

7 Item, that if any man shall practise by any deuise or deuises whatsoeuer, to alter the voyage from the true purpose and intent of the owner, viz. to make their first port at Santos, and Saint Vincent, and there to remittuall and traffike, and from thence to the riuer of Plate to make their voyage voyage by the traine, and hide of the seales, with such other commodities as are there to be had, according as the owner, with others that haue gouernment in the said ship, are bound to her highnesse by their deedes obligatorie in great summes, that all such practisers, vpon due pprooe made, shall loose their whole intertainement due by shares or otherwise for this sayde voyage to be adiudged by the Captaine, his Lieutenant, the Master, Pilot, and marchant, or three of them at the least, whereof the Captaine to be one.

8 Item, that the pinnesse be ready at all times to serue the marchants turne vpon his demand, to take in wares and commodities, and to cary and recary to and from the Hoze, when, and as oft as neede shall be, and to giue due attendance at the marchant and marchants direction, during the whole voyage.

9 Item, that no head or chiefe officer being set downe for such an officer vnder the hand of the owner, at the going to sea of the said shippe, shall or may be displaced from his said place or office, without great cause, and his misdeameanor to be adiudged by the Captaine, and his Lieutenant, the Master, the Pilot, and the marchant, or by the consent of three of them at the least.

10 Item, that vpon the returne of the shippe to the coast of England, the Master and Pilot put not into any port or harbour, to the Westward of Southhampton, but forced by weather, or such like vrgent cause.

William Cheefman,

A direction as well for the Captaine, and other my friends of the ship, as especially for William Cheefman Marchant, for the voyage to the riuer of Plate.

Your comming to the Isle of Saint Sebastian, vpon the coast of Brasill, you shall according to your discretions, make sale of such commodities, as you may thinke will be thereabout well vented, and likewise to buy commodities without making longer stay there then your victuals be prouiding, but rather to bespeake commodities against your returne from the riuer of Plate, especially of Amber, Sugar, Greene ginger, Cotton wooll, and some quantitie of the peppers of the countrey there. Also for Parats and Hunkies, and the beast called Serrabosa. Also you shall barrell vp of the beefe called Perune, two or three barrcls, and to lose no good oportunitie, to gather of the Indian figges, and the graines of them to preserve drye, in such quantitie as conveniently may be done: and touching the making of the traine, and preserving of the hides, I leaue it wholly to the order and the discretion of the chiefe of the companie. Also that in any road where the ship shall ride vpon the coast of America, triall be made with the dragges, for the pearle Divers, and the same being taken, to be opened and searched for pearle in the presence of the Captaine, his Lieutenant, the Master, the Pilot, and marchant, or three of them, whereof the Captaine or his Lieutenant to be one, and to remaine in the custodie of the Captaine and marchant, vnder two lockes, either of them to haue a key to his owne locke, and that a true inuentorie be deliuered also to the Master and Pilot of the said pearle or otheriewels of price gotten in the said voyage, to the intent that no partie be defrauded of his due, and that no concealment be made of any such thing vpon forfeiture, the partie to lose his share and dutie for the voyage that shall so conceale and not reueale it vnto the officers about named. Also to doe your best indour to try for the best Ore of golde, silver, or other rich mettals whatsoener. Forget not also to bring the kernels and seeds of strange plants with you, the Palmuto with his fruit inclosed in him. Serue God, keepe good watch, and stand alwayes vpon your garde,

The Isle of S. Sebastian.

Edward Cotton.

These things being thus ordered, and the ship of the burden of 260 tonnes, with 83 men of all sortes furnished, and fully appointed for the voyage, began to set saile from Hurst Castle vpon Friday the 20 of May, Anno 1583, and the 17 day of July ensuing fell with the coast of Guinie, to take in fresh water, where, through meere dissolute negligence, she perished vpon a sand, with the most part of the men in her, as appeareth by the confession of one that escaped, the substance and tenor whereof is this.

The confession of William Bends Masters Mate in the Edward Cotton, the 21 of October, Ann. 1584.

HElayth, that the 17 day of July, Anno 1583, hauing some lacke of fresh water, they put roome vpon the coast of Guinie, where they were set vpon a sand about 8 leagues from the shore, and this Craminate, with 29 more, got into the pinnesse, who arrived in an Island, being desolate of people, and five miles in compasse, where they rested 18 dayes through force of weather, hauing nought to eate but grasse. The rest of the company the ship being splitted in two, and in quarters, got them into one of the after quatters, and by the helpe of raftes came also a shore into another Island neere to Rio grande, where they all died as he supposeth.

Moore of Rio grande in Guinea.

The other 30 in the pinnesse, at the end of 18 dayes, departed that Island, and came to Saint Domingo, where comming on shore, they were taken of the *Moore*s, & stripped naked, And they buried one Coxe an olde man aliue, notwithstanding his pitifull lamentation and shriekings: the rest hauing Rice and water allowed them, liued there a certaine time. This Craminate was at last sold to a Portugall, with whom he dwelt the space of a quarter of a yere, and in the end, a Portugall Carauel comming thither, his master saved the same with Negroes, and he obtained leaue of his master to goe in the same Carauell, & by that meanes arrived at Lisbone, and from thence came into England the 17 of October, 1584, leauing behinde him of his companie aliue, Richard Hacker, Iohn Baker, Iohn Mathew, and a boy, with two others which were gone beyond Saint Domingo: all which, as he saith, were so sicke and diseased, that he iudgeth them to be long before this time dead.

The escape of the Primrose a tall ship of London, from before the towne of Bilbao in Biscay: which ship the Corrigidor of the same Prouince, accompanied with 97 Spaniards, offered violently to arrest, and was defeated of his purpose, and brought prisoner into England.

Whereunto is added the Kings Commission for a generall imbargment or arrest of all English, Netherlandish, and Easterlings ships, written in Barcelona the 19 of May 1585.

Tis not vnknowne vnto the world what danger our English Shippes haue lately escaped, how sharply they haue bene intreated, and howe hardly they haue bene assaulted: so that the valiancie of those that mannaged them is worthy remembrance. And therefore in respect of the courageous attempt and valiant enterprise of the ship called the Primrose of London, which hath obtained renowne, I haue taken in hande to publish the trueth thereof, to the intent that it may be generally knowne to the rest of the English ships, that by the good example of this the rest may in time of extremitie aduenture to doe the like: to the honour of the Realme, and the perpetuall remembrance of themselves: The maner whereof was as followeth.

Vpon Wednesday being the five and twentieth day of May 1585, the shippe called the Primrose being of one hundred and fiftie tunnes, lying without the bay of Bilbao, hauing bene there two dayes, there came a Spanish pinnesse to them, wherein was the Corrigidor and five others with him: these came aboord the Primrose, seeming to be Marchantes of Biscay, or such like, bringing Cherries with them, and spake very friendly to the Maister of the ship, whose name was Foster, and he in courteous wise had them welcome, making them the best cheere that he could with beere, beefe, and bisket, wherewith that ship was well furnished: and while they were thus in banquetting with the Maister, foure of the seuen departed in the sayd pinnesse, and went backe againe to Bilbao: the other thre stayed, and were very pleasant for the time. But Maister Foster misdoubting some danger secretly gaue speech that he was doubtfull of these men what their intent was; neuerthelesse he said nothing, nor seemed in any outward wise to mistrust them at all. Fooorthwith there came a ship-boate wherein were teuentie persons being Marchants and such like of Biscay: and besides this boate, there came also the pinnesse which before had brought the other thre, in which pinnesse there came foure and twentie, as the Spaniards themselves since confessed. These made towards the Primrose, and and being come thither, there came aboard the Corrigidor with three or foure of his men: but Master Foster seeing this great multitude desired that there might no more come aboard, but that the rest should stay in their boates, which was granted: neither the selfe they tooke small heed of these wordes; for on a suddaine they came forth of the boate, entering the shippe, every Spaniard taking him to his Rapier which they brought in the boate, with other weapons, and a drumme wherewith to triumph over them. Thus did the Spaniards enter the shippe, plunging in fiercely vpon them, some placing themselves vnder the deeke, some entering the Cabberns, and a multitude attending their pray. Then the Corrigidor hauing an officer with him which bare a white wand in his hand, sayd to the master of the ship: Yeeld your selfe, for you are the kings prisoner: whereto the Maister sayd to his men, We are betrayed. Then some of them set daggers to his breast, and seemed in furious manner as though they would haue slaine him, meaning nothing lesse then to doe any such act, for all that they fought was to bring him and his men safe alike to shore. Whereto the Maister was amazed, and his men greatly discomfited to see themselves readie to be conueyed euen to the slaughter: notwithstanding some of them respecting the daunger of the Maister, and seeing how with themselves there was no way but present death if they were once landed among the Spaniards, they resolved themselves eyther to defend the Maister, and generally to shunne that daunger, or else to die and be buried in the middest of the sea, rather then to suffer themselves to come into the tormentors hands: and therefore in very bold and manly sort some tooke their iauelings, lances, boze-speares, and shor, which they had set in readinesse before, and hauing fine Calliciers readie charged, which was all the small shot they had, those that were vnder the hatches or the grate did shoote by at the Spaniards that were ouer their heads, which shot so amazed the Spaniards on the suddaine, as they could hardly tell which way to escape the daunger, fearing this their small shot to be of greater number then it was: others in very manlike sort dealt about among them, shewing themselves of that courage with boze-speares and lances, that they dismayed at euery stroke two or three Spaniards. Then some of them desired the Maister to commaund his men to cease and holde their handes, but hee answered that such was the courage of the English Nation in defence of their owne liues, that they would slay them and him also: and therefore it lay not in him to doe it. Now did their blood runne about the ship in great quantitie, some of them being shot in betweene the legges, the bullets issuing forth at their breasts, some cut in the head, some thrust into the bodie, and many of them very sore wounded, so that they came not so fast in on the one side, but now they tumbled as fast ouer boord on both sides with their weapons in their handes, some falling into the sea, and some getting into their boates, making haste towards the Citie. And this is to be noted, that although they came very thicke thither, there returned but a small companie of them, neither is it knowne as yet how many of them were slaine or drowned, onely one English man was then slaine, whose name was Iohn Tristram, and fire other hurt. It was great pite to behold how the Spaniards lay swimming in the sea, and were not able to saue their liues. Foure of them taking holde of the shippe were for pities sake taken up againe by Master Foster and his men, not knowing what they were: all the Spaniards bosomes were stuf with paper, to defend them from the shot, and these foure hauing some wounds were drest by the Surgeon of the shippe. One of them was the Corrigidor himselfe, who is gouernour of a hundred Townes and Cities in Spaine, his liuing by his office being better then five hundred pound yearly. This skirmish happened in the euening about fire of the clocke, after they had laden twentie Tunne of goods and better out of the sayd ship: which goods were deliuered by two of the same ship, whose names were Iohn Burrell, and Iohn Brodbanke, who being on shore were apprehended and slayed.

After this valiant enterprise of eight and twentie English men against 97 Spaniardes, they saw it was in vaine for them to stay and therefore set vp sayles, and by Gods prouidence auoyded all danger, brought home the rest of their goods, and came thence with all expedition: and (God be thanked) arrived safely in England neere London on Wednesday being the 8 day of June, 1585. In which their returne to England the Spaniards that they brought with them offered five hundred crownes to be set on shore in any place: which, seeing the Maister would not doe, they were content to be ruled by him and his companie, and craued mercie at their handes. And after Master Foster demaunded why they came in such sort to betray and destroy them, the Corrigidor answered, that it was not done onely of themselves, but by the commandement of the king himselfe; and calling for his hose which were wet, did plucke forth the kings Commission, by which he was authorized to doe all that he did: The Copie whereof followeth, being translated out of Spanishe,

The Corrigidor of Bilbao taken and brought to London.

The Spanissh kings commission for the generall imbargment or arrest of the English, &c.

Licentiat de Escobar, my Corigidor of my Signorie of Biskay, I haue caused a great flecte to be put in readinette in the haven of Lisbone, and the riuer of Siwill. There is required for the Souldiers, armour, victuals, and munition, that are to bee employed in the same great store of shipping of all sortes against the time of seruice, and to the end there may be choise made of the best, vpon knowledge of their burden and goodnesse; I doe therefore require you, that presently vpon the arriual of this carrier, and with as much dissimulation as may be (that the matter may not be knowen yntill it be put in execution) you take order for the staying and arresting (with great foresight) of all the shipping that may be found vpon the coast, and in the portes of the sayd Signorie, excepting none of Holand, Zeland, Easterland, Germanie, England, and other Provinces that are in rebellion against mee, sauing those of France which being litle, and of small burden and weake, are thought vsfit to serue the turne. And the stay being thus made, you shall haue a speciall care that such marchandize as the sayd shippes or hulkes haue brought, whether they be all or part vnladen, may bee taken our, and that the armour, munition, tackels, sayles, and victuals may be safely bestowed, as also that it may be well foreseene, that none of the shippes or men may escape away. Which things being thus executed, you shall aduertise me by an expresse messenger, of your proceeding therein: And send me a plaine and distinct declaration of the number of ships that you shall haue so stayed in that coast and partes, whence euery one of them is, which belong to my Rebels, what burthen & goods there are, and what number of men is in euery of them, and what quantitie they haue of armour, ordinance, munition, victuals, tacklings and other necessities, to the end that vpon sight hereof, hauing made choise of such as shall be fit for the seruice, we may further direct you what ye shall do. In the meane time you shall presently see this my commandement put in execution, and if there come thither any more ships, you shall also cause them to be stayed and arrested after the same order, vsing therein such care and diligence, as may answere the trust that I repose in you, wherein you shall doe me great seruice. Dated at Barcelona the 29 of May. 1585.

And thus haue you heard the trueth and manner thereof, wherein is to be noted the great courage of the maister, and the louing hearts of the seruants to saue their maister from the danger of death: yea, and the care which the maister had to saue so much of the owners goods as hee might, although by the same the greatest is his owne losse in that he may neuer trauell to those partes any moze without the losse of his owne life, nor yet any of his seruantes; for if hereafter they should, being knowen they are like to taste of the sharpe torments which are there accustomed in their Holy-houle. And as for their terming English shippes to be in rebellion against them, it is sufficiently knowen by themselves; and their owne consciences can not denie it, but that with loue, vnitie, and concord, our shippes haue euer beene fauourable vnto them, and as willing to pleasure their King, as his subiectes any way willing to pleasure English passengers.

The Letters patents or priuiledges granted by her Maiestie to certaine Noble men and Marchants of London, for a trade to Barbarie, in the yeere 1585.

ELizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. to the Treasurer & Barons of our Exchequer, and to all Justices, Shiriffs, constables, customers, collectors of our customes and subsidies, controllers, searchers, and keepers of our hauens and creekes, ports and passages, within this our realme of England and the dominions of the same, and to all our officers, ministers and subiects; and to all other whosoever to whom it shall or may appertaine, and to euery of them greeting. Whereas it is made evidently and apparantly knowen vnto vs, that of late yeeres our right trustie and right welbeloued counsellors, Ambrose Erie of Warwike, and Robert Erie of Leicester, and also our louing and naturall subiects, Thomas Starkie of our citie of London Alderman, Ierard Gore the elder, and all his sonnes, Thomas Gore the elder, Arthur Atie gentleman, Alexander Auenon, Richard Staper, William Innings, Arthur Dawbeney, William Sherington, Thomas Bramlie, Anthony Garrard, Robert How, Henry Colthirft, Edward Holmden, Iohn Swinnerton, Robert Walkaden, Simon Lawrence, Nicholas Stile, Oliuer Stile, William Bond, Henrie Farrington, Iohn Tedcastle, Walter Williams,

And we further for vs our heires and successors of our speciall grace, meere motion and certaine knowledge, do graunt to the said Erles of Warwike and Leicester, Thomas Starkie, and the rest abovesaid, and to euery of them, that nothing shall be done, to be of force or validitie touching the said trade or traffique, or the exercise thereof, without or against the consent of the saide Erles, Thomas Starkie, (and the others before named) during the time of these our Letters patents for 12. yeeres as aforesaid.

And for that the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. and euery of them aforesaid should not be prevented or interrupted in this their said trade, we do by these presents for vs, our heires and successors, straightly prohibite and forbid all maner of person or persons, as well strangers of what nation or countrey soeuer, as our owne Subiects, other then onely the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. and euery of them as aforesaid, that they nō any of them from hencefoorth during the said terme of 12. yeeres, do or shall bring, or cause to be brought into this our Realme of England, or to any the dominions thereof, any maner of marchandizes whatsoeuer growing, or being made within the said Countrey of Barbary, or within any the dominions thereof, vntlesse it be by and with the licence, consent and agreement of the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. or with the consent and licence of the moze part of them then liuing, first had and obtained, so alwayes y the sayd Earle of Leicester (if hee be liuing) be one, vnder the paine that euery one that shall offend or doe against this our present prohibition here last aboue mentioned in these presents, shall forfeite and lose all and singular the said marchandizes to be landed in any our realmes and dominions, contrary to the tenor and true meaning of this our prohibition in that behalfe provided: the one moitie of all and euery which said forfeitures whatsoeuer mentioned or specified in these our present Letters patents, shalbe to vs our heires & successors: And the other moitie of al and euery the said forfeitures, we doe by these presents of our certaine knowledge and meere motion, cleaely and wholly for vs, our heires and successors, giue and graunt vnto the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. And these our Letters patents, vpon the onely sight thereof, without any further warrant, shal bee sufficient authoritie to our Treasurer of England for the time being, to our Barons of the Exchequer, and to all other our officers that shall haue to deale in this behalfe, to make full allowance vnto the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. their deputies or assignes of the one moitie of all and singular the goods, marchandizes and things whatsoeuer mentioned in these our present Letters patents, to be forfeited at any time or times during the said terme of twelue yerres: which said allowance we doe straightly charge and commaund from time to time to be made to the sayd Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. and to euery of them accordingly, without any maner of delay or deniall of any of our officers whatsoeuer, as they tender our fauour and the furtherance of our good pleasure. And wee doe straightly charge and commaund, and by these presents prohibite all and singular Customers and Collectors of our customes & subsidies, and comptrollers of the same, of, and within our Citie and port of London, and all other portes, creekes, & places within this our Realme of England, and euery of them, that they ne any of them take or perceiue, or cause, or suffer to be taken, receiued, or perceiued for vs & in our name, or to our vse, or to y vses of our heires or successors of any person or persons, any sum or summes of money, or other things whatsoeuer during the said terme of 12. yerres, for, and in the name & lieu or place of any custome, subsidy & other thing or duties to vs, our heires or successors due or to be due for the customes & subsidies of any marchandizes whatsoeuer growing, being made or coming out of the said countrey of Barbary, or out of the dominions thereof, nor make, cause, nor suffer to be made any entrie into our or their books of customs & subsidies, nor make any agreement for the subsidies and customs, of, and for any the said marchants, sauing onely with, & in the name of the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. or the most part of them, as they and euery of them will answere at their vttermost perils to the contrary. And for the better and moze sure obseruation of this our graunt, wee will, and grant for vs our heires & successors by these presents, that the Treasurer & barons of our Exchequer for the time being, by force of this our graunt or enrolment thereof in the said court, at al & euery time & times during the said terme of 12. yerres, at & vpon request made vnto them by the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. or by the attorneis, factors, deputies or assignes of them, or the most part of them then liuing and trading, shall and may make & direct vnder the seale of the said Exchequer, one or moe sufficient writ or writs, close or patents, vnto euery or any of our said customers, collectors or controllers of our heires and successors in all and euery, or to any port or portes, creeke, haueu, or other places within this our realme of England, as the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. or any the attornets, factozs, deputies or assignes of them or the most part of them then liuing and trading, shall at any time require, commaunding and straightly charging them and euery of them, that they nor any of them at any time or times during the said terme of 12. yeeres, make any entrie of any wares or marchandizes whatsoeuer, growing, being made or comming out or from the said countrey of Barbary, or the dominions thereof, nor receiue or take any custome, subsidie or other entrie, or make any agreement for the same, other then with or in the name of the said Erles, Thomas Starkie, &c. the factor or factozs, deputies or assignes of them or the most part of them then liuing and trading, according to this our graunt, and the true meaning thereof, and according to our saide will and pleasure before in these presents declared. In witness whereof we haue caused these our Letters to be made patents. Witness our selfe at Westminster the 5. day of Iuly in the 27. yeere of our reigne.

The Ambassage of Master Henry Roberts, one of the sworne Esquires of her Maiesties person, from her highnesse to Mully Hamet Emperour of Marocco and the King of Fesse, and Sus, in the yeere 1585: who remained there as Liger for the space of 3. yeeres. Written briefly by himselfe.

Vpon an incorporation granted to the Company of Barbary Marchants resident in London, I Henry Roberts one of her Maiesties sworne Esquires of her person, was appointed her highnesse messenger, and Agent vnto the aforesaid Mully Hamet Emperour of Marocco, king of Fesse and Sus. And after I had receiued my Commission, instructions, and her Maiesties letters, I departed from London the 14. of August in the yeere 1585. in a tall ship called the Ascension, in the company of the Minion and Hopewell, and we all arriued in safetrie at Azafi a port of Barbary, the 14. of September next following. The Alcaide of the towne (being the kings officer there, and as it were Maior of the place) receiued mee with all humanitie and honour, according to the custome of the Countrey, lodging me in the chiefest house of the towne, from whence I dispatched a messenger (which in their language they call a Trottero) to aduertise the Emperour of my arriual: who immediately gaue order, and sent certaine souldiers for my guard and conduct, and horses for my selfe, and mules for mine owne and my companies carriages. Thus being accompanied with M. Richard Euans, Edward Salcor, and other English Marchants resident there in the Countrey, with my traine of Moores and carriages, I came at length to the riuer of Tenis, which is within foure miles of Marocco: and there by the water side I pitched my tents vnder the Oliue trees: where I met with all the English Marchants by themselves, and the French and Flemish, and diuers other Christians, which attended my comming. And after we had dined, & spent out the heat of the day, about foure of the clocke in the afternoone we all set forward toward the Citie of Marocco, where we arriued the said day, being the 14. of September, and I was lodged by the Emperours appointment in a faire house in the Iudaria or Iurie, which is the place where the Iewes haue their abode, and is the fairest place, and quietest lodging in all the Citie.

After I had reposed my selfe 3. dayes, I had accesse to the kings presence, deliuered my message and her Maiesties letters, and was receiued with all humanitie, and had fauourable audience from time to time for thre yeeres: during which space I abode there in his Court, as her Maiesties Agent and Liger: and whensoever I had occasion of businesse I was admitted either to his Maiestie himselfe, or to his vice Roy, whose name was Alcayde Breme Saphiana, a very wise and discret person, and the chiefest about his Maiestie. The particulars of my seruice, for diuers good and reasonable causes, I forbear here to put downe in writing.

After leaue obtained, and an honourable reward bestowed by the Emperour vpon me, I departed from his Court at Marocco the 18. of August 1588, toward a garden of his, which is called Shersbonare, where he promised mee I should stay but one day for his letters: howbeit, vpon some occasion I was stayed vntill the 14. of September at the kings charges, with 40. or 50. shot attending vpon me for my guard and safetie.

From thence at length I was conducted with all things necessary to the port of Santa Cruz, being fixe dayes iourney from Marocco, and the place where our shippes do commonly take in their lading, where I arriued the 21. of the same moneth. In this port I stayed 43. dayes, and at length the second of Nouember I imbarqued my selfe, and one Marshok Reiz a Captaine and a Gentleman, which the Emperour sent with mee vpon an Ambassage to her Maiestie: and after much toylement and foule weather at Sea, per New-yes day I came on land at S. Iues in Cornwall, from whence passing by land both together by towards London, we were met without the Citie citie with the chiefeſt marchants of the Barbary Company, well mounted all on horſebacke, to the number of 40. or 50. horſe, and ſo the Ambaſſadour and my ſelfe being both in Coche, entered the citie by torchlight, on Sunday at night the 12. of January 1589.

This our princely commandement is deliuered into the hands of the Engliſh marchants, which remaine in the protection of our ſtately palaces: to the ende that all men which ſhall ſee this preſent writing, may vnderſtand that our princely counſaile wil defend them by the fauor of God, from any thing that may impeach or hurt them in what ſort ſoeuer they ſhalbe wronged: and that, which way ſoeuer they ſhall trauaile, no man ſhall take them captiues in theſe our kingdomes, ports, and places which belong vnto vs, which alſo may protect and defend them by our authoritie from any moleſtation whatſoeuer: and that no man ſhall hinder them by laying violent hand vpon them; and ſhall not giue occaſion that they may be grieved in any ſort by the fauour and aſſiſtance of God. And we charge and command our officers of our hauens and fortrefſes, and all ſuch as beare any authoritie in theſe our dominions, and like wiſe all the common people, that in no wiſe they do moleſt them, in ſuch ſort that they be no way offendid or wronged. And this our commandement ſhall remaine inuioſtable, being regiſtered in the middeſt of the moneth of Rabel in the yere 996.

In the Name of the mercifull and pitifull God.

The blessing of God light vpon our lord and prophet Mahumet, and those that are obedient vnto him.

In seruant of God both mightie in warre and mightily exalted by the grace of God Myra Momany, the son of Myra Momany, the Iariff, the Hazeni, whose kingdoms God maintaine and aduance his authoritie: Vnto the right famous, right noble, & right highly esteemed Erie of Leicester, after due praises giuen vnto God, & due blessings and salutations rendred vnto the prophet Mahumet. These are to giue you to vnderstand, that your letters arriued here in our royal Court, and we wel perceine the contents thereof. And your Ambassadors which remaineth here in our Court told me the cause of the slownesse of the gages or pledges vntil this time: which reckoning we accept of, and holde our selues as satisfied. And as touching the matter wherof you write vnto vs concerning Iohn Herman, and the selfe same complaint which your Ambassadors hath made of him, befoze the comming of your letter, we had already commaunded him to be taken vpon the complaint which your Ambassadors had made of him, whereupon he still remaineth in hold, and shal so continue vntil further iustice be done vpon him according to his desert. And so our Lord keepe you in his safegard. Written at our royall court in Marocco, which God maintaine, the 20. day of the moneth Remodan, Anno 1596.

The Queenes letters to the Emperour.

The same in English.

Right high and mightie Prince, Having vnderstood from our Agent the great affection and good wil which you beare vs, and how great honour and fauor you shew him for our sake, to the end to giue vs more ample testimonie of your friendship, we haue receiued very great contentment & satisfaction, aswel of the one as of the other: and withall we could not omit to magnifie you, according to your desert. We haue also receiued your letters, and do not a litle reioyce thereof, because they come from a prince vnto whom we are so much beholden. Our Agent hath written vnto vs concerning certaine things which you desire to be sent vnto you from hence. And albe it we wish that we could particularly satisfie you, as you desire, yet it is fallen out, that the warres, wherin at this present we be buied, wil not suffer vs fully to doe the same: neuertheless, wee haue commaunded to satisfie you in part, and according as the present necessitie doeth permit vs, as our Agent will declare vnto you moze particularly, hoping you will receiue it in good part, and according to the good will wherewith wee graunt the same. And because it hath bene signified vnto vs that you haue promised to proceed in iustice against one John Herman our Subiect, which hath grieuously offended vs, in such sort as wee haue sent word vnto you, wee haue giuen order to our said Agent to informe you moze particularly in that which we desire to be done in this busines, praying you also to command the same to be put in execution: and that it would please you alwayes to fauour our said Agent and to hold him in good credite, as you haue done hitherto, not suffering your selfe to be changed in your opinion, for all the false reports which they may raise against him, nor to doubt that wee will not accomplish at large all that he shall promise you on our behalfe. Our Lord keepe and preserue your right high and mightie person. Written in our royall Court at Greenwich the 20. of July 1587.

John Herman an

A voyage to the Azores with two pinases, the one called the Serpent, and the other the Mary Sparke of Plimouth, both of them belonging to Sir Walter Raleigh, written by John Euesham Gentleman, wherein were taken the gouernour of the Ile of Saint Michael, and Pedro Sarmiento gouernour of the Straits of Magalanes, in the yeere 1586.

The gouernour of S. Michael taken prisoner.

The 10. of June 1586. we departed from Plimouth with two Pinases, the one named the Serpent, of the burden of 35. Tunnes, and the other the Mary Sparke of Plimouth of the burthen of 50. Tuns, both of them belonging to Sir Walter Raleigh knight; and directing our course towards the coast of Spaine, & from thence towards the Isles of the Azores, we tooke a small barke laden with Sumacke and other commodities, wherein was the gouernour of S. Michaels Island, being a Portugal, hauing other Portugals and Spaniards with him. And from thence we sailed to the Island of Graciosa, to the Westward of the Island of Tercera, where we descried a saile, and bearing with her wee found her to be a Spaniard: But at the first not greatly respecting who we tooke, so that we might haue enriched our selues, which was the cause of this our trauaile, and for that we would not bee knowne of what nation we were, wee displayed a white like ensigne in our maine topp, which they seeing, made accompt that we had bene some of the king of Spaines Armadas, lying in wait for English men of war: but when we came within shot of her, we tooke downe our white flagge, and spread abroad the Crosse of S. George, which when they saw, it made them to flee as fast as they might, but all their haste was in vaine, for our shippes were swifter of saile then they, which they fearing, did presently cast their ordinance and small shot with many letters, and the vnto of the Straights of Magelan into the Sea, and thereupon immediately we tooke her, wherein wee also tooke a gentleman of Spaine, named Pedro Sarmiento, gouernour of the Straights of Magelan, which saide Pedro we brought into England with vs, and presented him to our soueraigne Lady the Queene.

Pedro Sarmiento the gouernour of the Straights of Magelan taken prisoner.

A ship laden with fish taken and released again.

One of the ships taken, and sent away with 2. persons.

The Caruel is taken.

After this, lying off and about the Islands, wee descried another saile, and bearing after her, we spent the maine maste of our Admirall, but yet in the night our Viceadmirall tooke her, being laden with fish from Cape Blanke, the which shippe wee let goe againe for want of men to bring her home. The next day we descried two other sailes, the one a shippe and the other a Caruel, to whom we gaue chase, which they seeing, with all speede made in vnder the Ile of Graciosa, to a certaine Fort there for their succour, where they came to an anchor, and hauing the winde of vs we could not hurt them with our ships, but we hauing a small boate, which we called a light horseman, wherein my selfe was, being a Musqueter, and foure moze with Caliuers, and foure that rowed, came neere vnto the shoare against the winde, which when they saw vs come towards them they caried a great part of their marchandise on land, whither also the men of both vessels went and landed, and as soone as we came within Musquet shot, they began to shoote at vs with great ordinance and small shot, and we likewise at them, and in the ende we boorded one shippe wherein was no man left, so we cut her cables, hoysed her sailes, and sent her away with two of our men, and the other 7. of vs passed moze neere vnto the shoare, and boorded the Caruel, which did ride within a stones cast from the shoare, and so neere the land that the people did cast stones at vs, but yet in despite of them all we tooke her, and one onely Negro therein; and cutting her cables in the hawse we hoysed her sailes, and being becalmed vnder the land, we were constrained to rowe her out with our boate, the Fort still shooting at vs, and the people on land with Musquets and caliuers to the number of 150. or thereabout: and we answered them with the small force we had; In the time of which our shooting, the shot of my Musquet being a crossebarre-shot happened to strike strike the gunner of the fort to death, even as he was giving scull to one of his great pieces, and thus we parted from them without any losse or hurt on our side. And now, having taken these five sailes of shippes, we did as before, turne away the shippe with the fish, without hurting them, and from one of the other shippes wee tooke her maine Mast to serve our Admirals turne, and so sent her away putting into her all the Spaniards and Portugals, (saying that gentleman Pedro Sarmiento, with three other of the principal men and two Negroes) leaving them all within sight of land, with bread and water sufficient for 10. dayes if neede were.

The prizes sent home.

Thus setting our course for England, being off the Islands in the height of 41. degrees, or there about, one of our men being in the toppe descried a saile, then 10. saile, then 15. whereupon it was concluded to sende home those prizes we had, and so left in both our Pinasses not above 60. men. Thus wee returned againe to the flecte wee had descried, where wee found 24. saile of shippes, whereof two of them were Caracks, the one of 1200. and the other of a 1000. tonnes, and 10. Gallions, the rest were small shippes and Caravels all laden with Treasure, spices, and sugars, with which 24. shippes we with two small Pinasses did fight, and kept company the space of 32. hours, continually fighting with them and they with vs, but the two Caracks kept still betwixt the flecte and vs, that wee could not take any one of them, so wanting powder, wee were forced to give them over against our willes, for that wee were all wholly bent to the gaining of some of them, but necessitie compelling vs, and that onely for want of powder, without losse of any of our men, (which was a thing to be wondered at considering the inequalitye of number) at length we gaue them over. Thus we againe set our course for England, and so came to Plimouth within 6. houres after our prizes, which we sent away 40. houres before vs, where wee were received with triumphant joy, not onely with great Dynance then shot off, but with the willing hearts of all the people of the Towne, and of the Countrey thereabout; and we not sparing our Dynance (with the powder wee had left) to requite and answer them againe. And from thence wee brought our prizes to Southampton, where sir Walter Raleigh being our owner, rewarded vs with our shares.

Two Caracks, 10. Gallions, 12. small shippes.

The 2. pinasses returned for England.

Our prizes were laden with sugars, Elephants teeth, ware, hides, rice, brasill, and Cufer, as by the testimonie of Iohn Euesham himselfe, Captaine Whiddon, Thomas Rainford, Benjamin Wood, William Cooper Master, William Cornish Master, Thomas Drake Corporall, Iohn Ladd gunner, William Warefield gunner, Richard Moone, Iohn Drew, Richard Cooper of Harwich, William Beares of Ratcliffe, Iohn Row of Salcath, and many others, may appeare.

A briefe relation of the notable seruice performed by Sir Francis Drake vpon the Spanish Flecte prepared in the Road of Cadiz: and of his destroying of 100. saile of barks; Passing from thence all along the coast to Cape Sacc, where also hee tooke certaine Forts: and so to the mouth of the Riuer of Lisbon, and thence crossing ouer to the Isle of Sant Michael, surprized a mighty Carack called the Sant Philip coming out of the East India, which was the first of that kinde that euer was seene in England: Performed in the yeere 1587.

Her Maestie being informed of a mightie preparation by Sea begonne in Spaine for the invasion of England, by good aduise of her graue and prudent Counsell thought it expedient to prevent the same. Whereupon she caused a flecte of some 30. sailes to be rigged and furnished with all things necessary. Duer that flecte she appointed Generall sir Francis Drake (of whose manifold former good seruices she had sufficient prooffe) to whom she caused 4. shippes of her Maie royall to be deliuered, to wit, The Bonaventure where in himselfe went as General; the Lion vnder the conduct of Master William Borough Controller of the Maie; the Dread-nought vnder the command of M. Thomas Venner; and the Rainebow, captaine whereof was M. Henry Bellingham: vnto which 4. shippes two of her pinasses were appointed as hand-maids. There were also added vnto this flecte certaine tall shippes of the Citie of London, of whose especial good seruice the Generall made particular mention in his priuate Letters directed to her Maestie. This flecte set saile from the sound of Plimouth in the moneth of April towards the coast of Spaine.

The 16. of the said moneth we mette in the latitude of 40. degrees with two shippes of Middleborough, which came from Cadiz; by which we vnderstood that there was great store of warlike provision at Cadiz & thereabout ready to come for Lisbon. Vpon this information our Generall with all speed possible, bending himselfe thither to cut off their said forces and provisions, vpon the 19. of April entered with his flecte into the Harbor of Cadiz: where at our first entring we were assailed ouer against the Towne by sixe Gallies, which notwithstanding in short time retired vnder their fortresse.

There were in the Road 60. ships and diuers other small vessels vnder the fortresse: there fled about 20. French ships to Port Real, and some small Spanish vessels that might passe the shoales. At our first coming in we sunke with our shot a ship of Ragusa of a 1000. tunnes, furnished with 40. pieces of balle and very richly laden. There came two Gallies more from S. Mary port, and two from Porto Reale, which shot freely at vs, but altogether in vaine: for they went away with the blowes well beaten for their paines.

Before night we had taken 30. of the said ships, & became Masters of the Road, in despite of the Gallies, which were glad to retire them vnder the fort: in the number of which ships there was one new ship of an extraordinary hugeness in burthen about 1200. tunnes, belonging to the Marquesse of Santa Cruz being at that instant high Admiral of Spaine. Five of them were great ships of Biskay, whereof 4. we fired, as they were taking in the Kings provision of victuals for the furnishing of his fleet at Lisbon: the fifth being a ship about 1000. tunnes in burthen, laden with Iron-spikes, nails, yron hoopes, horse-shoes, and other like necessities bound for the West Indies we fired in like manner. Also we tooke a ship of 250. tunnes laden with wines for the Kings provision, which wee caried out to the Sea with vs, and there discharged the said wines for our owne store, and after ward set her on fire. Moreouer we tooke 3. Flyboats of 300. tunnes a piece laden with biscuit, whereof one was halfe vnladen by vs in the Harborow, and there fired, and the other two we tooke in our company to the Sea. Likewise there were fired by vs ten other ships which were laden with wine, raisins, figs, oiles, wheat, & such like. To conclude, the whole number of ships and barkes (as we suppose) then burnt, suncke, and brought away with vs, amounted to 30. at the least, being (in our iudgement) about 10000. tunnes of shipping.

There were in sight of vs at Porto Real about 40. ships, besides those that fled from Cadiz.

We found little ease during our aboad there, by reason of their continuall shooting from the Gallies, the fortresses, and from the shoare: where continually at places conuenient they planted new ordinance to offend vs with: besides the inconuenience which wee suffered from their ships, which, when they could defend no longer, they set on fire to come among vs. Whereupon when the flood came wee were not a little troubled to defend vs from their terrible fire, which neuertheless was a pleasant sight for vs to beholde, because we were thereby eased of a great labour, which lay vpon vs day and night, in discharging the victuals, and other provisions of the enemye. Thus by the assistance of the Almighty, and the inuincible courage and industrie of our Generall, this strange and happy enterprize was achieved in one day and two nights, to the great astonishment of the King of Spaine, which breed such a corrasie in the heart of the Marques of Santa Cruz high Admiral of Spaine, that he neuer enjoyed good day after, but within fewe moneths (as may easily be supposed) died of extreame grieve and sorrow.

Thus hauing performed this notable seruice, we came out of the Road of Cadiz on the Friday morning the 21. of the said moneth of April, with very small losse not worth the mentioning.

After our departure ten of the Gallies that were in the Road came out, as it were in disdain of vs, to make some pastime with their ordinance, at which time the wind skanted vpon vs, whereupon we cast about againe, and stood in with the shoare, & came to an anchor within a league of the towne; where the said Gallies, for all their former bragging, at length suffered vs to ride quietly.

We now haue had experience of Gallie-fight: wherein I can assure you, that onely these 4. of her Maiesties ships will make no account of 20. Gallies, if they may be alone, and not busied to guard others. There were neuer Gallies that had better place and fitter opportunitie for their aduantage to fight with ships: but they were still forced to retire, wee riding in a narrow gut, the place yeelding no better, and giuen to maintaine the same, untill wee had discharged and fired the shippes, which could not conueniently be done but vpon the flood, at which time they might driue cleare off vs. Thus being victualled with bread and wine at the enemies cost for diuers moneths (besides the provisions that we brought from home) our Generall dispatched Captaine Crosse into England with his letters, giuing him further in charge to declare vnto her Maiestie all the particularities of this our first enterprize.

After whose departure wee shaped our course toward Cape Sacre, and in the way thither wee tooke at seuerall times of ships, barkes, and Carauels well neere an hundred, laden with hoopes, gally-oares, pipe-stauces, & other provisions of the king of Spaine, for the furnishing of his forces intended against England, al which we burned, hauing delt fauorably with the men and sent them on shoare. We also spoiled and consumed all the fisher-boats and nets thereabouts, to their great hinderance; and (as we suppose) to the better ouerthrow of the rich fishing of their Tunies for the same yere. At length we came to the aforesaid Cape Sacre, where we went on land; and the better to enioy the benefite of the place, and to ride in harborow at our pleasure, we assailed the same castle, and three other strong holds, which weooke some by force and some by surrender.

Thence we came before the haven of Lisbon ankering nere unto Cascais, where the Marques of Santa Cruz was with his Gallies, who seeing vs chase his ships a shoare, & take and carry away his barks and Caravels, was content to suffer vs there quietly to tary, and likewise to depart, and neuer charged vs with one Canon-shot: And when our Generall sent him worde that hee was there ready to exchange certaine bullets with him, the marques refused his chalenge, sending him worde, that he was not then ready for him, nor had any such Commission from his King.

Our Generall thus refused by the Marques, and seeing no more good to be done in this place, thought it conuenient to spend no longer time vpon this coast: and therefore with consent of the chiefe of his Company he shaped his course toward the Isles of the Açores, and passing towards the Isle of Saint Michael, within 20. or 30. leagues thereof, it was his good fortune to meete with a Portugale Carak called Sanc Philip, being the same shippe which in the voyage outward had caried the 3. Princes of Iapan, that were in Europe, into the Indies. This Carak without any great resistance hee tooke, bestowing the people thereof in certaine vessels well furnished with victuals, and sending them courteously home into their Countrey: and this was the first Carak that euer was taken comming forth of the East Indies; which the Portugals tooke for an euil signe, because the ship bare the Kings owne name.

The Carak called the Sanc Philip taken.

The riches of this prize seemed so great vnto the whole Company (as in truely it was) that they assured themselves euery man to haue a sufficient reward for his tranel: and thereupon they all resolved to returne home for England: which they happily did, and arriued in Plimouth the same Sommer with their whole flecte and this rich booty, to their owne profite and due commendation, and to the great admiration of the whole kingdome.

And here by the way it is to be noted, that the taking of this Carak wrought two extraordinary effects in England: first, that it taught others, that Caracks were no such bugs but that they might be taken (as since indeed it hath fallen out in the taking of the Madre de Dios, and syeing and sinking of others) and secondly in acquainting the English Nation more generally with the particularities of the exceeding riches and wealth of the East Indies: whereby themselves and their neighbours of Holland haue bene incouraged, being men as skillfull in Nauigation and of no lesse courage then the Portugals to share with them in the East Indies, where their strength is nothing so great as heretofore hath bene supposed.

A Patent granted to certaine Marchants of Exeter, and others of the West parts, and of London, for a trade to the Riuer of Senega and Gambia in Guinea, 1588.

Elizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our Treasurer and Admirall of England, our Treasurer and Barons of our Exchequer, and all and euery our Officers, ministers and subiects whatsoeuer, greeting. Whereas our welbeloued subiects William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicolas Spicer, and Iohn Doricot of our City of Exeter marchants, Iohn Yong of Coliton in our countie of Deuon marchant,

Richard Doderige of Barnestable in our saide Countie of Deuon Marchant, Anthonie Dassell, and Nicolas Turner of our Citie of London Marchants, haue bene perswaded and earnestly moued by certaine Portugals resident within our Dominions, to undertake and set forward a voyage to certaine places on the coast of Guinea: Videlicet, from the Northernmost part of the Riuer commonly called by the name of the Riuer of Senega, and from and within that Riuer all along that coast vnto the Southernmost part of another Riuer commonly called by the name of Gambia, and within that Riuer: which, as we are informed, they haue already once performed accordingly: And for that we are credibly giuen to vnderstand that the further prosecuting of the same voyage, and the due and orderly establishing of an orderly traffique and trade of marchandize into those Countreies, will not only in time be very beneficial to these our Realmes and dominions, but also be a great succour and reliefe vnto the present distressed estate of those Portugals, who by our princely fauour liue and continue here vnder our protection: And considering that the aduenturing and enterprising of a newe trade cannot be a matter of small charge and hazard to the aduenturers in the beginning: we haue therefore thought it conuenient, that our said louing subiects William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthonie Dassell, and Nicholas Turner, for the better incouragement to proceede in their saide aduenture and trade in the said Countreies, shal haue the sole vse and exercise thereof for a certaine time. In consideration whereof, and for other weightie reasons and considerations vs specially moving, of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge and mcre motion, we haue giuen and graunted, and by these presents for vs, our heires and successors doe giue and graunt vnto the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel and Nicholas Turner, and to euery of them, and to such other our Subiects as they or the most part of them shall thinke conuenient to receiue into their Company and societie, to be the traders with them into the said Countreys, that they and euery of them by themselves or by their seruants or Factors and none others, shall and may for and during the full space and terme of tenne yeeres next ensuing the date of these presents, haue and enioy the free and whole trafique, trade and feat of marchandise, to and from the said Northernmost part of the said Riuer, commonly called by the name of the Riuer of Senega: and from and within that Riuer all along the coast of Guinea, vnto the Southermost part of the said Riuer, commonly called by the name of the Riuer of Gambia, and within that Riuer also. And that they the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel and Nicholas Turner, & euery of them, by themselves or by their seruants or Factors, & such as they or the most part of them shall receiue into their Company and societie, to be traders with them into the said Countreys (as is aforesaid) and none others, shall and may, for, and during the said space and terme of 10. yeeres, haue and enioy the sole & whole trafique or trade of marchandize into and from the said places afoze limited and described, for the buying & selling, bartering and changing of and with any goods, wares, and marchandizes whatsoever, to be vnted had or found, at or within any the cities, towne, or places situated or being in the countries, parts & coastes of Guinea before limited, any law, statute, or graunt, matter, custome or priuileges to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And for the better ordering, establishing, & gouerning of the said societie and Company in the said trade and trafique of marchandizes, & the quiet, orderly & lawfull exercise of the same, We for vs, our heires, and successors, do by these presents giue and graunt full license and authoritie vnto the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, and to such others as they shall receiue into their saide societie and company to be traders into the said countreys, as is aforesaid, and to euery of them, that they or the most part of them shall and may at all conuenient times at their pleasures, assemble and meete together in any place or places conuenient, as well within our citie of Exeter, as elsewhere within this our Realme of England, or other our dominions, during the said terme of ten yeere, to consult of, for, and concerning the saide trade and trafique of marchandize, and from time to time to make, orwaie, and stablish good, necessary, and reasonable orders, constitutions, and ordinances, for, and touching the same trade. And al such orders, constitutions, and ordinances so to be made, to put in vze and execute, and them, or any of them, to alter, change, and make voyd, and, if need be, to make new, as at any time, during the said terme of ten yeeres, to them, or the most part of them then trading, as is aforesaid, shall be thought necessary and conuenient. Vnto all and euery which said orders, constitutions, and ordinances, they, and euery of them, and all other persons which shall hereafter be receiued into the saide societie and Company, shall submit themselves, and shall well and duely obserue, perfoyme, and obey the same, so long as they shall stand in force, or else shall pay and incurre such forfeitures, paines, and penalties, for the breach thereof, and in such maner and forme, and to such vles & intents, as by the saide orders, constitutions, and ordinances shall be asselled, limited and appointed. So alwayes, as the same orders, constitutions and ordinances, be not repugnant or contrary to the lawes, statutes, and customes of this Realme of England, nor any penaltie to excede the reasonable forme of other penalties, asselled by the Company of our Marchants, named Aduenturers. And to the intent that they onely, to whom the said power and libertie of trafique and trade of marchandize is graunted by these our letters patents aforesaid, and none others whatsoever, without their speciall content and license before had, shall, during the said terme of ten yeeres, vse, or haue trade or trafique, with or for any maner of goods or marchandizes, to and from the saide coastes or parts of Guinea afoze limited: We doe by these presents, by our royall and supreme authoritie, straightly charge and commaund, that no person, or persons whatsoever, by themselves, or by their factors, or seruants, during the said terme of 10. yeeres, shall in any wise trade or trafique, for or with any goods or marchandizes, to or from the said coastes and parts of Guinea afoze limited, other then the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, and such as from time to time, they, or the most part of them, shall receiue into their societie or company, to be traders with them, as is aforesaid, as they tender our fauour, and will auoyde our high displeasure, and vpon paine of imprisonment of his or their bodies, at our will and pleasure, and to lose and forfeit the ship or shippes, and all the goods, wares, wares, and marchandizes, wherewith they, or any of them shall, during the said terme of 10. yeeres, trade, or traffique to or from the said Countreies, or any part thereof, according to the limitation aboue mentioned, contrary to our expresse prohibition and restraint, in that behalfe. And further, we do by these presents give and graunt full power and authoritie to the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, and to such other persons, as they shall receiue into their societie and company, to be traders with them, as is aforesaid, and the most part of them for the time being: that they, and euery of them, by themselves, their factors, deputies, or assigns, shall and may, from time to time, during the said terme of 10. yeeres, take, arrest, take, and seale all, and all manner of ship, and ships, goods, wares, and marchandizes whatsoever, which shall be brought from, or caried to the said coasts and parts of Guinea afoze limited, contrary to our will and pleasure, and the true meaning of the same, declared and expessed in these our letters patents. Of all and euery which said forfeitures whatsoever, the one thirde part shall be vnto vs, our heires, and successors, and another thirde part thereof we give and graunt by these presents, for and towards the reliefe of the saide Portugals continuing here vnder our protection, as is aforesaid. And the other thirde part of all the same forfeitures, we do by these presents, of our certaine knowledge and meere motion for vs, our heires and successors, give and graunt cleerly and wholly vnto the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, and such other persons, as they shall receiue into their societie and company, as is aforesaid. And these our letters patents, or the inuolment or exemplification of the same, without any further or other warrant, shall from time to time, during the said terme yeeres, be a sufficient warrant and authoritie to our Tresasurer of England, for the time being, and to the barons of our Exchequer, and to all other our officers and ministers whatsoever, to whom it shall or may appertaine, to allow, deliuer, and pay one thirde part of all the said forfeitures, to the vse of the said Portugals, and one other thirde part of the same forfeitures, to the saide William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, and such other persons, as they shall receiue into their societie and company, to be traders with them, as aforesaid, to their owne proper vse and behoofe: which said allowances and payments thereof, our will and pleasure is, and we do straightly charge and command, to bee from time to time duly made and performed accordingly, without any delay or denial of any our officers aforesaid, or any other our officers or ministers whatsoever. And we do straightly charge and command, and by these presents prohibite all and singular our customers, collectors, and farmers of our Customs and subsidies, and controllers of the same, of and within our ports of the citie of London, and the Citie of Exeter, and all other ports, creekes, and places, within this our Realme of England, and euery of them, and all other our officers and ministers whatsoever, which haue or shall haue any dealing or intermedling, touching our said Customs and subsidies, that they, ne any of them by themselves, their clerks, deputies, or substitutes, or any of them take or receiue, or in any wise cause or suffer to be taken or receiued for vs, or in our name, or to our vse, or for, or in the names or to the uses of our heires or successors, of any person, or persons, any summe or summes of money, or other things whatsoever, during the said terme of ten yeeres, for, or in the name, lieu, or place of any Customs, subsidie, or other thing or duetie, to vs, our heires, or successors, due, or to be due, for the Customs or subsidies of any such goods, wares, or marchandizes, to be transported, caried, or brought to or from the priuiledged places, befoze in these presents mentioned, or any of them: nor make, nor cause to be made any entry into, or of the bookes of subsidies or customs, nor make any agreement for the Customs or subsidies, of, or for any goods, wares, or marchandizes, to be sent to, or returned from any the priuiledged places, befoze in these presents mentioned, saving onely with, and in the name, and by the consent of the saide William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, or of some of them, or of such as they or the most part of them shall receiue into their societie and company, as aforesaid. Provided alwaies, that if at any time hereafter, we our selues, by our writing signed with our proper hand, or any five or more of our priuite Counsell, for the time being, shall, by our direction, and by writing signed and subscribed with their hands, signifie and notifie to the said William Brayley, Gilbert Smith, Nicholas Spicer, Iohn Doricot, Iohn Yong, Richard Doderige, Anthony Dassel, and Nicholas Turner, or to any of them, or to any other, whom they, or the most part of them shall receiue into their Company and societie, as is aforesaid, or other wise to our officers in our ports of Exeter, or Plimouth, by them to be notified to such as shall haue interest in this speciall priuilege, that our will and pleasure is, that the said trade and traffique shall cease, and be no longer continued into the saide coasts and partes of Guinea befoze limited: then immediatly from and after the ende of fixe moneths next ensuing, after such signification & notification so to be given to any of the said Company and Societic, as is aforesaid, or otherwise to our Officers in our ports of Exeter or Plimouth, by them to be notified to such as shall have interest in this speciall privilege, these our present letters Patentes, and our graunt therein contained shall be utterly voyde, and of none effect, ne validitie in the lawe, to all intents and purposes: any thing before mentioned to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. Witness our selfe at Westminster, the thirde day of May, in the thirtieth yere of our Reigne 1588.

A voyage to Benin beyond the Countrey of Guinea, set forth by Master Bird and Master Newton Marchants of London, with a shippe called the Richard of Arundell, and a Pinesse; Written by James Welsh, who was chiefe Master of the said voyage, begunne in the yeece 1588.

Upon the twelfth of October wee wayed our ankers at Ratcliffe and went to Blackwall. And the next day sapling from thence, by reason of contrary winde and weather, wee made it the 25. of October before wee were able to reach Plimouth, and there we stayed (to our great expence of victuals) for lacke of winde and weather unto the 14. of December.

On Saturday the said 14. of December we put from thence, and about midnight were thwart of the Lizart.

Thursday the second of January wee had sight of the land neere Rio del oro, God be thanked, and there had 22. degrees of latitude, and 47. minutes.

The thirde of January wee had sight of Cauo de las Barbas, and it bare Southeast five leagues off.

The 4. we had sight of the Crofiers in the morning.

Tuesday the 7. day we had sight of Cauo verde, and I finde this place to be in latitude 14. degrees, and 43. minutes, being 4. leagues from the shoare.

Friday the 17. Cauo de Monte bare off vs North Northeast, we sounded and had 50. fathom blacke oale, and at 2. of the clocke it bare North Northwest 8. leagues off. And Cauo Mensurado bare of vs East and by South, and wee went Northeast with the maine: here the currant setteth to the East Southeast alongst the shoare, and at midnight wee sounded and had 26. fathome blacke oale.

The 18. in the morning we were thwart of a land much like Cauo verde, and it is as I iudge 9. leagues from Cauo Mensurado; it is a hill saddlebacked, and there are 4. or 5. one after another: and 7. leagues to the Southward of that, we saw a row of hills saddlebacked also, and from Cauo Mensurado are many mountaines.

The 19. we were thwart Rio de Sestos, and the 20. Cauo dos Baixos was North & by West 4. leagues off the shoare, and at afternoone there came a boate from the shoare with 3. Negroes, from a place (as they say) called Tabanoo. And towards evening we were thwart of an Island, and a great many of small Islands or rockes to the Southward, and the currant came out of the Souther-boord: we sounded and had 35. fathomes.

The 21. wee had a flat hill that bare North Northeast off vs, and wee were from the shoare 4. leagues, and at 2. a clocke in the afternoone we spake with a Frenchman riding neere a place called Ratire, and another place hard by called Crua. This Frenchman caried a letter from vs to M. Newton: wee layd it on hull while wee were writing of our letter; and the current set vs to the Southward a good pace alongst the shoare South Southeast.

The 25. we were in the bight of the bay that is to the Westward of Capo de Tres puntas: the currant did set East Northeast.

The 28. we lay fire glasses a hull tarying for the pinesse.

The last of January the middle part of Cape de tres puntas was thwart of vs thre leagues at seven of the clocke in the morning: and at eight the pinesse came to an anker: and wee proued that the current setteth to the Eastward: and at five at night the uttermost lande bare East and by South 5. leagues, and we went Southwest, and Southwest and by South.

Saturday the first of February 1588. we were thwart of a Round foreland, which I take to be the Eastermost part of Capo de tres puntas: and within the said Round foreland was a great bay with an Island in the said bay.

The second of February wee were thwart of the Castle of Mina, and when the thirde glasse of our Looke-out was spent, we spied under our Larbord-quarter one of their Boates with certaine Negroes, and one Portugale in the Boate, wee would haue had him to come aboard, but but he would not. And ouer the castle vpon the hie rockes we did see as it might be two watch-houses, and they did shew very white: and we went eastnortheast.

Two white watch-houses.

The 4 in the morning we were thwart a great high hill, and by into the lande were moze high ragged hilles, and those I reckoned to be but little thort of Monte Redondo. Then I reckoned that we were 20 leagues Southeast-ward from the Mina, and at 11 of the clocke I sawe two hilles within the land, these hils I take to be 7 leagues from the first hils. And to sea-ward of these hilles is a bay, and at the east end of the bay another hill, and from the hils the landes lie verie low. We went Eastnortheast, and East and by North 22 leagues, and then East along the shoze.

Monte Redondo.

The 6 we were thort of Villa longa, and there we met with a Portugall Carauell.

Villa longa.

The 7 a faire temperate day, and all this day we road before Villa longa.

The 8 at noone we set saile from Villa longa, and ten leagues from thence we ankered againe and stayed all that night in ten fadom water.

The 9 we set saile, and all alongst the shoze were very thicke woodes, and in the afternoone we were thwart a riuer, & to the Eastward of the riuer a litle way off was a great high bush-tree as though it had no leanes, and at night we ankered with faire and temperate weather.

Rio de Lagoa.

The 10 we set saile and went East, and East and by South 14 leagues along the shoare, which was so full of thicke woods, that in my iudgement a man should haue much to doe to passe through them, and towards night we ankered in 7 fadome with faire weather.

The 11 we sayled East and by South, and three leagues from the shoze we had but 5 fadome water, and all the wood vpon the land was as euen as if it had bene cut with a paire of gardeners sheeres, and in running of two leagues we descerned a high tuft of trees vpon the bow of a land, which shewed like a Porpoise head, and when wee came at it, it was but part of the lande, and a league further we saw a head-land very low and full of trees, and a great way from the land we had very shallow water, then we lay South into the sea, because of the sands for to get into the deepe water, and when we found it deepe, we ankered in five fadom thwart the riuer of Iaya, in the riuers mouth.

water.

The 12 in the morning we road still in the riuers mouth. This day we sent the pinnesse and the boat on land with the marchants, but they came not againe untill the next morning. The shallowest part of this riuer is toward the West, where there is but 4 fadom and a halfe, and it is very broad. The next morning came the boate aboord, and they also said it was Rio de Iaya. Here the current setteth Westward, and the Eastermost land is higher then the Westermost.

Rio de Iaya.

Thursday the 13 we set saile, and lay South Southeast along the shoze, where the trees are wonderfull euen, and the East shoze is higher then the West shoze, and when wee had sayled 18 leagues we had sight of a great riuer, then we ankered in three fadom and a halfe, and the current went Westward. This riuer is the riuer of Benin, and two leagues from the maine it is very shallowe.

Rio Benin.

The 15 we sent the boat and pinnesse into the riuer with the marchants, and after that we set saile, because we road in shallow water, and went Southsoutheast, and the starboord tacke aboord untill we came to five fadom water, where we road with the current to the Westward: then came our boat out of the harbour and went aboord the pinnesse. The West part of the land was high bowed much like the head of a Gurnard, and the Eastermost land was lower, and had on it three tufts of trees like stacks of wheate or corne, and the next day in the morning we sawe but two of those trees, by reason that we went moze to the Eastward. And here we road still from the 14 of Februarie untill the 14 of Aprill, with the winde at Southwest.

A current Westward.

The 16 of Februarie we rode still in 5 fadome, and the current ranne still to the Westward, the winde at Southwest, and the boat and pinnesse came to vs againe out of the riuer, and told vs that there was but ten foote water vpon the barre. All that night was drowlie, and yet reasonable temperate.

Ten foote water vpon the barre of Rio de Benia.

The 17 a close day the winde at Southwest. Our marchants wayed their goods and put them aboord the pinnesse to goe into the riuer, and there came a great current out of the riuer and set to the Westward.

The 18 the marchants went with the boat and pinnesse into the riuer with their commodities. This day was close and drowlie, with thunder, raine and lightning.

The 24 a close morning and temperate, and in the afternoone the boat came to vs out of the riuer from our marchants.

Tuesday the 4 of March, a close soulttry hot morning, the current went to the Westward, and much troubled water came out of the riuer.

The 16 our pinnesse came a boord Anthonie Ingram in her, & she brought in her 94 bags of Sicknesse among our men of pepper, and 28 Elephants teeth, and the Master of her and all his company were sicke. This was a temperate day and the winde at Southwest.

The 17. 18. and 19 were faire temperate weather and the winde at Southwest. This day the pinnelle went into the riuer againe, and caried the Purter and the Surgeon.

The 25 of the said moneth 1589 we sent the boate into the riuer.

The death of the Captaine.
Pepper & Elephants teeth.

The 30 our pinnelle came from Benin, and brought sorrowfull newes, that Thomas Hemsted was dead and our Captaine also, and he brought with her 159 Crons or sackes of pepper and Elephants teeth.

A good note.

Note that in all the time of our abiding here, in the mouth of the riuer of Benin, and in all the coast hereabout, it is faire temperate weather, when the winde is at Southwest. And when the winde is at Northeast and Northerly, then it raineth, with lightning and thunder, and is very in-temperate weather.

The 13 of Appill 1589 we set saile home wards in the name of Iesus. In the morning we sayled with the winde at Southwest, and lay West and by North, but it pproved calme all that night, and the currant Southeast.

The 14 the riuer of Benin was Northeast 7 leagues from the shore, and there was litle winde and towards night calme.

The 17 a faire temperate day the winde variable, and we had of latitude foure degrees and 20 minutes.

The 25 a faire temperate day the winde variable, and here we had three degrees & 29 minuts of latitude.

A deceitfull currant.

The 8 of May we had sight of the shore, which was part of Cauo de Monte, but we did not thinke we had beene so farre, but it came so to passe by reason of the currant. In this place P. Townson was in like maner deceiued with the currant.

The 9 we had sight of Cauo de monte.

The 17 a darke drowlie day, this was the first night that I tooke the North starre.

The 26 a temperate day with litle winde, and we were in 12 degrees and 13 minutes of latitude.

The 30 we met a great sea out of the Northwest.

The 6 of June we found it as temperate as if we had beene in England, yet we were within the height of the sunne, for it was declined 23 degrees, and 26 minuts to the Northward, and we had 15 degrees of latitude.

The 8 faire and temperate as in England, here we met with a counter sea, out of the South-seide.

The 15 a faire temperate day, the winde variable, here we had 18 degrees and fiftie nine minutes.

Rockweed on Sagasso all along the sea.

The 12 of July in 30 degrees of latitude we met with great store of rockweed, which did stick together like clusters of grapes, and this continued with vs vntill the 17 of the said moneth, and then we saw no more, at which 17 day we were in two and thirtie degrees sixe and forty minutes of latitude.

The 25 at five of the clocke in the morning, we had sight of the Isle of Pike, it bare North and by East from vs, we being 15 leagues off.

The 27 we spake with the poste of London and she told vs good newes of England.

The nine and twentieth we had sight of the Island of Cueruo, and the 30 we saw the Island of Flores.

The 27 of August in 41 degrees of latitude we saw 9 saile of Britons, and three of them followed vs vntill noone, and then gaue vs ouer.

The 30 we had sight of Cape Finisterre.

The eight of September at night wee put into Plimouth sound, and road in Causon bay all night.

The 9 we put into Catwater and there stayed vntill the 28 of September, by reason of want of men and sicknesse.

The nine and twentieth we set saile from Plimouth, and arriued at London the second of October 1589.

The commodities that we caried in this voyage were cloth both linnen & wollen, yron worke of sundry sorts, Manillios or bracelets of copper, glasse beades, and corall.

The commodities that we brought home were pepper and Elephants teeth, opie of palme, cloth made of Cotton wooll very curiously wouen, and cloth made of the barke of palme trees.

Their

Their money is pretie white shels, for golde and siluer we saw none. They haue also great store of cotton growing: their bread is a kind of roots, they call it Inamia, and when it is well sodden I would leaue our bread to eat of it, it is pleasant in eating, and light of digestion, the roote thereof is as bigge as a mans arme. Our men vpon fish-dapes had rather cate the rootes with oyle and vineger, then to cate good stockfish. There are great store of palme trees, out of the which they gather great store of wine, which wine is white and very pleasant, & we should buy two gallons of it for 20 shels. They haue good store of sope, and it smelleth like beaten violets: Also many pretie fine mats and baskets that they make, and spoones of Elephants teeth very curiously wrought with diuers proportions of foules and beasts made vpon them. There is vpon the coast wonderfull great lightning and thunder, in so much as I neuer hard the like in no Countrey, for it would make the decke or hatches tremble vnder our feete, and before we were well acquainted wih it, we were fearefull, but God be thanked we had no harme. The people are very gentle and louing, and they goe naked both men and women vntill they be married, and then they goe couered from the middle downe to the knees. They would bring our men earthen pottes of the quantitie of two gallons, full of hony and hony combes for 100 shelles. They would also bring great store of Oranges and Plantans which is a fruit that groweth vpon a tree, and is very like vnto a Cucumber but very pleasant in eating. It hath pleased God of his mercifull goodnesse to giue me the knowledge how to preserve fresh water with little cost, which did serue vs six moneths at the sea, & when we came into Plimmouth it was much wondered at, of the p[ri]ncipal men of the towne, who said that there was not sweeter water in any spring in Plimouth. Thus doth God provide for his creatures, vnto whom be praise now and for evermore, Amen.

Abundance of hony.

This preservation is wrought by casting into an hogthead of water an handful of bay-salt, as the author told me.

The voyage set forth by M. John Newton, and M. John Bird marchants of London to the kindome and Citie of Benin in Africa, with a ship called the Richard of Arundell, and a pinnesse, in the yere 1588. briefly set downe in this letter following, writen by the chiefe Factor in the voyage to the foresaid Marchants at the time of the ships first arriuall at Plimouth.

Veryshipful Sirs, the discourse of our whole proceeding in this voyage will aske more time and a person in better health then I am at this present, so that I trust you will pardon me, till my coming vnto you: in the meane time let this suffice. Whereas we departed in the moneth of December from the coast of England with your good ship the Richard of Arundell and the pinnesse, we held on our direct course towards our appointed port, and the 14 day of February following we arrived in the haven of Benin, where we found not water enough to carry the ship ouer the barre, so that we left her without in the road, and with the pinnesse & ship boat, into which we had put the chiefe of our marchandise, we went by the riuer to a place called Goto, where we arrived the 20 of February, the foresaid Goto being the neereest place that we could come to by water, to go for Benin. From thence we presently sent Negroes to the king, to certifie him of our arriuall, and of the cause of our coming thither: who returned to vs againe the 22 day with a noble man in their company to bring vs vnto the Citie, and with 200 Negroes to carrie our commodities: hereupon the 23 day we deliuered our marchandize to the kings Factor, & the 25 day we came to the great Citie of Benin, where we were well entertained: The sixe & twenty day we went to the Courte to haue spoken with the king, which (by reason of a solemne feast then kept amongst them) we could not doe: but yet we spake with his Veadore, or chiefe man, that hath the dealing with the Christians: and we conferred with him concerning our trading, who answered vs, that we should haue all things to our desire, both in pepper and Elephants teeth.

Goto in Benin.

The great citie of Benin.

The first of March, we were admitted to the kings presence, and he made vs the like courteous answer for our traffike: the next day we went againe to the Court, where the foresaid Veadore shewed vs one basket of Greene pepper, and another of dry in the stalkes: wee desired to haue it plucked from the stalkes and made cleane, who answered, that it would aske time, but yet in should be done: and that against another yeere it should be in better readines, & the reason why we found it so vnprepared was, because in this kings time no Christians had euer resorted thither, to lade pepper. The next day there were sent vs 12 baskets, and so a litle euery day vntill the 9 of March at which time we had made vpon 64 serons of pepper, and 28 Elephants teeth. In this time of our being at Benin (our natures at this first time not so well acquainted with that climate) we fell all of vs into the disease of the feuer, whereupon the Captaine sent me downe with those goods which we already had receiued, to the rest of our men at Goto: where being arrived, I found all the men of our pinnesse sicke also, and by reason of their weaknes not able to conuey the pinnesse

and goods downe to the place where our ship rood : but by good hap within two houres after my comming to Goro, the boate came by from the ship, to see how all things stood with vs, so that I put the goods into the boat, and went downe towards the ship : but by that time I was come aboard, many of our men died : namely, Master Benson, the Cooper, the Carpenter, & 3 or 4 more, & my selfe was also in such a weake state that I was not able to returne againe to Benin. Thereupon I sent by Samuel Dunne, and the Chirurgicalian with him to our men, that were about to let them blood, if it were thought needfull : who at their comming to Benin, found the Captaine and your sonne William Bird dead, and Thomas Hempsteede very weake, who also died within two dayes after their comming thither. This sorrowfull accident caused them with such pepper and teeth, as they could then find, speedily to returne to the ship, as by the Cargason will appeare : at their comming away the Veadore tolde them, that if they could or would stay any longer time, he would vse all possible expedition to bring in more commodities : but the common sicknesse so increased and continued amongst vs all, that by the time our men which remained were come aboard, we had so many sicke and dead of our companie, that we looked all for the same happe, and so thought to loose both our ship, life, countrey and all. Very hardly and with much adoe could we get by our ankens, but yet at the last by the mercie of God hauing gotten them by, but leauing our pinnesse behinde vs, we got to sea, and set saile, which was vpon the 13 of Aprill. After which by little and little our men beganne to gather by their crums and to recouer some better strength : and so sailing betwixt the Islands of Cape Verde, and the maine we came to the Islands of the Azores vpon the 25 of Iuly, where our men beganne a fresh to grow ill, and diuers died, among whom Samuel Dun was one, and as many as remained liuing were in a hard case : but in the midst of our distresse, it fell so wel out, by Gods good prouidence, that we met with your ship the Barke Burre, on this side the North cape, which did not only keepe vs good companie, but also sent vs five fresh men aboard, without whose helpe, we should surely haue tasted of many incontinences. But by this good meanes we are now at the last arrived in Plimouth, this 9 day of September : and for want of better health at this time, I referre the further knowledge of more particularities, till my comming to London.

Yours to commaund
Anthony Ingram.

The second voyage to Benin, set forth by Master Iohn Newton, and Master Iohn Bird Marchants of London in the yeere 1590 with a ship called the Richard of Arundell of the burthen of one hundred tunnes, and a small pinnesse, in which voyage Master Iames Welsh was chiefe Maister.

he third of September 1590 we set saile from Ratclife, and the 18 of the said moneth we came into Plimouth sound, and the two and twentieth we put to sea againe, and at midnight we were off the Lisar, and so passed on our voyage untill the 14 of October, on which day we had sight of Forteuentura one of the Canarie Islands, which appeared very ragged as we sailed by it.

The 16 of October, in the latitude of 24 degrees and nine minutes we met with a great hollow sea, the like whereof I neuer saw on this coast, and this day there came to the ships side a monstrous great fish (I thinke it was a Gobarto) which put by his head to the steepe ribs where I Cooke was in shifting the victuals, who I thought the fish would haue caried away.

The 21 in this latitude of 18 degrees we met with a countersea out of the North boord, and the last voyage in this very place we had the countersea out of the South, being very calme weather as now it is also.

The 24 we had sight of Caue Verde, and the 25 we met with a great hollow sea out of the North, which is a common signe that the winde will be Northerly, and so it prooued.

The 15 of November we met with three currants out of the West and Northwest, one after another, with an houres time betwene each currant. This was in the latitude of 6 degrees and 42 minutes.

The 18 day we met with two other great currants out of the Southwest, and the 20 we saw another current out of the North-east, and the 24 we had a great current out of the South-south-west, and at 6 of the clocke towards night we had 3 currents more.

The 27 we thought that we had gone at the least 2 leagues and a halfe euery watch, and it fell out that we sailed but one league euery watch for the space of 24 hours, by meanes of a great billow and current that came still out of the South,

A token of a Northerly
winde.

Great eury

The 5 of December in setting the watch we cast about and lay East N. E. the east, and N. E. the east, and here in 5 degrees and a halfe our pinnesse lost vs wilfully.

The 7 at the going downe of the Sunne we saw a great blacke spot in the Sunne, and the 8. day both at rising and setting we saw the like, which spot to our seeming was about the bignesse of a shilling, being in 5 degrees of latitude, and still there came a great billow out of the souther-boord.

The 14 we sounded and had 15 fadom water and grosse red sand, and 2 leagues from the shoze the currant set Southeast along the shoze with a billow still out of the souther-boord.

The 15 we were thwart a rocke somewhat like the Pewstone in England, it was 2 leagues from vs, here we sounded and had 27 fadom, but the rocke is not aboue a mile from the shoze, and a mile farther we saw another rocke, and betweene them both broken ground; here we sounded and had but 20 fadome and blacke sand, and we might see plaine that the rockes went not along the shoze, but from the land to the seaward, and about 5 leagues to the Southward we sawe a great bay, here we had 4 degrees and 27 minuts.

Two rocks.

The 16 we met with a French Ship of Hunsleur, who robbed our pinnesse, we sent a letter by him, and this night we saw another spot in the Sunne at his going downe. And towards euening we were thwart of a riuer, and right ouer the riuer was a high tuft of trees.

A French Ship of Hunsleur.

The 17 we ankered in the riuers mouth, and then we found the land to be Cauo de las Palmas, and betweene vs & the cape was a great ledge of rockes, one league and a halfe into the sea, and they bare to the West of the Cape, we saw also an Island off the point of the foze land, thus it wared night that we could perceiue no more of the lande, but onely that it trended in like a bay, where there runneth a streame as if it were in the riuer of Thames, and this was the change day of the Moone.

Cauo de las Palmas.

The 19 a faire temperate day, and the wind South, we went East, and the lande a sterne of vs West, and it shewed low by the water side like Islands, this was the east of Cauo de las Palmas, and it trended in with a great sound, and we went East all night, and in the morning wee were but 3 or 4 leagues from the shoze.

The 20 we were thwart of a riuer called Rio de los Barbos.

The 21 we went along the shoze East, & 3 or 4 leagues to the West of Cauo de tres puntas, I find the bay to be set deeper then it is by 4 leagues, and at 4 of the clocke the land began to shewe high, and the first part of it full of Palme trees.

Rio de los Barbos.

The 24 still going by the shoze, the land was very low and full of trees by the water side, and at 12 of the clocke we ankered thwart of the riuer called, Rio de Boilas. Here we sent our boate a shoze with the marchants, but they durst not put into the riuer because of a great billow that continually brake at the entrance vpon the barre.

Rio de Boilas.

The 28 we sailed alongst the shoze, and ankered at night in seuen fadom because a great current would haue put vs backe, which came from the East Southeast from Papuas.

Papuas.

The 29 at noone we were thwart of Arda, and there we tooke a Carauell but the men were fled on land, then we went aboord her, but she had nothing in her but only a litle oyle of Palme trees, and a few roots. The next morning our Captaine and marchants went to meete Portugals, that came in a boate to speake with vs, where they communed about the buying of the Carauell of our men againe, and the Portugals promised that we should haue for the Carauell, certaine bullocks and Elephants teeth, and they gaue vs one tooth and one bullocke presently, and sayd they would bring vs the rest the next day.

Arda.

The first of Ianuarie our Captaine went on land to speake with the Portugales, but when he saw they did dissemble, he came aboord againe, and presently we unrigged the Carauell, and set her on fire befoze the towne. Then we set saile and went along the coast, where we saw a Date tree, the like whereof is not in all that coast vpon the water side, also we fell on ground a litle in one place: Thus we went to Villa longa, and there ankered.

Ianuarie.

Villa longa.

The third we were as far shot as Rio de Lagoa, where our marchants went a shoze and vpon the barre they found 3 fadom flat, but they went not in because it was late. There is also to the Eastward of this riuer a Date tree higher then all the rest of the other trees thereabout. Thus we went along the coast, and euery night ankered, & at the shoze as we went was full of trees and thicke woods.

Rio de Lagoa.

The 6 day in the morning it was very foggy, so that we could not see the land, and at three of the clocke in the afternoone it cleared vp, & then we found our selues thwart of the riuer of Iaya, and when we found the shallow water, we bare into the sea South, as we did the voyage befoze, and came to an ancre in fise fadom water. The next day we set saile againe, and towards noone we were thwart of the riuer of Benin in foure fadom water.

The riuer of Iaya.

The riuer of Benin. The 10 day our Captaine went on land with the shallop at 2 a clocke in the afternoone. All this weeke it was very foggy euery day vntill ten a clocke, and all this time hitherto hath bene as temperate as our summer in England. This day we went into the road and ankred, & the west point of the road bare East northeast off vs, we riding in foure sadome water.

Goto. The 21 a faire temperate day, this day M. Hassald went to the towne of Goto, to heare newes of the Captaine.

The Caranell bringeth teeth aboord. The 22 came the Carauell, and Samuell in her, and she brought 63 Elephants teeth, and three brillocks.

The 28 a faire temperate day, and towards night there fell much raine, lightning, and thunder, this day our boate came aboord from Goto.

298. lacks of pepper. The 24 of Februarye, we tooke in 298 Cerons of lacks of pepper, and 4 Elephants teeth, and the winde was at Southeast. And the 26 we put the rest of our goods into the Caranell, and M. Hassald went with her to Goto.

The 5 of March M. Carauell came againe & brought 21 Cerons of pepper, & 4 Elephants teeth.

The 9 of Aprill our Carauell came aboord with water for our provision for the sea, and this day also we lost our shallope.

Three spoutes. The 17 a drowisie raine day, and in the afternoone we saw 3 great spoutes of raine, two on our larbord side, and one right with the ships head, but God be thanked, they came not at vs, and this day we tooke in the last of our water for the sea, and the 26 we victualled our Caranell to go with vs to the sea.

They returned homeward. The 27 we set saile to goe homeward with the winde at Southwest, and at two a clocke in the afternoone, the riuer of Benin was Northeast 8 leagues from vs.

The 3 of May we had such a terrible gust with raine, lightning & thunder, that it toze and split our fore saile, and also the Carauells fore-saile and maine-saile, with the wind at Southeast.

The 12 a faire temperate day, much like our sommer moornings in England, being but one degree & a halfe from the line, but at midnight we had a cruell gust of raine, & the wind at northeast.

The 24 we were South from from Cauo de las Palmas 37 leagues.

Braua. The first of Iuly we had sight of the Island of Braua, and it bare East 7 leagues off, and this Island is one of the Islands of Cauo Verde.

The 13 of August we spake with the Queenees ships, the Lord Thomas Howard being Admirall, and sir Richard Greeneuill Viceadmirall. They kept vs in their company vntill the 15 day at night, themselves lying a hull, in waight for purchase 30 leagues to the Southwest of the Island of Flores.

We departed in company of a pise. The 15 we had leaue to depart with a fly-boat laden with sugar that came from Sant Thome, which was taken by the Queenees ships, whereof my Lord Admirall gaue me great charge, not to leaue her vntill she were harborized in England.

Coruo. The three and twentieth the Northeast part of the Island of Coruo bare off vs East and by South five leagues off.

The 17 of September we met with a ship of Plimouth that came out of the West Indies, but she could tell vs no newes. The next day we had sight of another saile, this day also one of our company named M. Wood died.

The 23 we spake with the Dragon of my Lord of Cumberland, whereof Master Iuie was Maister.

The second of October we met with a ship of New-castle which came from Newfound-land, and out of her we had 300 couple of Newland fish.

The 6 we had sight of Sillie, and with raine and winde we were forced to put into S. Maries sound, where we staid all night, and 4 dayes after.

The 11 we set saile againe, and coming out had three sadome vpon the barre at a high water, then we lay out Southeast, through Crow-sand, and shortly after we had sight of the lands end, and at ten of the clocke we were thwart of the Lysart.

The 13 we were put into Dartmouth, and there we staid vntill the 12 of December. From thence we put out with the winde at West, and the 18 of December, God be praised, we ankred at Limehouse in the Thames, where we discharged 589 sacks of pepper, 150 Elephants teeth, and 32 barrels of oile of Palme trees.

The commodities that we caried out this second voyage were Broad cloth, Kersies, Bayes, Linnen cloth, Iron vntwought, Bracelets of Copper, Corall, Hawks belles, Hoptailles, Wats, and such like.

This voyage was more comfortable vnto vs then the first, because we had good store of fresh water, and that very sweet: for as yet we haue very good water in the shippe which we brought out out of the riuier of Benin the first day of Aprill 1591, and it is at this day (being the 7 of June 1592.) to be seen aboord the ship as cleare and as sweet as any fountaine can yeeld.

In this voiage we sailed 350 leagues within halfe a degree of the equinoctiall line, and there we found it more temperate, then where we rode. And under the line wee did kill great stoe of small Dolphins, and many other good fishes, and so did we all the way, which was a very great refreshing vnto vs, and the fish neuer forooke vs, vntill we werr to the Northwards of the Islands of Azores, and then we could see no more fish, but God be thanked wee met with good company of our countrey ships which were great comfort vnto vs, being five moneths before at Sea without any companie.

It is more temperate vnder the equinoctiall, then on the coast of Guinie & Benin.

By me Iames Welsh master of the Richard of Arundell, in both these voyages to the riuier of Benin.

An Aduertisement sent to Philip the second king of Spaine from Angola by one Baltazar Almeida de Sousa, touching the state of the foresayd countrey, written the 21 of May, 1591.

The 26 of July I certified your maiestie by John Frere de Bendanha your maiesties pay-master and commissioner, with the gouernour Paulo Dias, which is lately deceased, of all things that happened the 28 of December in the yere last past 1590. Now I thought it conuenient to aduertise your maiestie what hath fallen out since that time, which is as foloweth. The gouernour Luis Serano encamped himselfe eight leagues from Cabala, where the Negro king dwelleth, with 350 Portugal souldiers: & after ward being there encamped, it hapned that the king of Matamba sent a strong and mightie army, & in warlike maner, with strange inuentions for the layd purpose. So the king of Angola gaue this other king battell, and the gouernour sent 114 souldiers Portugals to helpe the said king of Angola: in which battell it was the will of God that our army was ouerthrowen and all slaine, as well our Portugals as the Moores which tooke part with them. So with this ouerthrow it happened that this realme the second time hath rebelled against your maiestie. Whereupon the Gouernour assembling the rest of his Portugall souldiers, to the number of 250 altogether, went to Amasanguano, which is now his place of abode. Moreover, besides the manifold losses which haue befallen the Portugals in this realme, your maiestie hath sustained other great misfortunes both in your lands and goods. And because I cannot personally come to certifie your maiestie thereof, I thought it good to write some part of the same whereby your maiestie may vnderstand the estate of this countrey. This realme, for the most part thereof hath twise bene wonne, and twise lost for want of good gouernment. For here haue bene many gouernours which haue pretended to do iustice, but haue pitifully neglected the same, and practised the cleane contrary, and this I know to be most true. But the onely way to recouer this realme, and to augment your maiesties lands, goods and treasure, must be by sending some noble and mightie man to rule here, which must bring authoritie fro your maiestie, and by taking straight order that euery captaine which doeth conqueere here may bee rewarded according to his deserts. Likewise your maiestie must send hither 2000 good souldiers, with munition and sufficient stoe of prouision for them. And by this means your highnesse shall know what yeerely reuenue Angola will yeeld vnto your coffers, and what profit will grow thereof. Otherwise your maiestie shall reape but litle benefit here. If with my presence I may doe your maiestie any seruice in giuing information of the state of this realme, as one which haue had experience thereof, and haue seene the order of it, vpon the vnderstanding of your maiesties pleasure herein, I will doe my best induour. And the cause wherefore I haue not done this heretofore hath bene, by reason that the Gouernours of this realme would suffer none of the captaines which haue conquered this countrey to informe your maiestie of that which is needfull for your seruice, and the augmenting of this conquest. Our lord preferue your catholique person with increase of many kingdomes, and the augmentation of your crowne. Written in the conquest of the realme of Angola the 21 of May 1591.

Paulo Dias Gouernour of Angola.

The king of Matamba. 114 Portugals slain in Angola.

Amasanguano the Portugals abode in Angola.

The onely way to reduce a rebellious kingdom vnto obedience.

An vniuersall relick of lewd gouernours.

Your maiesties most loiall subiect,

Baltazar Almeida de Sousa.

A true discourse written (as is thought) by Colonel Antonie Winkfield employed in the voyage to Spaine and Portugall, 1589. sent to his particular friend, & by him published for the better satisfaction of all such as hauing bene seduced by parricular report, haue entred into conceits tending to the discredite of the enterprise and Actōrs of the same.

ALthough the necessity of aduancing my reputation caused me to withstand the many perswasions you vsed to hold me at home, & the pursuite of honorable actions drew me (contrary to your expectation) to neglect that aduise, which in loue I know you gaue me: yet in respect of the many assurances you haue yeelded mee of your kindest friendship, I cannot suspect that you will either loue or esteeme me the lesse, at this my returne: and therefore I wil not omit any occasion which may make me appeare thankful, or discharge any part of that dutie I owe you; which now is none other then to offer you a true discourse how these warres of Spaine and Portugall haue passed since our going out of England the 18 of Aprill, till our returne which was the first of July. Wherein I wil (under your favourable pardon) for your further satisfaction, as well make relation of those reasons which confirmed me in my purpose of going abroad, as of these accidents which haue happened during our aboad there; thereby hoping to perswade you that no light faulce did drawe me from the fruition of your dearest friendship, but an earnest desire, by following the warres to make my selfe more woorthy of the same.

During the refoze determinately purposed to put on this habite of a souldier, I grew doubtfull whether to employ my time in wars of the low Countreies, which are in auxiliarie maner maintained by her maiestie, or to follow the fortune of this voyage, which was an aduventure of her and many honorable personages, in reuenge of vnsupportable wrongs offered vnto the estate of our countrey by the Castilian king: in arguing whereof, I find that by how much the challenger is reputed before the defendant, by so much is the journey to be preferred before those defendine wars. For had the duke of Parma his turne bene to defend, as it was his good fortune to inuade: from whence could haue proceeded that glorious honor which these late warres haue laid vpon him, or what could haue bene said moze of him, then of a Respondent (though neuer so valiant) in a private Duell: Euen, that he hath done no moze then by his honour he was tied vnto. For the gaine of one towne or any small defeat giuech moze renoume to the Assailant, then the defence of a countrey, or the withstanding of twentie encounters can yeeld any man who is bound by his place to guard the same: whereof as well the particulars of our age, especially in the Spaniard, as the reports of former histories may assure vs, which haue still laied the fame of all warres vpon the Inuader. And do not ours in these dayes liue obscured in Flanders, either not hauing wherewithall to manage any warre, or not putting on armes, but to defend theselues when the enemy shall procure them? Where as in this short time of our Aduventure, we haue won a towne by escalade, battered & assaulted another, ouerthrowen a mighty princes power in the field, landed our armie in 3 seuerall places of his kingdom, marched 7 dayes in the heart of his countrey, lien three nightes in the suburbs of his principall citie, beaten his forces into the gates thereof, and possessed two of his frontier Forts, as shall in discourse thereof moze particularly appeare: whereby I conclude, that going with an Inuader, and in such an action as euery day giuech new experience, I haue much to vaunt of, that my fortune did rather cary me thither then into the wars of Flanders. Notwithstanding the vehement perswasions you vsed with me to the contrary, the grounds whereof sithence you receiued them from others, you must giue me leaue to acquaint you with the error you were led into by the, who labouring to bring the world into an opinion that it stood moze with the safety of our estate to bend all our forces against the prince of Parma, then to follow this action by looking into the true effects of this journey, will iudicially conuince themselves of mistaking the matter. For, may the conquest of these countreies against the prince of Parma be thought moze easie for vs alone now, then the defence of them was 11 yeeres agoe, with the men and money of the Queene of England? the power of the Monseur of France? the assistance of the principall states of Germanie? and the nobilitie of their owne countrey? Could not an armie of moze then 20000 horse, & almost 30000 foot, beat Don Iohn de Austria out of the countrey, who was possessed of a very few frontier townes? & that it now be laid vpon her maiesties shoulders to remooue so mighty an enemy, who hath left vs but 3 whole parts of 17 vnconquered? It is not a iourney of a few moneths, nor an auxiliarie warre of few yeeres that can deminish the king of Spaine in these places where we shall meet at euery 8 or 10 miles end with a towne, which will cost moze the winning then will pecerely pay 4 or 5 thousand mens wages, where all the countrey is quartered by riuers which haue no passage vnfortified, and where most of the best souldiers of Christendome that be on our aduerse party be in pension. But our armie, which hath not cost her maiestie much aboute the third part of one yeres expences in the Low countries, hath already spoiled a great part of the provision he had made at the Groine of all sortes, for a new voyage into England; burnt 3 of his ships, wherof one was the second in the last yeres expedition called S. Iuan de Colorado; taken from him aboute 150 pieces of good artillerie; cut off more then 60 hulks and 20 French ships well manned fit and readie to serue him for men of war against vs, laden for his store with coine, victuals, masts, cables and other marchandizes; slaine and taken the principall men of war he had in Galicia; made Don Pedro Enriques de Gusman, Conde de Fuentes, Generall of his forces in Portugall, shamefully run at Peniche; laid along of his best Commanders in Lisbon; and by these few aduentures discovered how easily her maiestie may without any great aduenture in short time pull the Tyrant of the world vpon his knees, as well by the disquieting his vsurpation of Portugall as without difficultie in keeping the commoditie of his Indies from him, by sending an army so accomplished, as may not be subiect to those extremities which we haue endured: except he draw, for those defences, his forces out of the Low countries and disurnish his garisons of Naples & Milan, which with safetie of those places he may not do. And yet by this meane he shall rather be enforced therrunto, then by any force that can be vled there against him: wherefore I directly conclude that this proceeding is the most safe and necessary way to be held against him, and therefore more improving then the war in the Low countries. Yet hath the iourney (I know) bene much disliked by some, who either thinking too worthily of the Spaniards valure, too indifferently of his purposes against vs, or too vnworthily of them that vnderooke this iourney against him, did thinke it a thing dangerous to encounter the Spaniard at his owne home, a thing needlesse to proceed by insurrection against him, a thing of too great moment for two subiects of their qualitie to vndertake: And therefore did not so aduance the beginnings as though they hoped for any good successe thereof.

The chances of wars be things most vncertaine: for what people soeuer vndertake them, they are in deed as chastisements appointed by God for the one side or the other. For which purpose it hath pleased him to giue some victories to the Spaniards of late yeeres against some whom he had in purpose to ruine. But if we consider what wars they be that haue made their name so terrible, we shall find them to haue bin none other then against the barbarous Moores, the naked Indians, and the unarmed Netherlanders, whose peelding rather to the name then the act of the Spaniards, hath put them into such a conceit of their mightines, as they haue considerately vnderaken the conquest of our monarchie, considering of a people vnitied & alwayes held sufficiently warlike: against whom what successe their invincible army had the last yeere, as our very children can witnes, so I doubt not but this voyage hath sufficiently made knownen what they are euen vpon their owne dunghill, which, had it bene set out in such sort as it was agreed vpon by their first demaund, it might haue made our nation the most glorious people of the world. If or hath not the want of 8 of the 12 pieces of artillerie, which were promised vnto the Aduenture, lost her maiestie the possession of the Groine and many other places, as hereafter shall appeare, whose defensible rampires were greater then our batterie (such as it was) cold force: and therefore were left vnattempted.

It was also resolved to haue sent 600 English horses of the Low countries, wherof we had not one, notwithstanding the great charges expended in their transportation hither: and that may the army assembled at Puente de Burgos thank God of, as well as the forces of Portugall, who foreran vs 6 daies together: Did we not want 7 of the 13 old Companies, which we should haue had from thence; foure of the 10 Dutch Companies; & 6 of their men of war for the sea, from the Hollanders: which I may iustly say we wanted, in that we might haue had so many good souldiers, so many good ships, and so many able bodies more then we had.

Did there not vpon the first thinking of the iourney diuers gallant Courtiers put in their names for aduenturers to the summe of 10000 li. who seeing it went forward in good earnest, aduised themselves better, and laid the want of so much money vpon the iourney.

Was there not moreover a round summe of the aduenture spent in leaping, furnishing, and maintaining 3 moneths 1500 men for the seruice of Berghen, with which Companies the Dutinies of Ostend were suppressed, a seruice of no smal moment.

What misery the detracting of the time of our setting out, which should haue bene the 1 of February, did lay vpon vs, too many can witnes: and what extremitie the want of that moneths victuals which we did eat, during the moneth we lay at Plimmouth for a wind, might haue oriened vs vnto, no man can doubt of, that knoweth what men do liue by, had not God giuen vs in the ende a more prosperous wind and shorter passage into Galicia then hath bene often seen, where our owne force & fortune reuiuicualled vs largely: of which crosse windes, that held vs two daies after our going out, the Generals being wearie, thrust to Sea in the same, wisely chusing rather to attend the change thereof there, then by being in harborough to lose any part of the better, when it should come by hauing their men on shoze : in which two dayes 25 of our companies shipped in part of the fleet were scattered from vs, either not being able or willing to double Vshant.

These burdens layed vpon our Generals befoze their going out, they haue patiently endured, and I thinke they haue thereby much enlarged their honour : for hauing done thus much with the want of our artillery, 600 hoise, 3 000 foot, 20000 li. of their aduventure, and one moneths victuals of their proportion, what may be conjectured they would haue done with their full complement.

For the losse of our men at sea, since we can lay it on none but the will of God, what can be said moze, then that it is his pleasure to turne all those impediments to the honor of them against whom they were intended : and he will still shew himselfe the Lord of hostes in doing great things by the, whom many haue sought to obscure : who if they had let the action fall at the height thereof in respect of those defects, which were such especially for the seruice at land, as would haue made a mighty subiect stoope vnder the, I do not see how any man could iustly haue layd any reproch vpon him who commanded the same, but rather haue lamented the iniquity of this time, wherein men whom forren countries haue for their conduct in seruice worthily esteemed of, should not only in their owne country not be seconded in their honorable endeouors, but mightily hindered, euen to the impairing of their owne estates, which most willingly they haue aduencured for the good of their countries: whose worth I wil not value by my report, lest I should seem guilty of flattery (which my soule abhorreth) & yet come short in the true measure of their praise. Onely for your instruction against them who had almost seduced you from the true opinion you hold of such men, you shal vnderstand that General Norris fro his booke was trained vp in the wars of the Admirall of France, and in very yong yeeres had charge of men vnder the erle of Essex in Ireland : which with what commendations he then discharged, I leaue to the report of them who obserued those seruices. Upon the breach betwixt Don John & the States, he was made Colonell generall of all the English forces there present, or to come, which he continued 2 yeeres : he was then made Marshall of the field vnder Conte Hohenlo : and after that, General of the army in Frisland : at his coming home in the time of Monsieurs gouernment in Flanders, he was made lord President of Munster in Ireland, which he yet holdeth from whence within one yeere he was sent for, & sent Generall of the English forces which her maiestie the sent to the Low countries, which he held til the erle of Leicesters going ouer. And he was made Marshall of the field in England, the enemy being vpon our coast, and when it was expected the crowne of England should haue bene tried by battel. At which places of commandement which neuer any Englishman successiuelly attained vnto in forren wars, and the high places her maiestie hath thought him worthy of, may suffice to perswade you, that he was not altogether unlikely to discharge that which he undertooke.

That same general Drake hath gotten by his iourney about the world, by his aduventures to the west Indies, & the scourges he hath layd vpon the Spanish nation, I leaue to the Southerne parts to speake of, & refer you to The Booke extant in our owne language treating of the same, & beseech you considering the waighy matters they haue in all the course of their liues with wonderfull reputation managed, that you wil esteeme them not wel informed of their proceedings, that thinke them insufficient to passe through that which they undertooke, especially hauing gone thus far in the view of the world, through so many incombzances, & disappointed of those agreements which led them rather to undertake the seruice. But it may be you wil thinke me herein either too much opinionated of the voyage, or conceited of the Commanders, & labouring thus earnestly to aduance the opinion of them both, haue not so much as touched any part of the misorders, weaknes & wants that haue bene amongst vs, whereof they that returned did plentifully report. True it is, I haue conceived a great opinion of the iourney, & do thinke honorable of the Commanders : for we find in greatest antiquities, that many Commanders haue bene received home with triumph for lesse merite, & that our owne country hath honored men heretofore with admiration for aduventures unequal to this: it might therfore in those daies haue seemed superfluous to extend any mans commendations by particular remembrances, for that then all men were ready to giue euery man his due. But I hold it most necessary in these daies, sitheence euery vertue findeth her direct opposite, & actions worthy of all memory are in danger to be enuiously obscured, to denounce the payless of the action, and actors to the full, but yet no further then with sinceritie of truth, & not without grieving at the iniury of this time, wherein is enforced a necessitie of Apologies for those men & matters, which all former times were accustomed to entertaine with the greatest applause that might be. But to answer the reports which haue bene giuen out in reproch of the actors and action by such as were in the same : let no man thinke other wise, but that they, who fearing the casuall accidents of war had any purpose of returning, did first aduise of some occasion that should moue them thereunto : and hauing found any whatsoeuer did thinke it sufficiently iust, in respect of the earnest desire they had to seeke out matter that might colour their coming home.

Of these there were some, who having noted the late Flemish warres did finde that many yong men haue gone ouer and safely returned souldiers within fewe moneths, in having learned some wordes of Arte vsed in the warres, and thought after that good example to spend like time amongst vs: which being expired they beganne to quarrell at the great mortalicie that was amongst vs.

The neglect of discipline in the Armie, so that men were suffered to be drunke with the plenty of wines.

The scarcitie of Surgions.

The want of carriages for the hurt and sicke: and the penurie of victuals in the Campe:

Thereupon diuining that there would be no good done: And that therefore they could be content to lose their time, and aduenture to returne home againe.

These men haue either corrupted wel of their owne wits (who by obseruing the passages of the warre were become sufficient souldiers in these fewe weeks, & did long to be at home, where their discourses might be wondered at) or missing of their Portegues and Milraves which they dreamed on in Portugall, would rather returne to their former maner of life, then attend the ende of the iourney. For seeing that one hazard brought another; and that though one escaped the bullet this day it might light vpon him to morrow, the next day, or any day; and that the warre was not confined to any one place, but y^e euery place brought forth new enemies, they were glad to see some of the poore souldiers fall sicke, y^e fearing to be infected by them they might iustly desire to go home.

The sicknesse I confesse was great, because any is too much. But harsh it beie greater then is ordinary amongst Englishmen at their first entrance into the warres, whither soeuer they goe to want the fulnesse of their flesh pots: Haue not ours decayed at all times in France, with eating yong fruits and drinking newe wines: haue they not abundantly perished in the Low countreys with cold, and rawnesse of the aire, euen in their garrisons: Haue there not more died in London in sixe moneths of the plague, then double our Armie being at the strongest: And could the Spanish Armie the last yeere (who had all provisions that could be thought on for an Armie, and tooke the fittest season in the yeere for our Climate) auoyd sicknes amongst their souldiers: May it then be thought that ours could escape there, where they found inordinate heat of weather, and hot wines to dissemper them withall?

Answer to the first,

But can it be, that wee haue lost so many as the common sort perswade themselves wee haue: It hath bene proued by strickt examinations of our musters, that we were neuer in our fulnesse before our going from Plimouth 11000. souldiers, nor about 2500. Partimers. It is also euident that there returned about 6000. of all sorts, as appeareth by the severall payments made to them since our comming home. And I haue truly shewed you that of these numbers very nere 3000. forsooke the Armie at the Sea, whereof some passed into France and the rest returned home. So as we neuer being 13000. in all, and hauing brought home about 6000. with vs, you may see how the world hath bene seduced, in beleeuing that we haue lost 16000. men by sickness.

To them that haue made question of the government of the warres (little knowing what appertaineth therunto in that there were so many drunkards amongst vs) I answer, that in their government of shires and parishes, yea in their very householdes, themselves can hardly bridle their vassals from that vice. For we see it is a thing almost impossible, at any your Faircs or publique assemblies to finde any quarter thereof sober, or in your Townes any Alehouses vnfrequented: And we obserue that though any man hauing any disordered persons in their houses, do locke by their drinke and set Butlers vpon it, that they will yet either by indirect meanes steale themselves drunke from their Masters tables, or runne abroad to seeke it. If then at home in the eyes of your Iustices, Mayors, Preachers, and Masters, and where they pay for euery pot they take, they cannot be kept from their liquor: doe they thinke that those base disordered persons whom themselves sent vnto vs, as liuing at home without rule, who hearing of wine doe long for it as a daintie that their purses could neuer reach to in England, and hauing it there without money end in their houses where they lie & hold their guard, can be kept from being drunke; and once drunke, held in any order or tunc, except we had for euery drunkard an officer to attend him: But who be they that haue runne into these disorders: Euen our newest men, our yongest men, and our idlest men, and for the most part our sloouely prest men, whom the Iustices (who haue alwayes thought vniworthily of any warre) haue sent out as the scumme and dregs of their countrey. And those were they, who dissempering themselves with these hote wines, haue brought in that sickness, which hath infected honest men then themselves. But I hope, as in other places the recovery of their diseases doeth acquaint their bodies with the aire of the countreies where they be, so the remainder of these which haue either recovered, or past without sickness will proue most fit for Partiall seruices.

If we haue wanted Surgeons, may not this rather be laid vpon the capitaines (who are to provide for their severall Companies) then vpon the Generals, whose care hath bene more generall. And how may it be thought that euery capitaine, vpon whom most of the charges of raising their Companies was laid as an aduventure, could provide themselves of all things expedient for a war, which was alwaies wont to be maintained by the purse of the prince. But admit euery capitaine had his Surgeon: yet were the want of curing neuer the lesse: for our English Surgeons (for the most part) be vnexperienced in hurts that come by shot; because England hath not known wars but of late, from whose ignorance proceeded this discomfort, which I hope wil warne those hereafter go to the wars to make preparation of such as may better preserve mens liues by their skill.

From whence the want of carriages did proceed, you may coniecture in y^e we marched through a countrey neither plentiful of such provisions, nor willing to part from any thing: yet this I can assure you, that no man of worth was left either hurt or sicke in any place vnprovided for. And that the General commanded all the mules & asses that were laden with any baggage to be unburdened and taken to that vse: and the earle of Essex and he for mony hired men to carry m^e vpon pikes. And the earle (whose true vertue and nobilitie, as it doeth in all other his actions appeare, so did it very much in this) threw down his own stuffe, I meane apparel & necessaries which he had there, from his owne carriages, and let them be left by the way, to put hurt and sicke men vpon them. Of whose honorable desertings I shall not need here to make any particular discourse, for that many of his actions do hereafter giue me occasion to obserue the same.

Answer to

And the great complaint that these men make for the want of victuals may well proceed from their not knowing the wants of the war; for if to feed vpon good bieuies, muttons & goats, be to want, they haue endured great scarcitie at land, wherunto they neuer wanted, two daies together, wine to mixe with their water, nor bread to eat with their meat (in some quantitie) except it were such as had vowed rather to starue then to stir out of their places for food: of whom we had too many, who if their time had serued for it, might haue seen in many camps in the most plentifull countries of the world for victuals, men daily die with want of bread and drinke in not hauing money to buy, nor the countrey yeelding any good or healthful water in any place; whereas both Spaine and Portugall do in euery place afford the best water that may be, and much more healthful then any wine for our drinking.

And although some haue most iniuriously exclaimed against the small provisions of victuals for the sea, rather grounding the same vpon an euil that might haue fallen, then any that did light vpon vs: yet know you this, that there is no man so forgetfull, that will say they wanted before they came to the Groine, that whosoever made not very large provisions for himselfe & his company at the Groine, was very improuident, where was plentiful store of wine, biese and fish, & no man of place prohibited to lay in the same into their ships, wherewith some did so furnish themselves, as they did not onely in the iourney supplie the wants of such as were lesse prouident then they, but in their returne home made a round commoditie of the remainder thereof. And that at Calcais there came in such store of provisions into the Fleet out of England, as no man that would haue used his diligence could haue wanted his due proportion thereof, as might appeare by the remainder that was returned to Plimmouth, and the plentifull sale thereof made out of the marchants ships after their comming into the Thames.

But least I should seeme vnto you too studious in confuting idle opinions, or answering frivolous questions, I will addeesse me to the true report of those actiōs that haue passed therein: wherein I protest, I will neither hide any thing that hath hapned against vs, nor attribute more to any man or matter, then the iust occasions thereof lead me vnto: wherein it shall appeare that there hath bene nothing left vndone by the Generals which was before our going out vnderaken by them, but that there hath bene much more done then was at the first required by Don Antonio, who should haue reaped the fruit of our aduventure.

within a mile of the Groine
the 20 of April

After 6 daies sailing from the coast of England, & the 5 after we had the wind good being the 20 of April in the euening, we landed in a baie more then an English mile from the Groine, in our long boats and pinnacles without any impeachment: from whence we presently marched toward the towne, within one halfe mile we were encountred by the ennemy, who being charged by ours, retired into their gates. For that night our armie lay in the villages, houses & mills next adioining, and very nere round about the towne, into the which the Galeon named S. Iohn (which was the second of the last yeeres Fleet agaynst England) one hulke, two smaller ships and two Gallies which were found in the road, did beate vpon vs and vpon our Companies as they passed too and fro that night and the next morning. Generall Norris hauing that morning before day viewed the towne, found the same defended on the land side (for it standeth vpon the necke of an Island) with a wall vpon a dy ditch: whereupon he resolved to tris in two places what might bee done against against it by escalade, and in the meane time aduised for the landing of some artillery to beat vpon the ships and gallies, that they might not annoy vs: which being put in execution, vpon the planting of the first piece the gallies abandoned the road, and betooke them to Feroll, not farre from thence: and the Armada being beaten with the artillery and musketers that were placed vpon the next shoie, left her playing vpon vs. The rest of the day was spent in preparing the companies, and other provisions ready for the surprize of the baste towne, which was effected in this sort.

There were appointed to be landed 1200 men vnder the conduct of Colonel Il Hundley, and Captaine Fenner the Viceadmirall, on that side next fronting vs by water in long boats and pin-nelles, wherein were placed many pieces of artillery to beat vpon the towne in their approach: at the corner of the wall which defended the other water side, were appointed Captaine Richard Wingfield Lieutenant Colonell to Generall Norris, and Captaine Sampson Lieutenant Colonell to Generall Drake to enter at low water with 500 men if they found it passable, but if not, to betake them to the escalade, for they had also ladders with them: at the other corner of the wall which ioyned to that side that was attempted by water, were appointed Colonell Vmpton, and Colonell Bret with 300 men to enter by escalade. All the companies which should enter by boat being imbarked befoze the low water, and hauing giuen the alarime, Captaine Wingfield and Captaine Sampson betooke them to the escalade, for they had in commandement to charge all at one instant. The boats landed without any great difficulty: yet had they some men hurt in the landing. Colonell Bret and Colonell Vmpton entred their quatter without encounter, not finding any defence made against them: for Captaine Hinder being one of them that entred by water, at his first entry, with some of his owne company whom he trusted well, betooke himselfe to that part of the wall, which he cleared befoze that they offered to enter, and so still scoured the wall till hee came on the backe of them who maintained the fight against Captaine Wingfield and Captaine Sampson; who were twice beaten from their ladders, and found very good resistance, till the enemies perceiuing ours entred in two places at their backs, were driuen to abandon the same. The reason why that place was longer defended then the other, is (as Don Iuan de Luna who commanded the same affirmeth) that the enemy that day had resolved in counsell how to make their defences, if they were appzoched: and therein concluded, that, if we attempted it by water, it was not able to be held, and therefore vpon the discouery of our boats, they of the high towne should make a signall by fire from thence, that all the low towne might make their retreat thither: but they (whether troubled with the sudden terror we brought vpon them, or for getting their decree) omitted the fire, which made them guard that place til we were entred on euery side.

Then the towne being entred in three seuerall places with an huge cry, the inhabitants betooke them to the high towne: which they might with lesse perill doe, for that ours being strangers there, knew not the way to cut them off. The rest that were not put to the sword in fury, fled to the rocks in the Island, and others hid themselves in chambers and sellers, which were euery day found out in great numbers.

Amongst those Don Iuan de Luna, a man of very good commandement, hauing hidden himselfe in a house, did the next morning preld himselfe.

There was also taken that night a commissary of victuals called Iuan de Vera, who confessed that there were in the Groine at our entry 500 souldiers being in seuen cōpanies which returned very weake (as appeareth by the small numbers of them) from the iourney of England, namely:

|---------------------------------|---|
| Under Don
Iuan de Lu-
na. | Don Diego Barran, a bastard sonne of the Marques of Santa Cruz; his company was that night in the Galeon. |
| | Don Antonio de Herera then at Madrid. |
| | Don Pedro de Manriques brother to the Earle of Paxides. |
| | Don Ieronimo de Mourray of the Order of S. Iuan, with some of the towne were in the fort. |
| | Don Gomez de Caramasal then at Madrid. |
| | Captaine Manço Cauaso de Socas. |

Also there came in that day of our landing from Retanzas the companies of Don Iuan de Mo-salle, and Don Pedro poure de Leon.

Also he saith that there was order giuen for baking of 300000 of biscuit, some in Baranlas, some in Ribadeo, and the rest there,

There were then in the towne 2000 pipes of wine, and 150 in the ships.

That there were lately come vnto the Marques of Seralba 300000 ducats,

That there were 1000 farres of oile.

A great quantity of beanes, peaze, wheat, and fish,

That there were 3000 quintals of beefe.

And that not twenty dayes befoze, there came in three barks laden with match & harquebuzes.

Some others also found fauour to be taken prisoners, but the rest falling into the hands of the common souldiers, had their throats cut, to the number of 500, as I coniecture, first and last, after we had entered the towne; and in the entry thereof there was found euery celler full of wine, whereon our men, by inordinate drinking, both grew themselves for the present senselesse of the danger of the shot of the towne, which hurt many of them being drunke, & tooke the first ground of their sicknesse; for of such was our first and chiefest mortality. There was also abundant store of victuals, salt, and all kinde of prouision for shipping and the warre: which was confessed by the sayd Commissary of victuals taken thre, to be the beginning of a magazin of all sorts of prouision for a new voyage into England: whereby you may coniecture what the spoile thereof hath advantaged vs, and preiudiced the king of Spaine.

The next morning about eight of the clocke the enemies abandoned their ships. And hauing ouercharged the artillery of y gallion, left her on fire, which burnt in terrible sort two dayes together, the fire and ouercharging of the pieces being so great, as of fifty that were in her, there were not aboue sixteene taken out whole; the rest with ouercharge of the powder being broken, and molten with heat of the fire, were taken out in broken pieces into diuers ships. The same day was the cloister on the South side of the towne entered by vs, which ioyned very neere to the wall of the towne, out of the chambers and other places whereof we beat into the same with our musquetiers.

The next day in the afternoone there came downe some 2000 men, gathered together out of the countrey, euen to the gates of the towne, as resolutely (ledde by what spirit I know not) as though they would haue entered the same: but at the first defence made by ours that had the guard there, wherein were slaine about eighteene of theirs, they tooke them to their heeles in the same disorder they made their approach, and with greater speed then ours were able to follow: notwithstanding we followed after them more then a mile. The second day Colonell Hunley was sent into the countrey with three or foure hundred men, who brought home very great store of kine and sheepe for our reliefe.

The third day in the night the Generall had in purpose to take a long munition-house builded vpon their wall, opening towards vs, which would haue given vs great advantage against them; but they knowing the commodity thereof for vs, burnt it in the beginning of the euening; which put him to a new counsell: for he had likewise brought some artillery to that side of the towne. During this time there happened a very great fire in the lower end of the towne; which, had it not bene by the care of the Generals heedily seene vnto, and the fury thereof prevented by pulling downe many houses which were most in danger, as next vnto them, had burnt all the prouisions we found there, to our woonderfull hinderance.

The fourth day were planted vnder the gard of the cloister two demy-cannons, and two coluer-rings against the towne, defended or gabbioned with a crosse wall, thorow the which our battery lay; the first and second tire whereof shooke all the wall downe, so as all the ordnance lay open to the enemy, by reason whereof some of the Canoniers were shot and some slaine. The Lieutenant also of the ordnance, M. Spencer, was slaine fast by Sir Edward Norris, Master thereof: whose valour being accompanied with an honourable care of defending that trust committed vnto him, neuer left that place, till he receiued direction from the Generall his brother to cease the battery, which he presently did, leauing a guard vpon the same for that day; and in the night following made so good defence for the place of the battery, as after there were very few or none annoyed therein. That day Captaine Goodwin had in commandement from the Generall, that when the assault should be giuen to the towne, he should make a proffer of an escalade on the other side, where he held his guard: but he (mistaking the signall that should haue bene giuen) attempted the same long befoze the assault, and was shot in the mouth. The same day the Generall hauning planted his ordnance ready to batter, caused the towne to be summoned; in which summons they of the towne shot at our Drum: immediately after that there was one hanged ouer the wall, and a parle desired; wherein they gaue vs to vnderstand, that the man hanged was he that shot at the Drum befoze: wherein also they intreated to haue faire warres, with promise of the same on their parts. The rest of the parle was spent in talking of Don Iuan de Luna, and some other prisoners, and somewhat of the rending of the towne, but not much, for they listened not greatly thereunto.

Generall Norris hauing by his skilfull view of the towne (which is almost all seated vpon a rocke) found one place thereof mineable, did presently set workmen in hand withall; who after three dayes labour (and the seuenth after we were entered the base towne) had bedded their powder, but indeed not farre enough into the wall. Against which time the breach made by the canon being thought assaultable, and companies appointed as well to enter the same, as that which was expected should be blown up by the mine: namely, to that of the canon, Captaine Richard Wingfield, and Captaine Philpott, who lead the Generals foot-company, with whom also Captaine Yorke went, whose principall commandment was ouer the horsemen. And to that of the Mine, Captaine John Sampson, and Captaine Anthonie Wingfield Lieutenant Colonel to the Master of the Ordnance, with certaine selected out of diuers Regiments. All these companies being in armes, and the assault intended to be giuen in all places at an instant, fire was put to the traine of the mine; but by reason the powder brake out backward in a place where the caue was made too high, there could be nothing done in either place for that day. During this time Captaine Hinder was sent with some chosen out of euery company into the country for provisions, whereof he brought in good store, and returned without losse.

The next day Captaine Anthonie Sampson was sent out with some 500 to fetch in provisions for the army, who was encountred by them of the country, but he put them to flight, and returned with good spoile. The same night the Miners were set to worke againe, who by the second day after had wrought very well into the foundation of the wall. Against which time the companies aforesayd being in readinesse for both places (Generall Drake on the other side, with two or three hundred men in pinnels, making proffer to attempt a strong fort upon an Island befoze the towne, where he left more then thirty men) fire was giuen to the traine of the mine, which blew up halfe the tower vnder which the powder was planted. The assailants hauing in charge vpon the effecting of the mine presently to giue the assault, performed it accordingly; but too soone: for hauing entered the top of the breach, the other halfe of the tower, which with the first force of the powder was onely shaken and made loose, fell vpon our men: vnder which were buried about twenty or thirty, then being vnder that part of the tower. This so amazed our men that stood in the breach, not knowing from whence that terror came, as they forsooke their Commanders, and left them among the ruines of the mine. The two Ensignes of Generall Drake and Captaine Anthonie Wingfield were shot in the breach, but their colours were rescued: the Generals by Captaine Sampsons Lieutenant, and Captaine Wingfields by himselfe. Amongst them that the wall fell vpon, was Captaine Sydenham pitifully lost; who hauing three or foure great stones vpon his lower parts, was held so fast, as neither himselfe could stirre, nor any reasonable company recover him. Notwithstanding the next day being found to be alive, there was ten or twelue lost in attempting to rescue him.

The breach made by the canon was woonderfully well assaulted by them that had the charge thereof, who brought their men to the push of the pike at the top of the breach. And being ready to enter, the loose earth (which was indeed but the rubbish of the outside of the wall) with the weight of them that were thereon slipped ourwards from vnder their feet. Whereby did appeare halfe the wall unbattered. For let no man thinke that culuerin or demy-canon can sufficiently batter a defensible rampire: and of those pieces which we had; the better of the demy-canons at the second shot brake in her carriages, so as the battery was of lesse force, being but of three pieces.

In our retreat (which was from both breaches thorow a narrow lane) were many of our men hurt: and Captaine Dolphin, who serued very well that day, was hurt in the very breach. The failing of this attempt, in the opinion of all the beholders, and of such as were of best iudgement, was the fall of the mine; which had doubtlesse succeeded, the rather, because the approach was vnlooked for by the enemy in that place, and therefore not so much defence made there as in the other; which made the Generall grow to a new resolution: for finding that two dayes battery had so little beaten their wall, and that he had no better preparation to batter withall: he knew in his experience, there was no good to be done that way; which I thinke he first put in prooff, to trie if by that terror he could get the vpper towne, hauing no other way to put it in hazard so speedily, and which in my conscience had obtained the towne, had not the defendants bene in as great perill of their liues by the displeasure of their king in giuing it up, as by the bullet or sword in defending the same. For that day befoze the assault, in the view of our army, they burnt a cloister within the towne, and many other houles adioyning to the castle, to make it more defensible: whereby it appeared how little opinion themselves had of holding it against vs, had not God (who would not haue vs suddenly made proud) layed that misfortune vpon vs.

Whereby it may appeare, that the foure canons, and other pieces of battery promised to the iorney, and not performed, might haue made her Maiestys mistresse of the Groine: for though the mine were infortunate, yet if the other breach had bene such as the earth would haue held our men thereon, I doe not thinke but they had entered it thorowly at the first assault giuen: which had bene more then I haue heard of in our age. And being as it was, is no more then the Prince of Parma

Parma hath in winning of all his towne endured, who neuer entered any place at the first assault, nor aboue three by assault.

The next day the Generall hearing by a prisoner that was brought in, that the Conde de Andrada had assembled an armie of eight thousand at Puente de Burgos, five miles from thence in the way to Petance, which was but the beginning of an armie : in that there was a greater leaue readie to come thither vnder the Conde de Altemira, either in purpose to relieue the Groine, or to encampe themselves neere the place of our embarking, there to hinder the same ; for to that purpose had the marquesse of Seralba written to them both the first night of our landing, as the Commissarie taken then confessed, or at the least to stop our further entrance into the Countrey, (for during this time, there were many incursions made of three or foure hundred at a time, who burnt, spoiled, and brought in victuals plentifully) the Generall, I say, hearing of this armie, had in purpose the next day following to visite them, agaynst whom hee caried but nine Regiments : in the vanguard were the Regiment of Sir Roger Williams, Sir Edward Norris, and Colonell Sidney : in the Battaille, that of the Generall, of Colonell Lane, and Colonell Medkerk : and in the Rereward, Sir Henrie Norris, Colonell Huntley, and Colonell Brets Regiments ; leaving the other five Regiments with Generall Drake, for the guard of the Cloister and Arillerie . About ten of the clocke the next day, being the first of May, halfe a mile from the campe, we discouering the enemy, Sir Edward Norris, who commanded the vanguard in chiefe, appointed his Lieutenant Colonell Captaine Anthonie Wingfield to command the shot of the same, who diuided them into three troups ; the one he appointed to Captaine Middleton to be conducted in a way on the left hand : another to Captaine Erington to take the way on the right hand, and the body of them (which were Musquetiers) Captaine Wingfield tooke himselfe, keeping the direct way of the march. But the way taken by Captaine Middleton met a little before with the way held by Captaine Wingfield, so as he giuing the first charge vpon the enemy, was in the instant seconded by Captaine Wingfield, who beat them from place to place (they hauing very good places of defence, and crosse walles which they might haue held long) till they betooke them to their bridge, which is ouer a creeke comming out of the Sea, builded of stone vpon arches. On the foot of the further side whereof, lay the Campe of the enemy very strongly entrenched, who with our shot beaten to the further end of the bridge, Sir Edward Norris marching in the point of the pikes, without stay passed to the bridge, accompanied with Colonell Sidney, Captaine Hinder, Captaine Fulford, and diuers others, who found the way cleare ouer the same, but through an incredible volley of shot ; for that the shot of their army flanked vpon both sides of the bridge, the further end whereof was barricaded with barrels : but they who should haue guarded the same, seeing the proud appoach we made, forsooke the defence of the barricade, where Sir Edward entered, and charging the first defendant with his pike, with very earnestness in ouerthrusting, fell ; and was grievously hurt at the sword in the head, but was most honourably rescued by the Generall his brother, accompanied with Colonell Sidney, and some other gentlemen : Captaine Hinder also hauing his Calke shot off, had five wounds in the head and face at the sword : and Captaine Fulford was shot into the left arme at the same encounter : yet were they so thorowly seconded by the Generall, who thrust himselfe so neere to giue encouragement to the attempt (which was of wooderfull difficulty) as their bravest men that defended that place being ouerthrusten, their whole army fell presently into rout, of whom our men had the chase three miles in foure sundry wayes, which they betooke themselves vnto. There was taken the Standerd with the Kings armes, and bozne before the Generall. How many two thousand men (for of so many consisted our vanguard) might kill in pursuit of foure sundry parties, so many you may imagine fell before vs that day. And to make the number more great, our men hauing giuen ouer the execution, and returning to their standes, found many hidden in the Vineyards and hedges, which they dispatched. Also Colonell Medkerk was sent with his regiment three miles further to a Cloister, which he burnt and spoiled, wherein he found two hundred more, & put them to the sword. There were slaine in this fight on our side onely Captaine Cooper, and one priuate souldier ; Captaine Barton was also hurt vpon the bridge in the eye. But had you seene the strong baricades they had made on either side of the bridge, and how strongly they lay encamped thereabouts, you would haue thought it a rare resolution of ours to giue so braue a charge vpon an army so strongly lodged. After the furie of the execution, the Generall sent the vanguard one way, and the battell another, to burne and spoile ; so as you might haue seene the countrey more then three miles compasse on fire. There was found very good store of munition and victuals in the Campe, some plate and rich apparell, which the better sort left behinde, they were so hotly pursued. Our sailers also landed in an Island next adioyning to our ships, where they burnt and spoiled all they found. Thus we returned to the Groine, bying small comfort to the enemy within the same, who shot many times at vs as we marched out; but not once in our coming backe againe.

The next day was spent in shipping our artillery landed for the battery, and of the rest taken at the Groine, which had it bene such as might haue giuen vs any assurance of a better battery, or had there bene no other purpose of our iourney but that, I thinke the Generall would haue spent some more time in the siege of the place.

The two last nights, there were that undertooke to fire the higher towne in one place, where the houses were builded vpon the wall by the water side; but they within suspecting as much, made so good defence against vs, as they presented the same. In our departure there was fire put into euery house of the low towne, inso much as I may iustly say, there was not one house left standing in the base towne, or the cloister.

The next day, being the eight of May, we embarked our army without losse of a man, which (had we not beaten the enemy at Puente de Burgos) had bene impossible to haue done; for that without doubt they would haue attempted something against vs in our imbarking: as appeared by the report of the Commissary aforesayd, who confessed, that the first night of our landing the Marques of Seralba writ to the Conde de Altemira, the Conde de Andrada, and to Tercis de Sanctislo, to bying all the forces against vs that they could possible raise, thinking no way so good to assure that place, as to bying an army thither, where withall they might either besiege vs in their base towne; if we should get it, or to lie betwene vs and our place of imbarking, to fight with vs vpon the aduantage; for they had aboute 15000 souldiers vnder their commandements.

After we had put from thence, we had the winde so contrary, as we could not vnder nine dayes reconer the Burlings: in which passage on the thirtcenth day the Earle of Essex, and with him M. Walter Deuereux his brother (a Gentleman of woonderfull great hope) Sir Roger Williams Colonell generall of the footmen, Sir Philip Butler, who hath alwayes bene most inward with him, and Sir Edward Wingfield, came into the fleet. The Earle hauing put himselfe into the iourney against the opinion of the woyle, and as it seemed to the hazzard of his great fortune, though to the great auancement of his reputation, (for as the honourable cariage of himselfe towards all men doth make him highly esteemed at home; so did his exceeding forwardnesse in all seruices make him to be woondered at amongst vs) who, I say, put off in the same winde from Falmouth, that we left Plimmouth in, where he lay, because he would auoid the importunity of messengers that were dayly sent for his returne, and some other causes more secret to himselfe, not knowing (as it seemed) what place the Generals purposed to land in, had bene as farre as Cadiz in Andaluzia, and lay vp and downe about the South Cape, where he tooke some ships laden with cozne, and brought them vnto the fleet. Also in his returne from thence to meet with our fleet, he fell with the Islands of Bayon; and on that side of the riuer which Cannas standeth vpon, he, with Sir Roger Williams, and those Gentlemen that were with him went on shoze, with some men out of the ship he was in, whom the enemy, that held guard vpon that coast, would not abide, but fled vp into the countrey.

The 16 day we landed at Peniche in Portugall, vnder the shot of the castle, and aboute the waste in water, more then a mile from the towne, wherein many were in perill of drowning, by reason the winde was great, and the sea went high, which ouerthrew one boat, wherein five and twenty of Captaine Dolphins men perished. The enemy being five companies of Spaniards vnder the commandement of the Conde de Fuentes, sallied out of the towne against vs, and in our landing made their approach close by the water side. But the Earle of Essex with Sir Roger Williams, and his brother, hauing landed sufficient number to make two troupes, left one to holde the way by the water side, and led the other ouer the Sandhills; which the enemy seeing, drew theirs likewise further into the land; not, as we conjectured, to encounter vs, but indeed to make their speedy passage away: notwithstanding, they did it in such sort, as being charged by ours which were sent out by the Colonell generall vnder Captaine Jackson, they stood the same euin to the push of the pike: in which charge and at the push, Captaine Robert Piew was slaine. The enemy being fled further then we had reason to follow them, all our companies were drawn to the towne; which being vnfortified in any place, we found vn defended by any man against vs. And therefore the Generall caused the castle to be summoned that night; which being abandoned by him that commanded it, a Portugall named Antonio de Aurid, being possessed thercof, desired but to be assured that Don Antonio was landed, whereupon he would deliuer the same; which he honestly perfozmed. There was taken out of the castle some hundred shot and pikes, which Don Emanuel furnished his Portugals withall, and twenty barrells of powder: so as possessing both the towne and the castle, we rested there one day; wherein some Friers and other poore men came vnto their new king, promising in the name of their country next adioynning, that within two dayes he should haue a good supply of horse and foote for his assistance. That day we remained there, the Generals company of horses were shipped.

The Generals there fully resolved, that the Armie should march ouer land to Lisbon vnder the conduct of Generall Norris; and that Generall Drake should meete him in the riuer thereof with the Fleet; that there should be one Company of foote left in garde of the Castle, and fire in the ships: also that the sicke & hurt should remaine there with provisions for their cures. The Generall, to trie the event of the matter by expedition, the next day beganne to march in this sort: his owne Regiment, and the Regiment of Sir Roger Williams, Sir Henrie Norris, Colonel Lane, and Colonel Medkerk, in the vanguard: Generall Drake, Colonel Deuereux Sir Edward Norris, and Colonel Sidneis in the battell: Sir James Hales, Sir Edward Wingfield, Colonel Vimptons, Colonel Hunlries, and Colonel Brets in the arrearward. By that time our army was thus marshalled, Generall Drake, although hee were to passe by Sea, yet to make knowne the honourable desire he had of taking equall part of all fortunes with vs, stood vpon the ascent of an hill, by the which our battalions must of necessity march, and with a pleasing kindnesse tooke his leaue severally of the Commanders of euery regiment, wishing vs all most happy successe in our iourney ouer the land, with a constant promise that he would, if the iniury of the weather did not hinder him, meet vs in the riuer of Lisbon with our fleet. The want of cariages the first day was such, as they were enforced to cary their manition vpon mens backs, which was the next day remedied.

In this march Captaine Crispe the Prouost Marshall caused one who (contrary to the Proclamation published at our arriual in Portugall) had broken by an house for pillage, to be hanged, with the cause of his death vpon his breast, in the place where the act was committed: which good example prouidently giuen in the beginning of our march, caused the commandement to be more respectfully regarded all the iourney after, by them whom feare of punishment doeth onely holde within compasse. The campe lodged that night at Lorinha: the next day we had intelligence all the way, that the enemy had made head of horse and foot against vs at Torres Vedras, which we thought they would haue held: but comming thither the second day of our march, not two houres before our vanguard came in, they left the towne and the castle to the possession of Don Antonio.

There began the greatest want we had of victuals, especially of bread, vpon a commandement giuen from the Generall, that no man should spoile the countrey, or take any thing from any Portugall: which was more respectfully obserued, then I thinke would haue bene in our owne countrey, amongst our owne friends and kindred: but the countrey (contrary to promise) wholly neglected the provision of victuals for vs, whereby we were driuen for that time into a great scarcity. Which moued the Colonell generall to call all the Colonels together, and with them to aduise for some better course for our people: who thought it best, first to aduertise the king what necessity we were in, before we should of our selues alter the first institution of abstinence. The Colonell generall hauing acquainted the Generall herewith, with his very good allowance thereof, went to the king; who after some expostulations vled, tooke the more carefull order for our men, and after that our army was more plentifully relieved.

The third day we lodged our army in three sundry villages, the one battalion lying in Exarama de los Caualleros, another in Exarama do Obispo, and the third in San Sebastian.

Captaine Yorke who commanded the Generals horse company, in this march made triall of the valour of the horsemen of the enemy; who by one of his Corporals charged with eight horses chozow 40 of them, & himselfe chozow more then 200 with some forty horses: who would abide him no longer then they could make way from him.

The next day we marched to Lores, and had diuers intelligences that the enemy would cary vs there: for the Cardinall had made publique promise to them of Lisbon, that he would fight with vs in that place, which he might haue done aduantageously; for we had a bridge to passe ouer in the same place: but before our comming he dislodged, notwithstanding it appeared vnto vs that he had in purpose to encampe there; for we found the ground staked out where their trenches should haue bene made: and their horsemen with some few shot shewed themselves vpon an hill at our comming into that village; whom Sir Henry Norris (whose regiment had the point of the vanguard) thought to dray vnto some fight, and therefore marched without sound of drumme, and somewhat faster then ordinary, thereby to get neere them before he were discovered, for he was shadowed from them by an hill that was betweene him and them: but before he could dray his companies any thing neere, they retired.

General Drakes regiment that night, for the commodity of good lodging, dray themselves into a village, more then one English mile from thence, and neere the enemy: who not daring to do any any thing against vs in foure dayes before, tooke that occasion, and in the next morning fell downe vpon that regiment; crying, Viua el Rey Don Antonio, which was a generall salutation thorow all the Countrey as they came: whom our yong Souldiers (though it were vpon their guard, and before the watch were discharged) began to enertaine kindly, but hauing got within their guard, they fell to cut their throats: but the alarme being taken inwards, the officers of the two next Companies, whose Captaines (Captaine Sydnam and Captaine Young) were lately dead at the Groine, brought downe their colours and pikes vpon them in so resolute maner, as they presently draue them to retire with losse: they killed of ours at their first entrance fourteene, and hurt sixe or seuen.

The next day we lodged at Aluelana within thre miles of Lisbon, where many of our souldiers drinking in two places of standing waters by the way were poisoned, and thereon presently died. Some do thinke it came rather by eating of hony, which they found in the houses plentifully. But whether it were by water or by hony, the pooze men were poisoned.

That night the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams went out about eleuen of the clocke with 1000 men to lie in ambuscade neere the towne, and hauing layed the same very neere, sent some to giue the alarme vnto the enemy: which was well performed by them that had the charge thereof, but the enemy refused to issue after them, so as the Earle returned as soone as it was light without doing any thing, though he had in purpose, and was ready to haue giuen an honourable charge on them.

The 25 of May in the euening we came to the suburbs of Lisbon: at the very entrance whereof Sir Roger Williams calling Captaine Anthony Wingfield with him, tooke thirty shot or thereabouts, and first scowzed all the streets till they came very neere the towne; where they found none but olde folks and beggers, crying, Viua el Rey Don Antonio, and the houses shut vp: so that they had caried much of their wealth into the towne, and had fired some houses by the water side, full of roze and other provisions of victuals, least we should be benefited thereby, but yet left behinde them great riches in many houses.

The foure regiments that had the vanguard that day, which were Colonell Deucreux, Sir Edward Norris, Colonell Sidneys, and Generall Drakes (whom I name as they marched) the Colonell generall caused to holde guard in the neerest streets of the Suburbs: the battell and the arreward stood in armes all the night in the field neere to Alcantara. Before morning Captaine Wingfield, by direction from the Colonell generall Sir Roger Williams, held guard with Sir Edward Norris his regiment in thre places very neere the towne wall, and so held the same till the other regiments came in the morning. About midnight they within the towne burnt all their houses that stood vpon their wall either within or without, least we possessing them, might thereby greatly haue annoyed the towne.

The next morning Sir Roger Williams attempted (but not without perill) to take a Church called S. Antonio, which layned to the wall of the towne, and would haue bene a very euill neighbor to the towne: but the enemy hauing moze easie entry into it then we gained it before vs. The rest of that morning was spent in quartering the battell and arreward in the Suburbs called Bona Vista, and in placing Musketers in houses, to front their shot vpon the wall, who from the same scowzed the great streets very dangerously.

By this time our men being thorowly weary with our sixe dayes march, and the last nightes watch, were desirous of rest; whereof the enemy being aduertised, about one or two of the clocke sallied out of the towne, and made their approach in thre severall streets vpon vs, but chiefly in Colonell Breis quarter: who (as most of the army was) being at rest, with as much speed as he could, drew his men into armes, and made head against them so thorowly, as himselfe was slaine in the place, Captaine Carley shot thorow the thigh, of which hurt he died within foure dayes after, Captaine Carre slaine presently, and Captaine Caue hurt (but not mortally) who were all of his regiment.

This resistance made as well here, as in other quarters where Colonell Lane and Colonell Medkerk commanded, put them to a sudden foule retreat; insomuch, as the Earle of Essex had the chase of them euen to the gates of the high towne, wherein they left behinde them many of their best Commanders: their troupe of horsemen also came out, but being charged by Captaine Yorke, withdrew themselves againe. Many of them also left the streets, and betooke them to houses which they found open: so that the Sergeant maior Captaine Wilson slew in one house with his owne hands thre or foure, and caused them that were with him to kill many others. Their losse I can assure you did triple ours, as well in quality as in quantity.

During our march to this place, Generall Drake with the whole fleet was come into Cascais, and possessed the towne without any resistance: many of the inhabitants at their discovery of our naup, fleode with their baggage into the mountaines, and left the towne for any man that would possesse it, till Generall Drake sent unto them by a Portugall Pilot which he had on board, to offer them all peaceable kindnesse, so farre forth as they would accept of their King, and minister necessities to the army he had brought; which offer they joyfully embraced, and presently sent two chiefe men of their towne, to signifie their loyalty to Don Antonio, and their honest affections to our people. Whereupon the Generall landed his companies not farre from the Cloister called San Domingo, but not without perill of the shot of the castle, which being guarded with 65 Spaniards, held still against him.

As our fleet were casting ancre when they came first into that road, there was a small ship of Brasil that came from thence, which bate with them, and seemed by striking her sailes, as though she would also haue anchored: but taking her fittest occasion hoisted againe, and would haue passed by the riuer, but the Generall presently discerning her purpose, sent out a pinnesse or two after her, which forced her in such sort, as she ran herselfe vpon the Rocks: all the men escaped out of her, and the lading (being many chests of sugar) was made nothing woorth by the salt water. In his going thither also, he tooke ships of the port of Portugall, which were sent from thence, with fiftene other from Pedro Vermendes Xantes Sergeant maior of the same place, laden with men and victuals to Lisbon: the rest that escaped put into Seiuuel.

The next day it pleased Generall Norris to call all the Colonels together, and to aduise with them, whether it were moze expedient to tary there to attend the forces of the Portugall horse and foot, whereof the King had made promise, and to march some conuenient number to Cascais to fetch our artillery and munition, which was all at our ships, sauing that which for the necessity of the seruice was brought along with vs: whereunto, some caried away with the vaine hope of Don Antonio, that most part of the towne stood for vs, held it best to make our abode there, and to send some 3000 for our artillery: promising to themselves, that the enemy being wel beaten the day before, would make no moze sallies: some others (whose vnbelieve was very strong of any hope from the Portugall) perswaded rather to march wholly away, then to be any longer carried away with the opinion of things, whereof there was so little appearance. The Generall not willing to leaue any occasion of blotte to be layed vpon him for his speedy going from thence, nor to lose any moze time by attending the hopes of Don Antonio; tolde them, that though the expedition of Portugall were not the onely purpose of their iourney, but an aduenture therein (which if it succeeded prosperously, might make them sufficiently rich, and woonderfull honourable) and that they had done so much already in triall thereof, as what end soeuer happened, could nothing impair their credits: yet in regard of the Kings last promise, that he should haue that night 3000 men armed of his owne Countrey, he would not for that night dislodge. And if they came, thereby to make him so strong, that he might send the like number for his munition, he would resolute to trie his fortune for the towne. But if they came not, he found it not conuenient to diuide his forces, by sending any to Cascais, and keeping a remainder behinde, since he saw them the day before so boldly sally vpon his whole army, and knew that they were stronger of Souldiours armed within the towne, then he was without: and that before our returne could be from Cascais, they expected moze supplies from all places, of Souldiours: for the Duke of Bragança, and Don Francisco de Toledo were looked for with great reliefe. Whereupon his conclusion was, that if the 3000 promised came not that night, to march wholly away the next morning.

It may be here demanded, why a matter of so great moment should be so slenderly regarded, as that the Generall should march with such an army against such an enemy, before he knew either the fulnesse of his owne strength, or certaine meanes how he should abide the place when he should come to it. Wherein I pray you remember the Decrees made in the Councell at Peniche, and confirmed by publique protestation the first day of our march, that our naup should meet vs in the riuer of Lisbon, in the which was the store of all our provisions, and so the meane of our tariance in that place, which came not, though we continued till we had no munition left to entertaine a very small fight. We are also to consider, that the King of Portugall (whether he carried away with imagination by the auertisements he receiued from the Portugals, or willing by any promise to bring such an army into his Countrey, thereby to put his fortune once more in triall) assured the Generall, that vpon his first landing, there would be a revolt of his subjects: whereof there was some hope giuen at our first entry to Peniche, by the maner of the prebiding of that towne and fort, which made the Generall thinke it most conuenient speedily to march to the principall place, thereby to giue courage to the rest of the Countrey. The Friers also and the poore people that came vnto him promised, that within two dayes the gentlemen and others of the Countrey would come plentifully in: within which two dayes came many more Priests, and some very few gentlemen on horsebacke; but not till we came to Torres Vedras: where they that noted the course of things how they passed, might somewhat discouer the weaknesse of that people. There they tooke two dayes more; and at the end thereof referred him till our comming to Lisbon, with assurance, that so soone as our army should be scene there, all the inhabitants would be for the King and fall vpon the Spaniards.

After two nights tarrance at Lisbon, the King, as you haue heard, promised a supply of 3000 foot, and some horse: but all his appointinents being expired, euen to the last of a night, all his horse could not make a cozier of 40, nor his foot furnish two ensignes fully, although they caried three or foure colours: and these were altogether such as thought to enrich themselves by the ruine of their neighbours: for they committed more disorders in euery place where we came by spoile, then any of our owne.

The Generall, as you see, hauing done more then before his comming out of England was required by the King, and giuen credit to his many promises, euen to the breach of the last, he desired not to perswade him to stay yet nine dayes longer: in which time he might haue engaged himselfe further, then with any honour he could come out of againe, by attempting a towne fortified, wherein were more men armed against vs, then we had to oppugne them withall, our artillery and munition being fiftene miles from vs, and our men then declining: for there was the first shew of any great sickenesse amongst them. Whereby it seemeth, that either his petyty did much abuse him in perswading him to hopes, whereof after two or three dayes he saw no semblance: or he like a silly louer, who promisseth himselfe fauor by importuning a coy mistresse, thought by our long being before his towne, that in the end taking pity on him, they would let him in.

What end the Frriers had by following him with such deuotion, I know not, but sure I am, the Laitie did respite their homage till they might see which way the victory would sway; fearing to shew themselves apparantly vnto him, least the Spaniard should after our departure (if we preailed not) call them to account: yet sent they vnder hand messages to him of obedience, thereby to saue their owne, if he became King; but indeed very well contented to see the Spaniards and vs try by blowes, who should carpy away the crowne. For they be of so base a mould, as they can very well subiect themselves to any gouernment, where they may liue free from blowes, and haue liberty to become rich; being loth to endure hazzard either of life or goods. For durst they haue put on any minds thorowly to reuolt, they had three woonderfull good occasions offered them during our being there.

Themselves did in generall confesse, that there were not aboue 5000 Spaniards in that part of the Countrey, of which number the halfe were out of the towne till the last day of our march: during which time, how easily they might haue preailed against the rest, any man may conceiue. But vpon our approach they tooke them all in, and combined themselves in generall to the Cardinal.

The next day after our comming thither, when the sally was made vpon vs by their most resolute Spaniards, how easily might they haue kept them out, or haue giuen vs the gate which was held for their retreat, if they had had any thought thereof?

And two dayes after our comming to Cascais, when 6000 Spaniards and Portugals came against vs as farre as S. Iulians by land, as you shal presently heare (all which time I thinke there were not many Spaniards left in the towne) they had a more fit occasion to shew their deuotion to the King, then any could be offered by our tarrying there. And they could not doubt, that if they had shut them out, but that we would haue fought with them vpon that aduantage, hauing fought them in Galicia vpon disadvantage to beat them: and hauing taken so much paines to seek them at their owne houses, whereof we gaue sufficient testimony in the same accident. But I thinke the feare of the Spaniard had taken so deepe impression within them, as they durst not attempt any thing against them vpon any hazzard.

For, what ciuill countrey hath euer suffered themselves to be conquered by so few men as they were; to be deprived of their naturall King, and to be tyrannized ouer thus long, but they? And what countrey, lining in slavery vnder a stranger whom they naturally hate, hauing an army in the field to fight for them and their liberty, would lie still with the poke vpon their necks, attending if any strangers would vnburthen them, without so much as rousing themselves vnder it, but they? They will promise much in speeches, for they be great talkers, whom the Generall had no reason to distrust without triall, and therefore marched on into their countrey: but they performed little in action, whereof we could haue had no prooffe without this thorow triall. Wherein he hath discouered their weaknesse, and honorably performed more then could be in reason expected of him: which had he not done, would not these maligners, who seek occasions of slander, haue reported him to be suspicious of a people, of whose infidelity he had no testimony: and so be fearefull without cause, if he had refused to giue credit to their promises without any aduenture: Let no fruitious questionist therefore further enquire why he marched so many dayes to Lisbon, and taried there so small a while.

The next morning, seeing no performance of promise kept, he gaue order for our marching a way; himselfe, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the stand that was made in the high street, till the whole army was drawn into the field, and so marched out of the towne, appointing Captaine Richard Wingfield, and Captaine Anthony Wingfield in the arrearward of them with the shot; thinking that the enemy (as it was most likely) would haue issued out vpon our rising; but they were otherwise aduised. When we were come into the field, euery battalion fell into that order which by course appertained vnto them, and so marched that night vnto Cascais. Had we marched thorow his Countrey as enemies, our Souldiours had bene well supplied in all their wants: but had we made enemies of the Suburbs of Lisbon, we had bene the richest army that euer went out of England: for besides the particular wealth of euery house, there were many Warehouses by the water side full of all sorts of rich marchandizes.

In our march that day the gallies which had somewhat, but not much, annoyed vs at Lisbon, (for that our way lay along the riuer) attended vs till we were past S. Iulians, bestowing many shot amongst vs, but did no harme at all, saving that they strooke off a gentlemans leg, & killed the Sergeant majors mose under him. The hopitmen also followed vs as farre off, and cut off as many sicke men as were not able to holde in march, nor we had carriage for.

After we had bene two dayes at Cascais, we had intelligence by a Frier, that the enemy was marching strongly towards vs, and then came as farre as S. Iulian: which newes was so welcome to the Earle of Essex and the Generalls, as they offered euery one of them to giue the messenger an hundred crownes if they found them in the place; for the Generall desiring nothing more then to fight with them in field roome, dispatched that night a messenger with a trumpet, by whom he wrot a cartell to the Generall of their army, wherein he gaue them the lie, in that it was by them reported that we dislodged from Lisbon in disorder and feare of them (which indeed was most false) for that it was five of the clocke in the morning before we fell into armes, and then went in such sort, as they had no courage to follow out vpon vs. Also he challenged him therein, to meet him the next morning with his whole army, if he durst attend his comming, and there to try out the iustnesse of their quarrel by battell: by whom also the Earle of Essex (who preferring the honor of the cause, which was his countreys, before his owne safety) sent a particular cartel, offering himselfe against any of theirs, if they had any of his quality; or if they would not admit of that; five, eight, or tenne, or as many as they would appoint, should meet so many of theirs in the head of our battell to trie their fortunes with them; and that they should haue assurance of their returne and honourable intreaty.

The Generall accordingly made all his army ready by three of the clocke in the morning and marched euen to the place where they had encamped, but they were dislodged in the night in great disorder, being taken with a sudden feare that we had bene come vpon them, as the Generall was the next day certainly informed: so as the Trumpet followed them to Lisbon, but could not get other answer to either of his letters, but threatening to be hanged, for daring to bring such a message. Howbeit the Generall had caused to be written vpon the backside of their passport, that if they did offer any violence vnto the messengers, he would hang the best prisoners he had of theirs: which made them to aduise better of the matter, and to returne them home; but without answer.

After our army came to Cascais, and the rastle summoned, the Castellan thereof granted, that vpon five or six shot of the canon he would deliuer the same, but not without sight thereof. The Generall thinking that his distresse within had bene such for want of men or victuals as he could not holde it many dayes, because he saw it otherwise defensible enough, determined rather to make him yeeld to that necessity, then to bring the cannon, and therefore onely set a guard vpon the same, least any supply of those things which he wanted should be brought vnto them. But he still standing vpon those conditions, the Generall about two dayes before he determined to goe to Sea, brought three or foure pierces of battery against it: vpon the first fire whereof he surrendered, and compounded to go away with his baggage and armes: he had one canon, two culuerings, one bassilike, and three or foure other field pierces, threescore and five Souldiours, very good store of munition, and victualles enough in the Castle; inasmuch as he might haue held the same longer then the Generall had in purpose to tarry there. One company of footmen was put into the guard thereof, till the artillery was taken out, and our army embarked; which which without hauing that fort, we could not without great perill haue done. When we were ready to set saile (one halfe of the fort being by order from the Generall blowne by by mine) the company was drawne away.

During the time we lay in the road, our fleet began the second of Iune, and so continued sixe dayes after to fetch in some hulks to the number of threescore, of Dansk, Sierin, Rostock, Lubbeck & Hamburg, laden with Spanish goods, and as it seemed for the kings prouision, and going for Lisbon: their pzinicall lading was Cozne, Wasse, Cables, Copper, and Ware: amongst which were some of great burthen woonderful well builded for sailing, which had no great lading in them, and therefore it was thought that they were brought for the kings prouision, to reinforce his decayed navy: whereof there was the greater likelyhood, in that the owner of the greatest of them which caried two misies, was knowne to be very inward with the Cardinall, who rather then he would be taken with his ships, committed himselfe vnto his small boat, wherein he recovered S. Sebastians: into the which our men, that befoze were in flieboats, were shipped, and the flieboats sent home with an offer of cozne, to the value of their hire. But the winde being good for them for Rochel, they chose rather to lose their cozne then the winde, and so departed. The Generall also sent his hozes with them, and from thence shipped them into England.

The third of Iune, Colonell Deuereux and Colonell Sidney, being both very sicke, departed for England, who in the whole iourney had shewed themselues very forward to all seruices, and in their departure very unwilling to leaue vs: that day we imbarked all our army, but lay in the road vntill the eight thereof.

The first day the Earle of Essex, vpon receit of letters from her Maiesty, by them that brought in the victuals, presently departed towards England, with whom Sir Roger Williams was very desirous to go, but found the Generals very unwilling he should do so, in that he bare the next place vnto them, and if they should miscarry, was to command the army. And the same day there came vnto vs two small barks that brought tidings of some other shippes come out of England with victuals, which were passed vpwards to the Cape: for meeting with whom, the second day after we set saile for that place, in purpose after our meeting with them to go with the Isles of Agores, the second day, which was the ninth, we met with them comming backe againe towards vs, whose prouision little answered our expectation. Notwithstanding we resolved to continue our course for the Islands.

About this time was the Marchant Royall, with three or foure other ships, sent to Peniche, to fetch away the companies that were left there; but Captaine Barton hauing receiued letters from the Generals that were sent ouerland, was departed befoze, not being able by reason of the enemies speedy marching thither, either to bying away the artillery, or all his men, according to the direction those letters gaue him; for he was no sooner gone, then the enemy possessed the towne and castle, and shor at our ships as they came into the road.

At this time also was the Ambassadoz from the Emperoz of Marocco, called Reys Hamet Bencafamp; returned, and with him M. Ciprian, a Gentleman of good place and desert, was sent from Don Antonio, and Captaine Ousley from the Generals to the Emperoz.

The next morning the nine gallies which were sent not fise dayes befoze out of Andalusia for the strengthening of the riuer of Lisbon (which being ioyned with the other twelue that were there befoze, though we lay hard by them at S. Iulians, durst neuer make any attempt against vs) vpon our departure from thence were returning home, and in the morning being a very dead calme, in the dawning thereof, fell in the winde of our fleet, in the vtermoost part whereof they assailed one stragling barge of Plimmouth, of the which Captaine Cauerley being Captaine of the land company, with his Lieutenant, the Master, and some of the Mariners abandoned the ship, and betooke them to the ship-boats, whereof one, in which the Master and the Captaine were, was ouerrunne with the gallies, and they drowned. There were also two hulks stragled farre from the strength of the other ships, which were so calmed, as neither they could get to vs, nor we to them, though all the great shippes towed with their boats to haue relieved them, but could not be recovered; in one of which was Captaine Minshaw with his company, who fought with them to the last, yea after his ship was on fire, which whether it was fired by himselfe or by them we could not wel discern, but might easily iudge by his long and good fight, that the enemy could not but sustaine much losse: who setting also vpon one other hulke wherein was but a Lieutenant, and he very sicke, were by the valour of the Lieutenant put off, although they had first beaten her with their artillery, and attempted to boord her. And seeing also one other hulke a league off, a sterne off vs, they made towards her; but finding that she made ready to fight with them, they durst not further attempt her: whereby it seemed, their losse being great in the other fights, they were loth to proceed any further.

From that day till the 19 of June, our direction from the Generall was, that if the wind were Northerly, we should plie for the Açores; but if Southerly, for the Isles of Bayon. We lay with contrary windes about that place and the Roche, till the Southerly winde preuailing carried vs to Bayon: part of our ships to the number of 25, in a great winde which was two dayes before, hauing lost the Admirals and fleet; according to their direction, fell in the morning of that day with Bayon, among whom was Sir Henry Norris in the Ayde; who had in purpose (if the Admirals had not come in) with some 500 men out of them all to haue landed, and attempted the taking of Vigo. The rest of the fleet held with Generall Drake, who though he were two dayes before put upon those Islands, cast off againe to sea for the Açores: but remembering how vnproouided he was for that Iourney, and seeing that he had lost company of his great ships, returned for Bayon, and came in there that night in the euening, where he passed by the riuer more then a mile about Vigo.

The next morning we landed as many as were able to fight, which were not in the whole about 2000 men, (for in the 17 dayes we continued on board we had cast many of our men ouerboard) with which number the Colonell generall marched to the towne of Vigo, neere the which when he approached, he sent Captaine Anthony Wingfield with a troupe of shot to enter one side of the same, who found upon euery streets end a strong barricade, but altogether abandoned; for hauing entered the towne, he found but one man therein, but might see them making way before him to Bayon. On the other side of the towne entered Generall Drake with Captaine Richard Wingfield, whose approach on that side (I thinke) made them leaue the places they had so artificially made for defence: there were also certaine shippes sent with the Vice-admirall to lie close before the towne, to beat vpon the same with their artillery.

In the afternoone were sent 300 vnder the conduct of Captaine Petuin and Captaine Henry Poure, to burne another village betwixt that and Bayon, called Boris, and as much of the countrey as the day would giue them leaue to do; which was a very pleasant rich valley: but they burne it all, houses and corne, as did others on the other side of the towne, both that and the next day, so as the countrey was spoiled seuen or eight miles in length. There was found great store of wine in the towne, but not any thing els: for the other dayes warning of the shippes that came first in, gaue them a respite to carpy all away.

The next morning by breake of the day the Colonell generall (who in the absence of the Generals that were on board their ships, commanded that night on shore) caused all our companies to be drawn out of the towne, and sent in two troups to put fire in euery house of the same: which done, we imbarked againe.

This day there were certaine Hariners which (without any direction) put themselves on shore, on the contrary side of the riuer from vs for pillage; who were beaten by the enemy from their boats, and punished by the Generals for their offer, in going without allowance.

The reasons why we attempted nothing against Bayon were before shewed to be want of artillery, and may now be alledged to be the small number of our men: who should haue gone against so strong a place, manned with very good souldiers, as was shewed by Iuan de Vera taken at the Groine, who confessed that there were five hundred olde Souldiers in garrison there of Flanders, and the Tercios of Naples, lately also returned out of the Iourney of England,

leading of

- Capitan Puebla.
- Christofero Vasques de Viralka a souldier of Flanders.
- Don Pedro Camascho, del tercio de Napoles.
- Don Francisco de Cespedes.
- Cap. Iuán de Solo, del tercio de Naples.
- Don Diego de Cassaua.
- Cap. Sauban.

Also he sayth there be 18 picces of brasse, and foure of yron, lately layd vpon the wallles of the towne, besides them that were there before.

The same day the Generals seeing what weak estate our army was drawn into by sicknesse, determined to man and victuall twenty of the best ships for the Islands of Açores with Generall Drake, to see if he could meet with the Indian fleet, and Generall Norris to returne home with the rest: And for the shifting of men and victualles accordingly, purposed the next morning to fall downe to the Islands of Bayon againe, and to remaine there that day. But Generall Drake, according to their apointment, being vnder saile neuer strooke at the Islands, but put straight to sea; whom all the fleet followed sauing three and thirty, which being in the riuer further then he, and at the entrance out of the same, finding the winde and tide too hard against them, were enforced to cast ancre there for that night; amongst whom, by good fortune, was the Foresight, and and in her sir Edward Norris. And the night following, Generall Norris being driven from the rest of the fleet by a great storme, (for all that day was the greatest storme we had all the time we were out) came againe into the Islands, but not without great perill, he being forced to trust to a Spanishe fisher-man (who was taken two dayes before at sea) to bring him in.

The next morning he called a council of as many as he found there, holding the purpose he had concluded with sir Francis Drake the day before, and directed all their courses for England, tarrying there all that day to water and helpe such with victuall, as were left in wonderfull distresse by having the victualls that came last, caried away the day before to sea.

The next day he set saile, and the 10 day after, which was the 2 of July came into Plimmouth, where he found sir Francis Drake and all the Queens ships, with many of the others, but not all: for the fleet was dispersed into other harbours, some led by a desire of returning to whence they came, and some being possessed of the hulks sought other Ports from their Generals eie, where they might make their private commoditie of them, as they have done to their great advantage.

Their returne to Plimmouth.

Presently upon their arrival there, the Generals dissolved all the armie saving 8 companies which are yet held together, giving every souldier five shillings in money, and the armes hee bare to make moncy of, which was more then could by any means be due unto them: for they were not in service three moneths, in which time they had their victualls, which no man will value at lesse then halfe their pay, for such is the allowance in her majesties ships to her mariners, so as there remained but 10 shillings a moneth more to be paid, for which there was not any private man but had apparel and furniture to his owne use, so as every common souldier discharged, received more in money, victualls, apparell and furniture, then his pay did amount unto.

Notwithstanding, there be even in the same place where those things have passed, that either do not or will not conceive the souldiers estate, by comparing their pouttie and the woynesse of the time together, but lay some iniuries upon the Generals and the action. Where, and by the way, but especially here in London, I find there have bene some false prophets gone before us, telling strange tales, for as our countrey doeth bring forth many gallant men, who desirous of honour doe put themselves into the actions thereof, so doeth it many more dull spirited, who though their thoughts reach not so high as others, yet doe they listen how other mens acts doe passe, and either beleiving what any man will report unto them, are willingly caried away into errors, or tied to some great mans faith, become secretaries against a noted truth. The one sort of these doe take their opinions from the high way side, or at the furthest goe no further then Pauls to enquire what hath bene done in this voyage: where, if they meet with any, whose capacitie before their going out could not make them lye, nor their valour maintaine their reputation, and who went onely for spoile, complaining on the hardnesse and misery thereof, they thinke they are bound to give credite to these honest men who were parties therein, and in very charitie become of their opinions. The others to make good the faction they are entred into, if they see any of those malecontents (as every journey yeldeth some) doe ruine unto them like tempting spirits to confirme them in their humour, with assurance that they forelaw before our going out what would become thereof.

We ye not therefore too credulous in beleiving every report: for you see there have bene many more beholders of these things that have passed, then actors in the same; who by their experience, not having the knowledge of the ordinarie wants of the warre, have thought, that to lie hard, not to have their meat well dyessed, to drinke sometimes water, to watch much, or to see men die and be slaine, was a miserable thing; and not having so given their mindes to the service, as they are any thing instructed thereby, doe for want of better matter discourse ordinarily of these things: whereas the journey (if they had with that judgement scene into it, which their places required) hath given them far more honorable purpose and argument of discourse.

These mens discontentments and millikings before our comming home have made mee labour thus much to instruct you in the certaintie of every thing, because I would not willingly have you miscaried in the judgements of them, wherein you shall give me leave somewhat to dilate upon a question, which I onely touched in the beginning of my letter, namely, whether it bee more expedient for our estate to maintain an offensive war against the king of Spaine in the Low countries, or as in this journey, to offend him in his neerer territories, seeing the grounds of arguing thereof are taken from the experience which the actions of this journey have given us.

A worthy question dilated.

There is no good subject that wil make questio, whether it be behoofeful for us to hold friendship with these neighbours of ours or no, as well in respect of the infinite proportion of their shipping, which must stand either with us or against us; as of the commoditie of their harbours, especially that of Fishing, by the fauour whereof our Maie may continually keepe the Narrow seas, and which would harbour a greater fleet against us, then the Spaniard shall need to annoy us withall, who being now distressed by our common enemy, I thinke it most expedient for our saferie to defend them, and if it may be, to giue them a reeintrie into that they haue of late yeeres lost vnto him. The one without doubt her maiestie may do without difficultie, and in so honorable sort as he shal neuer be able to dispossesse her of them of any the townes they now hold. But if any man thinke that the Spaniard may be expelled from thence more speedily or conveniently by keeping an armie there, then by sending one against him into his owne countrey: let him forseeke of how many men and continuall supplies that armie must consist, and what intollerable expenses it requirerth. And let him thinke by the example of the duke of Alua, when the prince of Orange had his great armie agaynst him; and of Don Iuan, when the States had their mightie assembly against him, how this wise enemy, with whom we are to deale, may but by prolonging to fight with vs, leaue vs occasions enought for our armie within few moneths to mutine and bzeake; or by keeping him in his townes leaue vs a spoiled field: where though our prouision may bee such of our owne as we shalue not, yet is our weaknesse in any strange countrey such, as with sickness and miserie we shal be dissolved. And let him not forget what a continual burthen we hereby lay vpon vs, in that to repossesse those countreys which haue bene lately lost, will be a warre of longer continuance then we shal be able to endure.

In the very action whereof, what should hinder the king of Spaine to bring his forces home vnto vs? For it is certaine he hath long since set downe in counsell, that there is no way for him wholy to recouer those Low countries, but by bringing the warre vpon England it selfe, which hath alwayes assisted them against him: and that being determined, and whereunto he hath bene vehemently urged by the last yeeres losse he sustained vpon our coasts, and the great dishonour this iourney hath laid vpon him; no doubt if we shal giue him respite to doe it, but he will mightily aduance his purpose, for he is richly able therunto, and wonderfull desirous of reuenge.

To encounter wherewith, I with euen in true and honest zeale to my Countrey, that we were all perswaded that there is no such assured meanes for the saferie of our estate, as to busie him with a well furnished armie in Spaine, which hath so many goodly Bayes open, as we may land without impeachment as many men as shal be needfull for such an inuasion. And hauing an armie of 20000 royally furnished there, we shal not need to take much care for their payment: for shal not Lisbon be thought able to make so few men rich, when the Suburbs thereof were found so abounding in riches, as had we made enemy of them, they had largely enriched vs all? Which with what small losse it may be won, is not here to the w; but why it was not won by vs, I haue here in shewed you. Or is not the spoyle of Siuil sufficient to pay more then shal bee needfull to be sent against it, whose defence (as that of Lisbon) is onely force of men, of whom how many may for the present be raised, is not to be esteemed, because wee haue discovered what kind of men they be, euen such as will neuer abide ours in field, nor dare withstand any resolute attempt of ours agaynst them: for during the time we were in many places of their countrey, they cannot say that euer they made 20 of our men turne their faces from them. And be there not many other places of lesse difficultie to spoyl, able to satisfie our forces?

But admit, that if vpon this alarme that we haue giuen him, he tendering his naturall and needfull soile before his further remoued off governments, do draw his forces of old souldiers out of the Low countreys for his owne defence, is not the victorie then won by drawing and holding them from thence, for the which we should haue kept an armie there at a charge by many partes greater then this, and not stirred them?

Admit further our armie be impeached from landing there, yet by keeping the Sea, and possessing his principall roades, are we not in possibilitie to meet with his Indian marchants, and very like to prevent him of his prouisions comming out of the East countreys; without the which, neither the subject of Lisbon is long able to liue, nor the king able to maintaine his Raue? For though the countrey of Portugall doe some yeeres find themselves coyne, yet are they neuer able to victuall the least part of that Citie. And albeit the king of Spaine be the richest prince in Christendome, yet can he neither draw cables, heve masses, nor make powder out of his metcals, but is to be supplied of them all from thence. Of whom (some will hold opinion) it is no reason to make prize, because they bee not our enemies: and that our disagreement with them will impeach the trade of our marchants, and so impouerish our countrey. Of whose mind I can hardly be drawn to be: For if my enemy fighting with me doe bzeake his sword, so as I thereby haue the aduantage against him; what shall I thinke of him that putteth a new sword into his hand to kill me withall? And may it not bee thought more fitting for vs in these times to loose our trades of Cloth, then by suffering these mischiefes, to put in hazard whether we shal haue a countrey left to make cloth in or no? And yet though neither Hamburgh, Embden, nor Stode doe receiue our cloth, the necessary vse thereof in all places is such, as they will find means to take it from vs with our sufficient commoditie.

And admit (which were impossible) that we dammitie him neither at sea nor land (for unless it be with a much more mightie armie then ours, he shall neuer be able to withstand vs) yet shall we by holding him at his home, free our selues from the warre at our owne wals: the benefit whereof let them consider that best can iudge, and haue obserued the difference of innading, and being innaded; the one giuing courage to the souldier, in that it doeth see before him commoditie and reputation; the other a fearefull terror to the countrey-man, who if by chance he play the man, yet is he neuer the richer: and who knowing many holes to hide himselfe in, will trie them all before he put his life in perill by fighting: whereas the Innader casteth vp his account before hee goeth out, and being abroad must fight to make himselfe way, as not knowing what place of strength to trust vnto. I will not say what I obserued in our countrey-men when the enemy offered to assaile vs here: but I wish that all England knew what terror we gaue to the same people that frighted vs, by visiting them at their owne houses.

Were not Alexanders fortunes great against the mightie Darius, onely in that his Macedonians thirsted after the wealth of Persia, and were bound to fight it out to the last man, because the last man knew no safer way to saue himselfe then by fighting? Whereas the Persians either trusting to continue still masters of their wealth by yielding to the Innader, began to practise against their owne king: or hauing more inward hopes, did hide themselves euen to the last, to see what course the Conquerour would take in his Conquest. And did not the aduise of Scipio, though mightily impugned at the first, proue very sound and honourable to his countrey? Who seeing the Romans wonderfully amazed at the neerenesse of their enemies forces, and the losses they daily sustained by them, gaue counsell rather by way of diuersion to cary an army into Afrike, and there to assaile, then by a defensue warre at home to remaine subiect to the common spoiles of an assailing enemy. Which being put in execution drew the enemy from the gates of Rome, and Scipio returned home with triumph: albeit his beginnings at the first were not so fortunate against them, as ours haue bene in this final time against the Spaniard. The good successe whereof may encourage vs to take armes resolutely against him. And I beseech God it may stirre vp all men that are particularly interested therein, to bethinke themselves how small a matter will assure them of their safetie, by holding the Spaniard at a Bate, so farre of: whereas, if we giue him leaue quietly to hatch and bring forth his preparations, it will be with danger to vs all.

We takeeth not armes against vs by any pretence of title to the crowne of this realme, nor led altogether with an ambitious desire to command our countrey, but with hatred towards our whole Nation and religion. Her maiesties Scepter is already giuen by Bull to another, the honours of our Nobilitie are bestowed for rewards vpon his attendants, our Clergie, our Gentlemen, our Lawyers, yea all men of what condition soeuer are offered for spoyle vnto the common souldier. Let euery man therefore, in defence of the libertie and plentie he hath of long enjoyed, offer a voluntarie contribution of the smallest part of their stoze for the assurance of the rest. It were not much for euery Iustice of peace, who by his black coat protecteth the property and most seruicable men at euery mustre from the warres, to contribute the charge that one of these idle men doe put him to for one yeere: nor for the Lawyer, who riseth by the dissensions of his neighbours, to take but one yeeres gifts (which they call Fees) out of his coffers. What would it hinder euery officer of the Exchequer, and other of her Maiesties courts, who without checke doe suddenly grow to great wealth, honestly to bring forth the mysticall commoditie of one yeeres profits? Or the Clergie, who looke precisely for the Tenth of euery mans increase, simply to bring forth the Tenth of one yeeres gathering, and in thankfulness to her Maiestie, (who hath continued for all our safeties a most chargeable warre both at land & sea) bestow the same for her honor & their owne assurance, vpon an army which may make this bloody enemy so co know himselfe and her Maiesties power, as he shall bethinke him what it is to moue a stirring people? Who, though they haue receiued some small checke by the sickness of this last iourney, peraduenture I not, but if it were made known, that the like voyage were to bee supported by a generalitie, (that might and would beare the charge of a more ample provision) but there would of all sorts most willingly put themselves into the same: some caried with an honorable desire to be in action, and some in loue of such would affectionately follow their fortunes; some in thirsting to reuenge the death and hurts of their brethren, kintred, and friends: and some in hope of the plentifull spoiles to be found in these countreys, hauing bene there already and returned poore, would desire to goe againe, with an expectation to make amends for the last: and all, in hatred of that cowardly proud Nation, and in contemplation of the true honour of our owne, would with courage take armes to hazard their liues agaynst them, whom euery good Englishman is in nature bound to hate as an implacable enemy to England, thirsting after our blood, and labouring to ruine our land, with hope to bring vs under the yoke of perpetuall slaerie, Against them is true honour to be gotten, for that we shall no sooner set foot in their land, but that every step we tread will yeeld vs new occasion of action, which I wish the gallanterie of our Countrey rather to regard then to follow those lost unprofitable pleasures wherein they now consume their time and patrimonie. And in two or three townes of Spaine is the welth of all Europe gathered together, which are the Magalins of the fruits and profits of the East and West Indies, wherunto I wish our young able men, who, (against the libertie they are borne vnto) terme themselves Seruing men, rather to bend their desires and affections, then to attend their double liuerie and 40 shillings by the yeere wages, and the reuerſion of the old Copp-hoib, for carrying a ditty to their masters table. But let me here reprehend my selfe and craue pardon for entring into a matter of such state and consequence, the care whereof is already laid vpon a most graue and honorable counsell, who wil in their wisdoms foresee the dangers that may be threatned agaynst vs. And why do I labour to disquiet the securitie of these happy gentlemen, & the trade of those honest seruing men, by perswading them to the warres when I see the profession thereof so slenderly esteemed? For though all our hope of peace be frustrate, and our quarrels determinable by the sword: though our enemy hath by his owne forces and his pensionaries industry, confined the vnitied Portugaunces into a narrow vounne, & almost disunited the same: if he be now in a good way to harbor himselfe in the principall hauens of France, from whence he may front vs at pleasure: yea though we are to hope for nothing but a bloodie warre, noz can trust to any helpe but Armes; yet how far the common sort are from reuerencing or regarding any persons of conduction, was too apparant in the returne of this our iourney, wherein the base and common souldier hath bene tollerated to speake against the Capitaine, and the souldier and Capraime against the Generals, and wherein mechanicaill and men of base condicion doe dare to censure the doings of them, of whose acts they be not woorthie to talke.

The ancient graue degree of the Prelacie is byheld, though Martin raise neuer so much, & the Lawyer is after the old maner woorthipped, whosoeuer much against him. But the ancient English honour is taken from our men of war, & their profession in disgrace, though neuer so necessary. Either we commit idolatry to Neptune, and will put him alone still to fight for vs as he did the last yeere, or we be enchanted with some diuinish opinions, that trauell nothing more then to diminish the reputation of them, vpon whose shoulders the burden of our defence against the enemy must lie when occasion shall be offered. For whensoever he shall set foote vpon our land, it is neither the preaching of the Clergie that can turne him out againe, noz the pleading of any Lawyers that can remooue him out of possession: no, then they will honour them whom now they thinke not on, and then must those men stand betwene them and their perils, who are now thought vnwoorthie of any estimation.

May the burning of one towne (which cost the king then being six times as much as this hath done her maiestie, wherein were lost seuen times as many men as in any one seruice of this iourney, and taried not the tenth part of our time in the enemies Countrey) be by our elders so highly reputed and sounded out by the hystorie of the Realme; and can our voyage be so meanly esteemed, wherein we burned both townes and Countreys without the losse of forie men in any such attempt?

Did our kings in former times reward some with the greatest titles of honour for ouerthrowing a number of pooze Scots, who, after one battell lost, were neuer able to reenfonce themselves against him; and shall they in this time who haue ouerthrowen our mightie enemy in battell, and taken his roiall Standerd in the field, besieged the marquesse of Saralba 15 dayes together, that should haue bene the Generall of the Armie against vs, brought away so much of his artillarie (as I haue befoze declared) be vnwoorthily esteemed of?

Is it possible that some in some times should receiue their reward for looking vpon an enemy; and ours in this time not receiue so much as thanks for hauing beaten an enemy at handie strokes?

But it is true that no man shall bee a prophet in his Countrey: and for my owne part I will lay aside my Armes till that profession shal haue more reputation, and liue with my friends in the countrey, attending either some more fortunate time to vse them, or some other good occasion to make me forget them.

But what? Shall the blind opinion of this monster, a beast of many heads, (for so hath the generalitie of old bene termed) cause me to neglect the profession from whence I challenge some reputation, or diminish my loue to my countrey, which hitherto hath nourished me? No, it was for her sake I first tooke armes, and for her sake I will handle them so long as I shall bee able to vse them: not regarding how some men in priuate conuenicles do measure mens estimations by their owne humors; noz how euery popular person doeth giue sentence on euery mans actions by the worst accidents. But attending the gracious aspect of our dread Soueraigne, who neuer yet left vertue unrewarded: and depending vpon the iustice of her most rare and graue aduisors, who by their heedie looking into euery mans worth, do giue encouragement to the vertuous to exceed others in vertue: and assuring you that there shall neuer any thing happen moze pleasing vnto me, then that I may once againe bee a partie in some honozable iourney against the Spaniard in his owne countrey, I will cease my complaint: and with them that deserue beyond me, patiently endure the vbaduised censure of our malicious reproouers.

If I haue seemed in the beginning hereof troublesome vnto you, in the discourring of those impediments, and answering the slanderers which by the vulgar malicious and mutinous sort are laid as blemishes vpon the iourney, and reproches vpon the Generals (hauing indeed proceeded from other heads:) let the necessitie of confering the reputation of the action in generall, & the honozs of our Generals in particular, bee my sufficient excuse: the one hauing by the vertue of the other made our country moze dreaded & renowned, then any act that euer England vnderooke before. Whz if you haue thought my perswasible discourse long in the latter end; let the affectionate desire of my countreys good be therein answerable for me. And such as it is I pray you accept it, as only recommended to your selfe, and not to be deliuered to the publique view of the world, least any man take offence thereat; which some particular men may seeme iustly to do, in that hauing deserved very well, I should not herein giue them their due commendations: whereas my purpose in this pinate discourse hath bene onely to gratifie you with a touch of those pincipall matters that haue passed, wherein I haue onely taken notice of those men who either commanded euery service, or were of chiefest marke: if therefore you shall impart the same to one, and he to another, and so it passe through my hands, I know not what constructions would be made thereof to my pzeiudice; for that the Hares eares may happily be taken for hories. Howbeit I hold it very necessary (I must confesse) that there should be some true manifestation made of these things: but be it far from me to be the authoz thereof, as very vnfit to deliuer my censure of any matter in publique, & most vnwilling to haue my weaknesse discovered in pinate. And so I doe leaue you to the happy successe of your accustomed good exercises, earnestly wishing that there may be some better acceptance made of the fruits of your studies, then there hath bene of our hazards in the wars. From London the 30 of August 1589.

The right honozable the Erle of Cumberland hauing at his owne charges prepared his small Fleet of foure Sailes onely, viz. The Victorie one of the Queenes ships royall; the Meg and Margaret small ships, (one of which also he was forced soone after to send home againe, finding her not able to endure the Sea) and a small Carauell, and hauing assembled together about 400 men (or fewer) of gentlemen, souldiers, and saylers, embarked himself and them, and set saile from the Sound of Plimmouth in Deuonshire, the 18 day of June 1589, being accompanied with these captaines and gentlemen which hereafter folow.

Captaine Christopher Lister a man of great resolution, captaine Edward Carelesse, alias Wright, who in sir Francis Drakes West-Indian voyage to S. Domingo and *Carthagen*a, was captaine of the Hope. Captaine Boswell, M. Meruin, M. Henry Long, M. Partridge, M. Norton, M. William Mounson captaine of the Meg, and his vice admittall, now sir William Mounson, M. Pigeon captaine of the Carauell.

About 3 dayes after our departure from Plimmouth we met with 3 French ships, whereof one was of Newhauen, another of S. Malos, and so finding them to be Leaguers & lawfull prizes, weooke them and sent two of them for England with all their lading, which was fish for the most part from New-found-land, sauing that there was part thereof distributed amongst our small Fleet, as we could find stowage for the same: and in the third, all their men were sent home into France. The same day & the day folowing we met with some other ships, whom (when after some conference had with them, we perceiued plainly to bee of Roterodam and Emden, bound for Rochell) we dismissed.

The 28 and 29 dayes we met diuers of our English ships, returning from the Portugall voyage which my lord relieved with victuals. The 13 day of July being Sunday in the morning, we espied 11 ships without sight of the coast of Spaine, in the height of 39 degrees, whom wee presently prepared for, & provided to meet them, hauing first set forth captaine Mounson in the Meg, before vs, to descry whence they were. The Meg appochoing neere, there passed some shot betwixt them, whereby, as also by their Admiral and Viceadmirall putting forth their flags, we perceived that some fight was likely to follow. Having therefore fitted our selves for them, we made what hast we could towards them with regard alwayes to get the wind of them, and about 10 oꝝ 11 of the clocke, we came vp to them with the Victory. But after some few shot & some litle fight passed betwixt vs, they peeled themselves, & the masters of them all came aboard vs, shewing their feuerall Passports from the cities of Hamburg and Lubeck, from Breme, Pomerania and Calice.

They had in them certaine bags of Pepper & Synnamom, which they confessed to be the goods of a Jew in Lisbon, which should haue bene caried by them into their country to his Factor there, and so finding it by their owne confession to be lawfull Prize, the same was soone after taken and decided amongst our whole company, the value wherof was esteemed to be about 4500 pounds, at two shillings the pound.

The 17 day the foresaid ships were dismissed, but 7 of their men that were willing to go along with vs for sailers, we tooke to helpe vs, and so held on our course for the Azores.

The 1 of August being Friday in the morning, we had sight of the Island of S. Michael, being one of the Eastermost of the Azores toward which we sailed all that day, and at night hauing put forth a Spanish flag in our main-top, that so they might the lesse suspect vs, we appoched neere to the chiefe towne and road of that Island, where we espied 3 ships riding at anker and some other vessels: all which we determined to take in the darke of the night, and accordingly attempted about 10 oꝝ 11 of the clocke, sending our boats well manned to cut their cables and hawsers, and let them drue into the sea. Our men comming to them, found yone of those greatest ships was the Falcon of London being there vnder a Scottish Pilot who bare the name of her as his own. But 3 other smal ships that lay neere vnder the castle there, our men let loose and towed them away vnto vs, most of the Spaniards that were in them leaping ouer-board and swimming to shore with loud and lamentable outcries, which they of the towne hearing were in an vproze, and answered with the like crying. The castle discharged some great shot at our boats, but shooting without marke by reason of the darknesse they did vs no hurt. The Scots likewise discharged 3 great pieces into the aire to make the Spaniards thinke they were their friends and our enemies, and shortly after the Scottish master, & some other with him, came aboard to my lord doing their dutie, and offering their seruice, &c. These 3 ships were fraught with wine and Sallet-oile from Siuil.

The same day our Carauel chased a Spanish Carauel to shore at S. Michael, which caried letters thither, by which we learned that the Caraks were departed from Tercera 8 dayes before.

The 7 of August we had sight of a litle ship which wee chased towards Tercera with our pinnasse (the weather being calme) and towards euening we ouertooke her, there were in her 30 tunnes of good Madera wine, certaine woollen cloth, silke, cassata, &c. The 14 of August we came to the Island of Flores, where we determined to take in some fresh water and fresh victuals, such as the Island did affoord. So we manned our boats with some 120 men and rowed towards the shore; whereto when we appoched the inhabitantes that were assembled at the landing place, put forth a flag of truce, wherupon we also did the like.

When we came to them, my Lord gaue them to vnderstand by his Portugall interpreter, that he was a friend to their king Don Antonio, and came not any way to inuiry the, but that he ment onely to haue some fresh water and fresh victuals of them, by way of exchange for some provision that he had, as oile, wine, or pepper, to which they presently agreed willingly, & sent some of their company for beeces and sheepe, and we in the meane season marched Southward about a mile to Villa de Santa Cruz, from whence all the inhabitants pong and old were departed, and not any thing of value left. We demanding of them what was the cause hereof, they answered, Feare; as their vsuall manner was when any ships came neere their coast.

We found that part of the Island to be full of great rockie barren hills and mountains, litle inhabited by reason that it is molested with ships of war which might partly appeare by this towne of Santa Cruz (being one of their chiefe townes) which was all ruinous, and (as it were) but the reliques of the ancient towne which had bene burnt about two yeeres before by certaine English ships of war, as the inhabitantes there reported.

At euening as we were in rowing towards the Victory, an huge fish pursued vs for the space well nigh of two miles together, distant for the most part fro the boats sterne not a speares length, and sometimes so neere that the boat stroke vpon him, the tips of whose finhes about the ghills (appearing oft times aboue the water) were by estimation 40 or 5 yards asunder, and his iawes gaping a yard and an halfe wide, which put vs in feare of ouerturning the pinnasse, but God bee thanked (rowing as hard as we could) we escaped.

When we were about Flores a litle ship called the Drake, brought vs word that the Caraks were at Tercera, of which newes we were very glad, & sped vs thitherward with all the speed we could, could : and by the way we came to Fayal road the seuen and twentieth day of August, after sunne set, where we espied certaine shippes ryding at anker, to whom we sent in our Skiffe with Capitaine Lister and Capitaine Monson in her to discour the roaders : and leass any daunger should happen to our boate, we sent in likewise the Sawie-lacke and the small Carauell ; but the wind being off the shoare, the shippes were not able to fet it so nigh as the Spaniards ride, which neuertheless the boate did, and clapped a shippe aboord of two hundred and fiftie tunnes, which carried in her fourteene cast peeces, and continued fight alone with her for the space of one houre vntill the comming vp of other boates to the rescue of her, which were sent from the shippes, and then a fresh boording her againe one boate in the quarter, another in the haufe, wee entred her on the one side, and all the Spaniards lept ouerboord on the other, saue Iuan de Palma the Capitaine of her and two or thre moze, and thus we became possessors of her. This shippe was mozed to the Cattle which shot at vs all this while : the onely hurt which we receiued of all this shot was this, that the master of our Carauell had the calfe of his legge shot away. This shippe was laden with Sugar, Ginger, and hides lately come from S. Iuan de Puerto Rico ; after we had towed her cleare off the cattle, we rowed in againe with our boats, and fetched out siue small ships moze ; one laden with hides, another with Elephants teeth, graines, coco-nuts, and goates skins come from Guinie, another with woad, and two with dogge-fish, which two last we let driu in the sea making none account of them. The other foure we sent for England the 30 of August.

At the taking of these Prizes were consozted with vs some other small men of warre, as Maister Iohn Davis, with his shippe, Pinnesse, and Boate, Capitaine Markesburie with his ship, whose owner was Sir Walter Raleigh, the Barke of Lime, which was also consozted with vs before.

The last of August in the morning we came in sight of Tercera, being about some nine or ten leagues from shoare, where we espied comming towards vs, a small boat under saile, which seemed some what strange vnto vs, being so farre from land, and no shippe in sight, to which they might belong : but comming neere, they put vs out of doubt, shewing they were English men (eight in number) that had lately beene prisoners in Tercera, and finding opportunitie to escape at that time, with that small boat committed themselves to the sea, vnder Gods prouidence, hauing no other pard for their maine saile, but two pipe stauces tyed together by the endes, and no moze prouision of victuals, then they could bring in their pockets and bolomes. Hauing taken them all into the Victorie, they gaue vs certaine intelligence, that the Carackes were departed from thence about a weeke before.

An escape of 8. Englishmen from Tercera.

Thus beeing without any further hope of these Caraks, we resolved to returne for Fayall, with intent to surprize the towne, but vntill the ninth of September, we had either the winde so contrary, or the weather so calme, that in all that time, we made scarce nine or ten leagues way, lingring vp and downe not farre from Pico.

The tenth of September, being Wednesday in the afternoone, wee came againe to Fayal roade. Whereupon immediatly my Lord sent Capitaine Lister, with one of Graciola (whom Capitaine Munson had before taken) and some others, towards Fayal, whom certaine of the Inhabitants met in a boat, and came with Capitaine Lister to my Lord, to whom hee gaue this choice : either to suffer him quietly to enter into the platforme there without resistance, where he and his companie would remaine a space without offering any iniurie to them, that they (the Inhabitants) might come vnto him and compound for the rancome of the Towne : or else to stand to the hazard of warre.

With these words they returned to the towne : but the keepers of the platforme answered, that it was against their oath and allegiance to king Philip to giue ouer without fight. Whereupon my Lord commanded the boates of euery ship, to be presently manned, and soone after landed his men on the sandie shoare, vnder the side of an hill, about halfe a league to the Northwards from the platforme : vpon the toppe of which hill certaine horsemen and footmen shewed themselves ; and other two companies also appeared, with ensignes displayed, the one before the towne vpon the shore by the sea side, which marched towards our landing place, as though they would encounter vs ; the other in a valley to the Southwards of the platforme, as if they would haue come to helpe the Townsmen : during which time, they in the platforme also played vpon vs with great Ordnance. Notwithstanding my L. (hauing set his men in order) marched along the sea shore, vpon the sands, betwixt the sea & the towne towards the platforme for the space of a mile or moze, & then the shore growing rockie, & permitting no further progresse without much difficultie, he entred into the towne & passed through the street without resistance, vnto the platforme ; for those companies before mentioned at my Lo. approaching, were soone disperfed, and suddenly vanished.

The taking of the towne and platforme of Fayal.

Like wile they of the platforme, being all fled at my Lordes comming thither, left him and his company to scale the walles, to enter and take possession without resistance.

In the meane time our shippes ceased not to batter the foresaid Towne and Platfome with great shotte, till such time as we saw the Red-Crosse of England flourishing upon the front thereof.

of the towne of Fayal.

This Fayal is the principall towne in all that is land, & is situate directly ouer against the high and mighty mountaine Pico, lying towards the West North-west from that mountaine, being diuided therefrom by a narrow Sea, which at that place is by estimation about some two or thre leagues in breadth betweene the Isles of Fayal and Pico.

The towne conteyned some thre hundred households, their houses were faire and strongly builded of lime and stone, and double couered with hollow tyles much like our roofo-tyles, but that they are lesse at the one end then at the other.

Euery house almost had a cisterne or well in a garden on the backe side: in which gardens grew vines (with ripe clusters of grapes) making pleasant shadowes, and Tabacco now commonly known and vsed in England, wherewith their women there dye their faces reddish, to make them seeme fresh and young: Pepper Indian and common; figge-trees bearing both white and red figges: Peach trees not growing very tall: Oranges, Limons, Quinces, Potato-roots, &c. Swete wood (Cedar I thinke) is there very common, euen for building and firing.

My Lord hauing possessed himselfe of the towne and platfome, and being carefull of the preservation of the towne, gaue commandement, that no mariner or souldier should enter into any house, to make any spoyle thereof. But especially he was carefull that the Churches and houses of religion there should be kept inuiolate, which was accordingly performed, through his appointment of guarders and keepers for those places: but the rest of the towne eyther for want of the former inhibition, or for desire of spoyle & prey, was rifled, & ranfacked by the souldiers & mariners, who scarcely left any house vnsearched, out of which they tooke such things as liked them, as chestes of swete wood, chaires, cloth, conerlets, hangings, bedding, apparell: and further ranged into the countrey, where some of them also were hurt by the inhabitants. The Friery there conteyning and maintayning thirtie Franciscan Friers (among whom we could not finde any one able to speake true Latine) was builded by a Fryer of Angra in Tercera of the same order, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred and fire. The tables in the hall had seates for the one side onely, and were alwayes couered, as readie at all times for dinner or supper.

From Wednesday in the afternoone, at which time we entered the towne, till Saturday night, we continued there, untill the Inhabitants had agreed and payed for the ranfome of the towne, two thousand duckats, most part whereof was Church-plate.

We found in the platfome eight and fiftie yron peeeces of Ordnance, whereof thre and twentie (as I remember) or moze were readie mounted vpon their carriages, betwene Baricados, vpon a platfome towards the sea-side, all which Ordnance we tooke, and set the platfome on fire, and so departed: My Lord hauing invited to dinner in the Victorie, on the Sunday following, so many of the Inhabitants as would willingly come (saue onely Diego Gomes the Gouvernour, who came but once onely to parle about the ranfome) onely foure came and were well entertained, and solemnely dismissed with sound of drumme and trumpets, and a peale of Ordnance: to whom my Lord deliuered his letter subscribed with his owne hand, importing a request to all other Englishmen to abstaine from any further molesting them, saue onely for fresh water, and victuals necessary for their intended voyage. During our abode here (viz. the 11 of September) two women came out of Pico which had beene prisoners there: Also at Fayal we set at libertie a prisoner translated from S. Iago, who was cousin to a seruant of Don Anthonioking of Portugall in England: These prisoners we deteyned with vs.

On Monday we sent our boates a shoze for fresh water, which (by reason of the raine that fell the former night) came plentifully running downe the hilles, and would otherwise haue beene hard to be gotten there. On Tuesday like wise hauing not yet sufficiently serued our turnes, we sent againe for fresh water, which was then not so easie to be gotten as the day before, by reason of a great winde: which in the afternoone increased also in such sort, that we thought it not safe to ride so neere the land; whereupon we weyed anker and so departed North-west and by west, alongst the coast of Fayal Island, Some of the Inhabitants comming aboord to vs this day, tolde vs that alwayes about that time of the yeere such windes West South-west blew on that coast.

This day, as we sayled neere Saint Georges Island, a huge fish lying still a litle vnder water, or rather euen therewith, appeared hard by a head of vs, the sea breaking vpon his backe, which was blacke coloured, in such sort as deeming at the first it had beene a rocke, and the ship stemming directly with him, we were put in a sudden feare for the time: till soone after we saw him moue out of the way.

The 16 of September in the night it lightened much, whereupon there followed great winds and raine, which continued the 17 18 19 20 and 21 of the same. The 23 of September we came againe into Faial road to weigh an anker which (for haste and feare of foule weather) wee had left there before, where we went on shoze to see the towne, the people (as we thought) hauing now settled themselves there againe: but notwithstanding many of them through too much distrustfulnesse, departed and prepared to depart with their packers at the first sight of vs: vntill such time as they were assured by my Lord, that our comming was not any way to iniury them, but especially to haue fresh water, and some other things needefull for vs, contenting them for the same.

So then we viewed the Towne quietly, and bought such things as we desired for our money as if we had bene in England. And they helped to fill vs in fresh water, receiuing for their paines such satisfaction as contented them.

The 25 day we were forced againe to depart from thence, before we had sufficiently watered, by reason of a great tempest that suddenly arose in the night, in so much, that my Lord himselfe soone after midnight rapled our men out of their Cabines to wey anker, himselfe also together with them haling at the Capten, and after charging them vp with wine.

The next day we sent our Carauell and the Sawfie-Jacke to the road of Saint Michael, to see what they could espie: we following after them vpon the 27 day, plying to and fro, came within sight of S. Michael, but by contrary windes the 28 29 and 30 dayes wee were driuen to leeward, and could not get neere the Island.

The first of October wee sailed alongst Tercera, and euen against Brasill (a promontorie neere to Angra the strongest Towne in that Island) wee espied some boates comming to the Towne, and made out towarde them: but being neere to the lande they ranne to shoare and escaped vs.

In the afternoone we came neere to Graciosa, whereupon my Lord forthwith sent Captain Lister to the Islanders, to let them vnderstand that his desire was onely to haue water and wine of them, and some fresh victuals, and not any further to trouble them. They answered they could giue no resolute answer to this demaund, vntill the Gouvernoys of the Island had consulted thereupon, and therefore desired him to send againe to them the next day.

Upon the second day of October early in the morning, we sent forth our long boat and Pinnesse, with emptie Caskes, and about some fiftie or sixty men together with the Margaret, and Captaine Davis his shippe: for we now wanted all the rest of our consoztes. But when our men would haue landed, the Islanders shot at them, and would not suffer them. And troupes of men appeared vpon land, with ensignes displayed to resist vs: So our boates rowed alongst the shoare, to finde some place where they might land, not with too much disadvantage: our shippes and they still shooting at the Islanders: but no place could be founde where they might land without great perill of loosing many of their liues, and so were contrayned to retire without receiuing any answer, as was promised the day before. We had thzee men hurt in this conflict, whilst our boates were together in consulting what was best to be done: two of them were stroken with a great shot (which the Islanders drew from place to place with Oren) where-with the one lost his hand, and the other his life within two or thzee dayes after: the third was shot into his necke with a small shot, without any great hurt.

With these newes our company returned backe againe at night, whereupon preparation was made to goe to them againe the next day: but the day was farre spent before we could come neere them with our ship: neither could we finde any good ground to anker in, where we might lye to batter the Towne, and further we could finde no landing place, without great danger to loose many men: which might turne not onely to the ouerthrow of our voiage, but also put the Queenes ship in great perill for want of men to bring her home. Therefore my Lord thought it best to write to them to this effect: That he could not a litle maruell at their inhumanitie and crueltie which they had shewed towards his men, seeing they were sent by him vnto them in peaceable manner, to receiue their answer which they had promised to giue the day before: and that were it not for Don Anorio their lawfull king his sake, he could not put vp so great iniury at their hands, without iust reuengement vpon them: notwithstanding for Don Anorios sake, whose friend he was, he was yet content to send to them once againe for their answer: At night Captaine Lister returned with this answer from them. That their Gunner shot off one of their peeces, which was charged with powder onely, and was stopped; which our men thinking it had bin shot at them, shot againe, and so beganne the fight: and that the next morning they would send my Lord a resolute answer to his demaunde, for as yet they could not knowe their Gouernours minde herein. The next morning there came vnto vs a boate from the shoare with a flagge of truce, wherein were three of the chiefe men of the Island; who agreed with my Lord that hee should haue of them sixtie buttes of wine, and fresh victuals to refresh himselfe and his companie withall: but as for fresh water, they could not sacrifice our neede therein, hauing themselves little or none, sauing such as they saued in vessels or cisternes when it rayned, and that they had rather giue vs two tunnes of wine then one of water: but they requested that our souldiers might not come on shoare, for they themselves would bring all they had promised to the water-side, which request was graunted; we keeping one of them aboord with vs vntill their promise was performed, and the other we sent to shoare with our emptie Caskes, and some of our men to helpe to fill, and bring them away with such other provision as was promised: so the Margaret, Captaine Davis his shippe, and another of Weymouth stayed ryding at anker before the Towne, to take in our provision. This shippe of Weymouth came to vs the day before, and had taken a rich Prize (as it was reported) worth fiftene thousand pound, which brought vs newes that the West-Indian Fleete was not yet come; but would come very shortly. But we with the Victorie put off to sea, and vpon Saturday the fourth of October, we tooke a French shippe of Saint Malo (a citie of the unholy league) loden with fish from New-found land: which had bene in so great a tempest, that she was constrained to cut her mayne mast ouerboord for her safetie, and was now comming to Graciola, to repaire her selfe. But so hardly it befell her, that she did not onely not repaire her former losses, but lost all that remained vnto vs. The chiefe of her men we tooke into our ship, and sent some of our men, mariners, and souldiers into her to bring her into England.

Upon the Sunday following at night, all our promised provision was brought vnto vs from Graciola: and we friendly dismisse the Islanders with a peale of Ordnance.

Upon Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, we plyed to and fro about those Isles, being very rough weather. And vpon Thursday at night, being oxen some three or foure leagues from Tercera, we saw fiftene saile of the West-Indian Fleete comming into the Hauens at Angra in Tercera. But the winde was such, that for the space of foure dayes after, though wee lay as close by the winde as was possible, yet we could not come neere them. In this time we lost our late French Prize, not being able to lie so neere the winde as we, and heard no more of her till we came to England where she safely arrived. Upon Monday we came very neere the Hauens mouth, being minded to haue runne in amongst them, and to haue fetched out some of them if it had bene possible: But in the end this enterpryse was deemed too daungerous, considering the strength of the place where they rode, being haled and tolued in neerer the towne, at the first sight of our approaching, and lying vnder the protection of the Castle of Brasill, on the one side (hauing in it five and twentie peeces of Ordnance) and a fort on the other side wherein were 13 or 14 great brasse peeces. Besides, when we came neere land the winde proued too scant for vs to attempt any such enterpryse.

Upon Tuesday the fourteenth of October we sent our boate to the roade to sound the depth, to see if there were any ankoing place for vs, where we might lie without shot of the Castle and Fort, and within shot of some of those shippes, that we might either make them come out to vs, or sinke them where they lay. Our boate returned hauing found out such a place as we desired, but the winde would not suffer vs to come neere it, and againe if we could haue ankoied there, it was thought likely that they would rather runne themselves a ground to saue their lines and liberties, and some of their goods, then come forth to loose their liberties and goods to vs their enemies. So we shot at them to see if we could reach them, but it fell farre short. And thus we departed, thinking it not probable that they would come forth so long as we watched for them before the hauens mouth, or within sight of them. For the space of five dayes after we put off to sea, and lay without sight of them, and sent a pinnesse to lie out of sight close by the shoare, to bring vs word if they should come forth. After a while the pinnesse returned and tolde vs that those ships in the Hauens had taken downe their sayles, and let downe their toppe mastes: so that wee supposed they would neuer come forth, till they perceived vs to bee quite gone.

Wherefore vpon the 20 of October, hearing that there were certaine Scottish ships at Saint Michael, we sayled thither, and found there one Scottish roader, and two or three more at Villa Franca, the next road a league or two from the towne of S. Michael, to the Eastwards: of whom we had for our reliefe some small quantitie of wine (viz. some five or sixe buttes of them all) and some fresh water, but nothing sufficient to serue our turne.

Upon Tuesday the one and twentieth of October, we sent our long boate to shoare for fresh water water at a brooke a little to the Westwards from Villa Franca,

But the Inhabitants espying vs came downe with two Ensignes displayed, and about some hundred and fiftie men armed, to withstand our landing. So our men hauing spent all their powder vpon them in attempting to land, and not being able to preuaile at so great oddes, returned frustrate.

From hence we departed towardes Saint Maries Island, intuding to water there, and then to goe for the coast of Spaine. For we had intelligence that it was a place of no great force, and that we might water there very well: therefore vpon Friday following, my Lord sent Captaine Lister, and Captaine Amias Preston now Sir Amias Preston (who not long before came to vs out of his owne shippe, and shee loosing vs in the night, hee was forced to carry still with vs) with our long boate and Pinnette, and some fiftie or seuentie shotte in them, with a friendly letter to the Islanders, that they would grant vs leaue to water, and we would no further trouble them.

So we departed from the Victorie for the Island, about nine of the clocke in the forenoone, and rowed freshly vntill about 3 a clocke afternoone. At which time our men being something weary with rowing, and being within a league or two of the shore, and 4 or 5 leagues from the Victorie, they espied (to their refreshing) two ships ryding at anchor hard vnder the towne, whereupon hauing shiffted some 6 or 7 of our men into Captaine Davis his boate, being too much pestered in our owne, and retayning with vs some 20 shot in the pinnette, we made way towardes them with all the speede we could.

By the way as we rowed we saw boates passing betwixt the roaders and the shore; and men in their shirtes swimming and wading to sheare, who as we perceiued afterwarbes, were labouring to set those shippes fast on ground, and the Inhabitants as busily preparing themselves for the defence of those roaders, their Island, and themselves. When we came nere them, Captaine Lister commaunded the Trumpets to be sounded, but prohibited any shot to be discharged at them, vntill they had direction from him: But some of the companie, either not well perceiuing or regarding what he sayd, immediatly vpon the sound of the Trumpets discharged their pieces at the Islanders, which for the most part lay in trenches and fortified places vnseene, to their owne best advantage: who immediatly shot likewise at vs, both with small and great shot, without danger to themselves: notwithstanding Captaine Lister earnestly hastened forward the Saplors that rowed, who beganne to synke at that shot, flying so fast about their eares, and himselfe first entering one of the shippes that lay a little further from shoare then the other, we speedily followed after him into her, still plying them with our shot. And hauing cut in sunder her Cables and Pausers, towed her away with our Pinnette. In the meane time Captaine Davis his boate ouertooke vs and entered into the other shippe, which also (as the former) was forsaken by all her men: but they were constraind to leaue her & to come againe into their boate (whilest shot and stones from shoare flew fast amongst them) finding her to sticke so fast a grounde, that they could not fire her: which the Townesmen also perceiuing, and seeing that they were but fewe in number, and vs (busied about the other ship) not comming to ayde them, were preparing to haue come and taken them. But they returned vnto vs, and so together we came away towardes the Victorie, towing after vs the Prize that we had now taken, which was lately come from Brasill, laden with Sugar.

In this fight we had two men slaine and 16 wounded: and as for them, it is like they had little hurt, lying for the most part behind stone walles, which were builded one about another hard by the sea side, vpon the end of the hill whereupon the Towne stood betwixt two valleys. Vpon the toppe of the hill lay their great Ordinance (such as they had) wherewith they shot leaden bullets, whereof one pierced through our Prizes side, and lay still in the shippe without doing any more harme.

The next day we went againe for water to the same Island, but not knowing before the inconuenience and disadvantage of the place where we attempted to land, we returned frustrate.

The same night the 25 of October we departed for S. Georges Island for fresh water, whither we came on Sunday following October 27, and hauing espied where a spout of water came running downe: the pinnette and long boate were presently manned and sent vnder the conduct of Captaine Preston, and Captaine Munson, by whom my Lord sent a letter to the Islanders as before, to grant vs leaue to water onely, and we would no further trouble them: notwithstanding our men comming on shore found some of the poore Islanders, which for feare of vs hid themselves amongst the rockes.

And on Wednesday following our boats returned with fresh water, whereof they brought onely five tunnes for the Victorie, alieaging they could get no more, thinking (as it was supposed) that my Lord hauing no more prouision of water and wine, but onely 12 tunnes, would not goe for the coast of Spaine, but straight for the coast of England, as many of our men greatly desired: notwithstanding my Lord was unwilling so to doe, and was minded the next day to haue taken in more water: but through roughnesse of the seas and winde, and unwillingnesse of his men it was not done. Yet his Hon. purposed not to returne with so much prouision vnspent, and his voyage (as he thought) not yet performed in such sort as mought giue some reasonable contentment or satisfaction to himselfe and others.

Therefore because no more water could now conveniently be gotten, and being vncertaine when it could be gotten, and the time of our staying aboard also vncertaine, the matter being referred to the choyse of the whole companie, whether they would carrie longer, till wee might be more sufficiently prouided of fresh water, or goe by the coast of Spaine for England, with halfe so much allowance of drinke as before, they willingly agreed that euery meale should bee allowed at one meale but halfe so much drinke as they were accustomed (except them that were sicke or wounded) and so to goe for England, taking the coast of Spaine in our way, to see if we could that way make vp our voyage.

Vpon Saturday Octob. 31 we sent the Margaret (because she leaked much) directly for England, together with the Prize of Brasile which we tooke at S. Marie, and in them some of our hurt and wounded men or other wise sicke were sent home as they desired, for England: but Captaine Monson was taken out of the Megge into the Victorie.

So we held on our course for the coast of Spaine with a faire winde and a large which before we seldom had. And vpon Tuesday following being the 4 of Nouemb. we espied a saile right before vs, which we chased till about thre a clocke in the afternoone, at which time we ouertaking her, she strooke sayle, and being demaunded who was her owner and from whence she was, they answered, a Portugall, and from Pernambucke in Brasile. She was a ship of some 110 tuns burden, freighted with 410 chestes of Sugar, and 50 Rintals of Brasill-wood, euery Rintall containing one hundred pound waight: we tooke her in latitude nine and twentie degrees, about two hundred leagues from Lisbone westwards: Captaine Preston was presently sent vnto her, who brought the principall of her men aboard the Victorie, and certaine of our men, mariners and souldiers were sent aboard her. The Portugals of this Prize told vs that they saw another ship before them that day about noone. Having therefore dispatched all things about the Prize aforesaid, and left our long boat with Captaine Davis, taking his lesser boat with vs, we made way after this other ship with all the sayles we could beare, holding on our course due East, and giuing order to Captaine Davis his ship and the Prize that they should follow vs due East, and that if they had sight of vs the morning following they should follow vs still: if not, they should goe for England.

The next morning we espied not the sayle which we chased, and Captaine Davis his ship and the Prize were behinde vs out of sight: but the next Thursday the first of Nouember (being in latitude 38 degrees 30 minutes, and about sixtie leagues from Lisbone westwards) early in the morning Captaine Preston descried a sayle some two or thre leagues a head of vs, after which we presently hastened our chase, and ouertooke her about eight or nine of the clocke before noone. She came lately from Saint Michaels roade, hauing beene before at Brasill laden with Sugar and Brasile. Having sent our boat to them to bring some of the chiefe of their men aboard the Victorie, in the meane time whilst they were in comming to vs one out of the maine toppie espied another saile a head some thre or foure leagues from vs. So immediately vpon the returne of our boate, hauing sent her backe againe with some of our men aboard the prize, we pursued speedily this new chase, with all the sayles we could packe on, and about two a clocke in the afternoone ouertooke her: she had made prouision to fight with vs, hauing hanged the sides of the ship forshicke with hides (where with especially she was laden) that musket shot could not haue pierced them: but yet we had discharged two great pieces of our Ordnance at her, she strooke sayle, and approaching nearer, we asking of whence they were, they answered from the West-Indies, from Mexico, and Saint Iohn de Lowe (truly called Vlhua.) This ship was of some thre or foure hundred tunnes, and had in her seuen hundred hides worth tenne shillings a peece: five chestes of Cochinell, curry chest boulding one hundred pound waight, and euery pound worth five and twentie shillings and eight pence, and certaine chestes of Sugar and China dishes, with some plate and silver.

The Captaine of her was an Italian, and by his behauiour seemed to be a grane, wise, and civil man: he had put in adventure in this shippe five and twentie thousand Duckats. Wee tooke him with certaine other of her chiefe men (which were Spaniards) into the Victorie: and Captaine Lister with some other of the chiefe of our Mariners, souldiers, and saylers as were thought sufficient, to the number of 20. or thereabouts, were sent into her. In the meane time (we staying) our other prizes which followed after, came vp to vs. And now we wee had our hands full and with ioy shayed our course for England, for so it was thought meetest, hauing now so many Portugals, Spaniards and Frenchmen amongst vs, that if we should haue taken any moze prizes afterwards, wee had not bene well able to haue manned them without endangering our selues. So about 6. of the clocke in the afternoone (when our other prize had overtaken vs) wee set saile for England. But our prizes not being able to beare vs company without sparing them many of our sailes, which caused our ship to rowle and wallow, in such sort that it was not onely very troublesome to vs, but, as it was thought, would also haue put the maine Haste in danger of falling overboard: hauing acquainted them with these inconueniencies, we gaue them direction to keepe their courses together, following vs, and so to come to Portsmouth. We tooke this last prize in the latitude of 39. degrees, and about 46. leagues to the Westwards from The Roche.

She was one of those 16. ships which we saw going into the haven at Angra in Terçera, October 8. Some of the men that we tooke out of her tolde vs, that whilst wee were plying vp and downe before that haven, as before was shewed, expecting the comming forth of those shippes; those of the greatest and best of them, at the appointment of the Gouernour of Terçera, were burdened of their treasure and marchandize. And in euery of them were put thre hundred Souldiers, which were appointed to haue come to lay the Victory aboard in the night, and take her: but when this should haue bene done the Victory was gone out of their sight.

Now we went merily before the winde with all the sailes we could beare, insomuch that in the space of 24. houres, we sailed neere 47. leagues, that is seuentye English miles, betwixt Friday at noone and Saturday at noone (notwithstanding the shippe was very foule, and much growne with long being at Sea) which caused some of our company to make account they would see what running at Tilt there should bee at Whitehall vpon the Queenes day. Others were imagining what a Christmas they would keepe in England with their shares of the prizes we had taken. But so it befell, that we kept a colde Chrismas with the Bishop and his clerks (rockes that lye to the Westwards from Sylly, and the Westerne parts of England): for soone after the wind scanning came about to the Eastwards (the worst part of the heauens for vs, from which the winde could blow) in such sort, that we could not fetch any part of England. And hereupon also our allowance of drinke, which was scant ynough before, was yet moze more scantied, because of the scarcitie thereof in the shippe. So that now a man was allowed but halfe a piute at a meale, and that many times colde water, and scarce sweete. Notwithstanding this was an happy estate in comparision of that which followed: for from halfe a piute we came to a quarter, and that lasted not long neither, so that by reason of this great scarcitie of drinke, and contrarietie of winde, we thought to put into Ireland, there to relieue our wants. But when wee came nere thither, lying at hull all night (carrying for the daylight of the next morning, whereby we might the safer byring our ship into some conuenient harbour there) we were driven so farre to lee-ward, that we could fetch no part of Ireland, so as with heauie hearts and sad cheate, wee were constrained to returne backe againe, and expect till it should please God to send vs a faire winde either for England or Ireland. In the meane time we were allowed euery man thre or foure spoones full of vinegar to drinke at a meale: for other drinke we had none, sauing onely at two or thre meales, when we had in stead hereof as much wine, which was wringed out of Wine-leses that remained. With this hard fare (for by reason of our great want of drinke, wee durst eate but very little) wee continued for the space of a fournight or thereabouts: Sauiug that now and then wee sealed for it in the meane time: And that was when there fell any haile or raine: the haile-stones wee gathered vp and did eate them moze pleasantly then if they had bene the sweetest Comfits in the world; The raine-drops were so carefully saued, that so nere as wee coulde, not one was lost in all our shippe. Some hanged by sheetes tied with cordes by the foure corners, and a weight in the midst that the water might runne downe thither, and so be receiued into some vessel set or hanged vnderneath: Some that wanted sheetes, hanged by nakins, and cloutes, and watched them till they were shrowd wet, then wringing and sucking out the water. And that water which fell downe and washed away the filth and slopping of the shippe, trod under foote, as bad as running downe the Leane many times when it rained, was not lost. I warrant you, but watched and attended carefully (pea sometimes with strife and contention) at euery scupper-hole, and other place where it ranne downe, with dishes, pots, cannes, and Jarres, whereof some drunke hearty draughts euen as it was, mud and all, without tarrying to cleanse or settle it: Others clenfed it first, but not often, for so was so thicke and white so slowly shrowd, that they might ill enoure to cary so long, and were loth to loose too much of such precious stuffe: some licked with their tongues (like dogges) the boards vnder feete, the sides, railles, and Hatches of the shippe: others that were moze ingenious, fastened fastened girdles or ropes about the Passes, dawbing tallow betwixt them and the Passie (that the raine might not runne downe betwene) in such sort, that those ropes or girdles hanging lower on the one side then on the other, a spout of leather was fastened to the lowest part of them, that all the raine drops that came running downe the Passie, might meete together at that place, and there be receiued.

Perce that got a canne of water by these meanes was spoken of, sued to, and enuied as a rich man, Quam pulchrum digno monstrari & dicier hic est? Some of the poore Spaniards that we had taken (who notwithstanding had the same allowance that our owne men had) would come and craue of vs, for the loue of God, but so much water as they could holde in the hollow of their hand: and they had it, notwithstanding our great extremitie, to teache them some humanitie in stead of their accustomed barbaritie, both to vs and other nations heretofore. They put also bullets of lead into their mouthes to slake their thirst.

Now in euery corner of the shippe were heard the lamentable cries of sicke and wounded men sounding wofully in our eares, crying out and pitifully complaining for want of drinke, being ready to die, yea many dying for lacke thereof, so as by reason of this great extremitie we lost many more men, then wee had done all the voyage before: hauing before this time bene so well and sufficiently provided for, that we liued in maner as well and healthfully, and died as few as if wee had bene in England, whereas now lightly euery day some were cast ouerboord.

But the second day of December 1589, was a festiuall day with vs, for then it rained a good pace, and wee saued some pretie store of raine water (though wee were well wet for it, and that at midnichte) and filled our skins full besides: notwithstanding it were muddy and bitter with washing the shippe, but (with some sugar which we had to sweeten it withall) it went merrily downe, yet remembred we and wished for with all our hearts, many a Conduit, pumpe, spring, a streame of cleare sweete running water in England: And how miserable wee had accompted some poore soules whom we had scene drinen for thirst to drinke thereof, and how happy we would now haue thought our selues if we might haue had our fills of the same: yet should wee haue feared the better with this our poore feasting, if we might haue had our meate and drinke (such and so much as it was) stand quietly before vs: but beside all the former extremities, wee were so tossed and tempestuoued with such horrible stormie and tempestuous weather, that euery man had best holde fast his Cane, cup, and dish in his handes, yea and himselfe too, many times, by the ropes, ralles, or sides of the ship, or else he should soone finde all vnder fecte.

Perewith our maine saile was tozne from the yarde and blowne ouerboord quite away into the sea without recovery, and our other sailes so rent and tozne (from side to side some of them) that hardly any of them escaped hole. The raging waves and foming surges of the sea came rolling like mountaines one after another, and ouerraked the waste of the shippe like a mugeie riuer running ouer it, whereas in faire weather it was neere 20. foote aboue the water, that now wee might cry out with the princely Prophet Psalme 107. vers. 26. They mount vp to heauen, and descend to the deepe, so that their soule melteth away for trouble: they reele too and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and all their cunning is gone. With this extremitie of foule weather the ship was so tossed and shaken, that by the creaking noise it made, and by the leaking which was now much more then ordinary, wee were in great feare it would haue shaken in sunder, so that now also we had iust cause to pray a little other wise then the Poet, though marring the verse, yet mending the meaning.

Deus maris & Coeli, quid enim nisi vota supersunt, Soluere quassata parcito membra ratis.

Notwithstanding it pleased God of his great goodnesse to deliuer vs out of this danger. Then forthwith a new maine saile was made and fastened to the yard, and the rest repaired as time and place would suffer: which we had no sooner done, but yet againe wee were troubled with as great extremitie as before, so that againe we were like to haue lost our new maine saile, had not Master William Antony the Master of the ship himselfe (when none else would or durst) ventured with danger of drowning by creeping along vpon the maine yarde (which was let downe close to the ralles) to gather it vp out of the sea, and to fasten it thereto, being in the meane while oft-times ducked ouer head and eares into the sea.

These stormes were so terrible, that there were some in our company, which confessed they had gone to seas for the space of 20. yeres, and had neuer scene the like, and vowed that if euer they returned safe home, they would neuer come to Sea againe.

The last of Nouember at night we met with an English ship, out of which (because it was too late that night) it was agreed that we should haue had the next morning two or three Tunnes of wine, which, as they said, was all the provision of drinke they had, save only a But or two, which they

maist needs reserue for their owne vse: but after that, we heard of them no more, till they were set on ground vpon the coast of Ireland, where it appeared that they might haue spared vs much more then they pretended they could, so as they might wel haue relieved our great necessities, and haue had sufficient for themselves besides, to bring them into England.

The first of December at night we spake with another English ship, and had some beere out of her, but not sufficient to carry vs into England, so that wee were constrained to put into Ireland; the winde so seruing.

The next day we came to an anchor, not far from the S. Kelmies vnder the land & winde, where we were somewhat more quiet, but (that being no safe harbour to ride in) the next morning wee went about to weigh anchor, but hauing some of our men hurt at the Capsten, wee were faine to gine ouer and leaue it behinde, holding on our course to Ventre haueu, where wee safely arriued the same day, that place being a very safe and conuenient harbor for vs, that now wee might sing as we had iust cause, They that goe downe to the Sea, &c.

So soone as we had anchored here my Lord went forth with to shoare, and brought presently fresh water and fresh victuals, as Muttons, pigges, hennes, &c. to refresh his company withall. Notwithstanding himselfe had lately bene very weake, and talked of the same extremitie that his Company did: For in the time of our former want, hauing a little fresh water left him remaining in a pot, in the night it was broken, and the water drunke and dried vp. Soone after the sicke and wounded men were carried to the next principall Towne, called Dingenacush, being about three miles distant from the fore saide haueu, where our shippe rode, to the Eastwards, that there they might be the better refreshed, and had the Chirurgians dayly to attend vpon them. Here we wel refreshed our selues whilst the Irish harpe sounded sweetely in our eares, and here we, who for the former extremities were in manner halfe dead, had our liues (as it were) restored vnto vs againe.

This Dingenacush is the chiefe Towne in al that part of Ireland, it consisteth but of one maine streete, from whence some smaller doe proceede on either side. It hath had gates (as it seemeth) in times past at either ende to open and shut as a Towne of warre, and a Castle also. The houses are very strongly built with thicke stone walles, and narrow windowes like vnto Castles: for as they confessed, in time of trouble, by reason of the wilde Irish or otherwise, they used their houses for their defence as Castles. The castle and all the houses in the Towne, saue foure, were won, burnt, and ruinated by the Erle of Desmond. These foure houses fortified themselves against him, and withstood him and all his power perforce, so as he could not winne them.

There remaineth yet a thicke stone wall that passeth ouerthwart the midst of the streete which was a part of their fortification. Notwithstanding whilst they thus defended themselves, as some of them yet aliuie confessed, they were driuen to as great extremities as the Iewes, besieged by Titus the Romane Emperour, inso much that they were constrained to eat dead mens carcases for hunger. The Towne is now againe somewhat repaired, but in effect there remaine but the ruines of the former Towne. Commonly they haue no chimnies in their houses, excepting them of the better sort, so that the smoake was very troublesome to vs, while we continued there. Their felwell is turkes, which they haue very good, and whinnes or furies. There groweth little wood thereabouts, which maketh building chargeable there: as also want of lime (as they reported) which they are faine to fetch from farre, when they haue neede thereof. But of stones there is store pnuough, so that with them they commonly make their hedges to part ech mans ground from other; and the ground seemeth to be nothing else within but rockes and stones: Yet it is very fruitfull and plentifull of grasse, and graine, as may appeare by the abundance of kine and cattel there: inso much that we had good muttons (though somewhat lesse then ours in England) for two shillings or siue groates a picce, good pigges and hennes for 3. pence a picce.

The greatest want is indoltrious, painefull, and husbandly inhabitants to till and trimme the ground: for the common sort, if they can prouide sufficient to serue from hand to mouth, take no further care.

Of finoney (as it seemeth) there is very small store amongst them, which perhaps was the cause that made them double and triple the prizes of many things we bought of them, more then they were before our coming thither.

Good land was here to be had for foure pence the Acre peerey rent. There are Mines of As-sone, Tinne, brasse, and yron. Stones wee sawe there as cleare as Chriskall, naturally squared like Diamonds, Mines in Ireland,

That part of the Countrey is all ful of great mountaines and hills, from whence came running downe the pleasant streames of sweete fresh running water. The naturall hardnesse of that Nation appeareth in this, that their small chilozen runne vsually in the middelt of Winter vp and downe the steepest bare-foote and bare-legged, with no other apparell (many times) saue onely onely a mantell to couer their nakednesse.

The chiefe Officer of their Towne they call their Soueraigne, who hath the same office and authoritie among them that our Maiors haue with vs in England, and hath his Sergeants to attend vpon him, and beare the Pace before him as our Maiors.

We were first intertained at the Soueraignes house, which was one of those 4. that withstood the Cile of Desmond in his rebellion. They haue the same forme of Common prayer word for word in Latin, that we haue here in England. Upon the Sunday the Soueraigne commeth into the Church with his Sergeant before him, and the Sheriffe and others of the Towne accompany him, and there they kneele downe euery man by himselfe priuately to make his prayers. After this they rise and go out of the Church againe to drinke, which being done, they returne againe into the Church, and then the Minister beginneth prayers.

Their maner of baptizing differeth something from ours: part of the seruice belonging thereto is repeated in Latin, and part in Irish. The Minister taketh the child in his hands, and first dippeth it backwards, and then forwarde, ouer head and eares into the cold water in the midst of Winter, whereby also may appeare their naturall hardnesse, (as before was specified.) They had neither Bell, drum, nor trumpet, to call the Parishioners together, but they expect till their Soueraigne come, and then they that haue any deuotion follow him.

They make their bread all in cakes, and, for the tenth part, the bakets bake for all the towne.

We had of them some 10. or 11. Tunnes of beere for the Victory, but it proued like a present purgation to them that took it, so that we chose rather to drinke water then it.

The 20. of December we loosed fro hence, hauing well prouided our selues of fresh water, and other things necessary, being accompanied with sir Edw. Dennie, his Lady, and two yong sonnes.

This day in the morning my Lord going ashore to dispatch away speedily some fresh water that remained for the Victory, the winde being very fatre for vs, brought vs newes that there were 60. Spanish prizes taken and brought to England. For two or three dayes wee had a faire winde, but afterwards it scanted so, that (as I said before) we were faine to keepe a cold Christmas with The Bishop and his clerkes.

After this we met with an English ship, that brought vs ioyful newes of 91. Spanish prizes that were come to England: and sorrowfull newes withall, that the last and best prize we tooke, had suffered shipwracke at a place vpon the coast of Cornwall which the Cornish men call Als Efferne, that is, Hel-cliffe, and that Captaine Lister and all the men in the ship were drowned, saue 5. or 6. the one halfe English, the other Spanish that saued themselves with swimming: but notwithstanding much of the goods were saued, and referred for vs, by sir Francis Godolphin, and the worshipfull gentlemen of the Countrey there. My Lord was very sorry for Captaine Listers death, wishing that he had lost his voyage to haue saued his life.

The 29. of December we met with another shippe, that tolde vs the same newes, and that sir Martin Frobisher, & Captaine Reymond had taken the Admirall and vice-Admirall of the Fleet that we espied going to Terçera hauen. But the Admirall was sunke with much leaking, nere to the Idy Stone, a rocke that lieth ouer against Plimouth sound, and the men were saued.

This ship also certified vs that Captaine Prestons ship had taken a prize laden with siluer. My Lord entred presently into this ship, & went to Falmouth, and we held on our course for Plimouth. At night wee came nere to the Ram-head (the next Cape Westwards from Plimouth sound) but we were afraid to double it in the night, misdoubting the scantnesse of the winde. So we stood off to Sea halfe the night, and towards morning had the winde moze large, and made too little spare thereof, that partly for this cause, and partly through mistaking of the land, wee were driuen so much to leeward, that we could not double that Cape: Therefore we returned backe againe, and came into Falmouth hauen, where wee stricke on ground in 17. foote water: but it was a low ebbe, and ready againe to flowe, and the ground soft, so as no hurt was done. Here with gladnesse wee set foote againe vpon the English ground (long desired) and refreshed our selues with keeping part of Christmas vpon our native soile.

The valiant fight performed by 10. Merchants ships of London, against 12. Spanish gallies in the Straights of Gibraltar, the 24. of April 1590.

It is not long since sundry valiant ships appertaining to the Merchants of London, were freighted & rigged forth, some for Venice, some for Constantinople, & some to sundry other places of trafique, among whom these ensuing met within the Straights of Gibraltar, as they were taking their course homewards, hauing before escaped all other danger. The first whereof was the Salomon appertaining to M. Albermar Barnam of London, and M. Bond, and M. Twyd of Harwich; which went forth the first day of February last. The second was the Margaret and Iohn belonging to M. Wats of London: The third was the Minion: The fourth was the Ascension. The fifth was the Centurion of Master Cordal: The six the Violet: the seventh the Samuel: the eighth the Crescent: the ninth the Elizabeth: and the 10. was the Richard belonging to M. Duffield. All these ships bring of notable and approued seruice, comming neere to the mouth of the Straights hard by the coast of Barbary, descried twelue tall Gallies brauely furnished and strongly prouided with men and munition, ready to seaze vpon these English ships: which being perceiued by the Captaines and Masters thereof, wee made speedy preparation for the defence of our selues, still waiting all the night long for the approaching of the enemye. In the morning early being the Tuesday in Easter weeke, and the 24 of April 1590, according to our vsual customes, we said Seruice and made our prayers vnto Almightye God, beseeching him to saue vs from the hands of such tyrants as the Spaniards, whom we iustly imagined to be, and whom we knew and had found to be our most mortall enemies vpon the Sea. And hauing finished our prayers, and set our selues in a readinesse, we perceiued them to come towards vs, and that they were indeede the Spanish Gallies that lay vnder the conduct of Andre Doria, who is Vice-roy for the King of Spaine in the Straights of Gibraltar, and a notable knowne enemy to all Englishmen. So when they came somewhat neerer vnto vs, they waied vs a maine for the King of Spaine, and wee waied them a maine for the Queene of England, at which time it pleased Almightye God greatly to encourage vs all in such sort, as that the neerer they came the lesse we feared their great multitudes and huge number of men, which were planted in those Gallies to the number of two or three hundred men in eche Gallie. And it was thus concluded among vs, that the foure first and tallest ships should be placed hindmost, and the weaker & smallest ships for most, and so it was performed, every man being ready to take part of such successe as it should please God to send.

At the first encounter the Gallies came vpon vs very fiercely, yet God so strengthened vs, that if they had bene ten times more, we had not feared them at all. Whereupon the Salomon being a hot shippe, and hauing sundry cast pieces in her, gaue the first shotte in such a lowe sort, as that it shored away so many men as fate on the one side of a Gallie, and pierced her through in such maner, as that she was ready to sinke, which made them to assault vs the more fiercely. Whereupon the rest of our shippes, especially the foure chiefest, namely, the Margaret and Iohn, the Minion, and the Ascension followed, and gaue a hot charge vpon them, and they at vs, where began a hot and fierce battaile with great valiancie the one against the other, and so continued for the space of sixe houres. About the beginning of this our fight there came two Flemings to our fleet, who seeing the force of the Gallies to be so great, the one of them presently peeled, strooke his sailes, and was taken by the Gallies, whereas if they would haue offered themselves to haue fought in our behalfe and their owne defence, they needed not to haue bene taken so cowardly as they were to their cost. The other Fleming being also ready to performe the like piece of seruice began to baile his sailes, and intended to haue peeled immediatly. But the Trumpetter in that shippe plucked forth his faultchion and stepped to the Pilote at the helme, and howed that if he did not speedily put off to the English fleet, and so take part with them, he would presently kill him: which the Pilote for feare of death did, and so by that meanes they were defended from present death, and from the tyrannie of those Spaniards, which doubtlesse they should haue found at their handes.

houres long.

20 saint hearted Fleming.

Thus we continued in fight sixe houres and somewhat more, wherein God gaue vs the vpper hand, and we escaped the hands of so many enemies, who were constrained to flie into harbour and shroude themselves from vs, and with speed to secke for their owne safetie. This was the handie worke of God, who defended vs all from danger in such sort, as that there was not one man of vs slaine. And in all this fierce assault made vpon vs by the Spanish power, wee sustained no hurt or damage at all more then this, that the shrouds and backe-stay of the Salomon, who gaue the first and last shot, and galled the enemye shewdly all the time of the battell, were cleane stricken off.

The battell being ceased, we were constrained for want of wind to stay and waite by and downe, and then went backe againe to Tition in Barbary, which is sixe leagues off from Gibraltar, and when we came thither we found the people wonderous fauourable to vs, who being but Moores and heathen people shewd vs where to haue fresh water and al other necessities for vs. And there we had such good intertainment, as if we had bene in any place of England.

The gouernour was one that fauoured vs greatly, whom wee in respect of his great friendship presented with giftes and such commodities as we had in our custodie, which he wonderfully wel accepted of: and here we stayed foure dayes.

After the battell was ceased, which was on Easter Tuesday, we stayed for want of winde be-

foze Gibraltar, vntill the next morning, where wee were becalmed, and therefore looked euery houre when they would haue sent forth some fresh supply against vs, but they were farre vnable to doe it, for all their Gallies were so foze battered, that they durst not come forth of the harbour, by reason of our hot resistance which they so lately before had receiued. Yet were they greatly vexed thereunto by the Gouernour of the said Towne of Gibraltar.

At our being at Ticion in Barbary, there we heard report of the hurt that wee had done to the Gallies, for at our comming from them wee could not well discerne any thing at all by reason of the smoake which the powder had made: there we heard that we had almost spoiled those twelue Gallies by shooting them cleane through, that two of them were ready to sinke, and that wee had slaine of their men such great abundance, as that they were not able to furnish forth any more Gallies at all for that pce.

Thus after we came from Ticion, we assayed to depart the Straight three seuerall times, but could not passe, yet, God be thanked, the fourth time wee came safely away, and so sailed with a pleasant winde vntill wee came vpon the coast of England, which was in the beginning of the moneth of July 1590.

The valiant fight performed in the Straight of Gibraltar, by the Centurion of London, against fise Spanish Gallies, in the moneth of April 1591.

In the moneth of Nouember 1590, there were sundry shippes appertaining to seuerall Marchants of London, which were rigged and fraught forth with marchandize, for sundry places within the Straight of Gibraltar: who, together hauing winde and weather, which oft-time fell out very vncertaine, arriued safely in short space, at such places as they desired. Among whom was the Centurion of London, a very tall shippe of burden, yet but weakely manned, as appeareth by this discourse following.

This afore said shippe called The Centurion safely arriued at Marseils, where after they had deliuered their goods, they stayed about the space of fise weekes, and better, and then tooke in landing, intending to returne to England.

Now when the Centurion was ready to come away from Marseils, there were sundry other shippes of smaller burden which entreated the Master thereof, (whose name is Robert Bradshaw, dwelling at Lime-house) to stay a day or two for them, vntill they were in a readinesse to depart with them, thereby perswading them, that it would be farre better for them to stay and goe together in respect of their assistance, then to depart of themselves without company, and so happily for want of aide fall into the hands of their enemies in the Spanish Gallies. Upon which reasonable perswasion, notwithstanding that this shippe was of such sufficiency as they might hazard her in the danger of the Sea, yet they stayed for those little shippes, according to their request, who together did put to Sea from Marseils, and vowed in generall not to flie one from another, if they should happen to meete with any Spanish Gallies.

These small shippes, accompanied with the Centurion, sayling along the coast of Spaine, were vpon Easter day in the Straight of Gibraltar suddenly becalmed, where immediatly they saw sundry Gallies make towards them, in very valiant and couragious foze: the chiefe Leaders and souldiers in those Gallies brauely apparelled in like coates, with their silver whistles about their neckes, and great plumes of feathers in their hattes, who with their Caliuets shot at the Centurion so fast as they might: so that by 10. of the clocke and somewhat before, they had boorded the Centurion, who before their comming had prepared for them, and intended to giue them so soure a welcome as they might. And thereupon hauing prepared their close fights, and all things in a readinesse, they called vpon God, on whom onely they trusted: and hauing made their prayers, and cheered by one another to fight so long as life endured, they beganne to discharge their great Ordnance vpon the Gallies, but the little shippes durst not come forthward, but lay aloofe, while fise Gallies had boorded them, yea and with their grappling irons made their Gallies fast to the said shippe called the Centurion.

The Gallies were grappled to the Centurion in this maner, two lay on one side, and two on another, and the Admirall lay full in the sterne, which galled and battered the Centurion so foze, that her maine Mast was greatly weakened, her sailes filled with many holes, and the Mizen and sterne made almost vnersuiceable.

During which time there was a foze and deadly fight on both sides, in which the Trumpet of the Centurion sounded forth the deadly points of warre, and encouraged them to fight manfully against their aduersaries: on the contrary part, there was no warlike Musicke in the Spanish Gallies, Gallies, but onely their whistles of silver, which they sounded forth to their owne contentment: in which fight many a Spaniard was turned into the Sea, and they in multitudes came crawling and hung vpon the side of the shippe, intending to haue entred into the same, but such was the courage of the Englishmen, that so fast as the Spaniards did come to enter, they gaue them such entertainment, that some of them were glad to tumble aliue into the Sea, being remedlesse for euer to get by aliue. In the Centurion there were in all, of men and boyes, fourtie and eight, who together fought most valiantly, and so galled the enemy, that many a braue and lustie Spaniard lost his life in that place.

The Centurion was fired fise seuerall times, with wilde fire and other prouision, which the Spaniards threw in for that purpose: yet, God be thanked, by the great and diligent foresight of the Master it did no harme at all.

In euery of the Gallies there were about 200. souldiers: who together with the shot, spoiled, rent, and battered the Centurion very sore, shot through her maine Mast, and slew 4. of the men in the said shippe, the one of them being the Masters mate.

Ten other persons were hurt, by meanes of splinters which the Spaniards shotte: yea, in the ende when their prouision was almost spent, they were constrained to shoote at them hammers, and the chaines from their slaues, and yet God bee thanked, they receiued no more damage: but by spoyling and ouerwearying of the Spaniards, the Englishmen constrained them to vngripple themselves, and get them going: and sure if there had bene any other fresh shippe or succour to haue relieved and assisted the Centurion, they had slaine, suncke, or taken all those Gallies and their Souldiers.

The Dolphin lay a loose off and durst not come neere, while the other two small shippes fledde away, so that one of the Gallies went from the Centurion and set vpon the Dolphin, which shippe immediatly was set on fire with their owne powder, whereby both men and shippe perished: but whether it was with their good wits or no, that was not knowne vnto the Centurion, but sure, if it had come forward, and bene an aide vnto the Centurion, it is to bee supposed that it had not perished.

Five houres and a halfe this fight continued, in which time both were glad to depart onely to breathe themselves, but when the Spaniards were gone, they neuer durst returne to fight: yet the next day fire other Gallies came and looked at them, but durst not at any hand meddle with them.

Thus God deliuered them from the handes of their enemies, and gaue them the victorie: for which they heartily praised him, and not long after safely arriued in London.

There were present at this fight Master John Hawes Marchant, and sundry other of good accompt.

A report of the trueth of the fight about the Isles of Acores, the last of August 1591. betwixt the Reuenge, one of her Maiesties shippes, and an Armada of the king of Spaine; Penned by the honourable Sir Water Raleigh knight.

Because the rumours are diuersly spread, as well in England as in the Lowe countreies and elsewhere, of this late encounter betweene her Maiesties ships and the Armada of Spaine; and that the Spaniards according to their vsuall manner, fill the world with their vaine-glorious haunts, making great apparance of victories, when on the contrary, themselves are inmost commonly and shamefully beaten and dishonoured; thereby hoping to possesse the ignorant multitude by anticipating & forerunning false reports: It is agreeable with all good reason, for manifestation of the truth, to overcome falsehood and vntrewth; that the beginning, continuance and successe of this late honourable encounter of Sir Richard Greenuill, and other her Maiesties Captaines, with the Armada of Spaine; should be truly set downe and published without partialtie or false imaginations. And it is no marueile that the Spaniard should seeke by false and slanderous pamphlets, aduises and Letters, to couer their owne losse, and to derogate from others their due honors, especially in this fight being performed far off: seeing they were not ashamed in the yeere 1588. when they purposed the inuasion of this land, to publish in sundry languages in print, great victories in wordes, which they pleaded to haue obtained against this Realme; and spread the same in a most false sort ouer all parts of France, Italy, and elsewhere. When shortly after it was happily manifested in very deed to all Nations, how their Flavy which they termed invincible, consisting of 140. saile of shippes, not onely of their owne kingdome, but strengthened with the greatest Argosies, Portugal Caracks, Florentines, and huge hulks of other Countreies, were by 30. of her Maiesties owne ships of war, and a few of our owne Marchants, by the wise, valiant, and aduantageous conduct of the L. Charles Howard high Admirall of England, beaten and shuffled together; euen from the Lizard in Cornwall first to Portland, where they shamefully left Don Pedro de Valdes, with his mighty ship; from Portland to Cales, where they lost Hugo de Moncado, with the Gallias of which he was Captaine, and from Cales, vniuen with Iquibs from their anchor, were chased out of the sight of England, round about Scotland and Ireland. Where for the sympathie of their barbarous religion, hoping to finde succour and assistance, a great part of them were crushed against the rocks, and those other that landed, being very many in number, were notwithstanding broken, slaine, and taken, and so sent from village to village coupled in halters, to be shipped into England. Where her Maistie of her Princely and inuincible disposition, disdaining to put them to death, and scorning either to retaine or entertaine them: they were all sent backe againe to their countreys, to witnes and recount the worthy achievements of their inuincible and dreadfull flauy: Of which the number of Souldiers, the fearefull burthen of their shippes, the commanders names of euery Squadron, with all other their magazines of provisions, were put in print; as an Army and flauy vnersistable, and disdaining prevention. With all which so great and terrible an ostentation, they did not in all their sailing round about England, so much as sinke or take one shippe, Barke, Pinnesse, or Cockbott of ours: or euer burnt so much as one shepescote of this land. Whereas on the contrarie; Sir Francis Drake, with onely 800. souldiers not long before, landed in their Indies, and forced Santiago, Santo Domingo, Cartagena, and the forts of Florida.

And after that, Sir John Norris marched from Peniche in Portugall, with a handfull of souldiers, to the gates of Lisbon, being about 40 English miles. Where the Earle of Essex himselfe and other valiant Gentlemen braued the Citie of Lisbon, encamped at the very gates; from whence, after many daies abode, finding neither promised partie, nor provision to batter; they made retreat by land, in despite of all their Garrisons, both of horse & foote. In this sort I haue a little digressed from my first purpose, onely by the necessarie comparison of theirs and our actions: the one couetous of honour without baunt of ostentation; the other so greedy to purchase the opinion of their owne affaires, and by false rumors to relist the blaks of their owne dishonours, as they will not onely not blush to spread all manner of vntruthes: but euen for the least aduantage, be it but for the taking of one poore aduenturer of the English, will celebrate the victorie with bonfires in euery towne, alwayes spending more in faggots, then the purchase was worth they obtained. When as we neuer thought it worthy the consumption of two billes, when we haue taken eight or ten of their Indian shippes at one time, and twentie of the Brasill fleet. Such is the difference betweene true valure, and ostentation: and betweene honorable actions, and frivolous vaine glorious baunts. But now to returne to my purpose.

The L. Thomas Howard with sixe of her Maisties shippes, sixe victualers of London, the Barke Raleigh, & two or three other Pinnales riding at anchor nere vnto Flores, one of the Western Islands of the Azores, the last of August in the afternoone, had intelligence by one Captaine Middleton of the approach of the Spanish Armada. Which Middleton being in a very good sailer had kept them company three daies before, of good purpose, both to discouer their forces the more, as also to giue aduise to my L. Thomas of their approach. Hee had no sooner deliuered the newes but the fleet was in sight: many of our shippes companies were on shore in the Ilande; some prouiding ballast for their ships; others filling of water and refreshing themselves from the land with such things as they could either for money, or by force recover. By reason whereof our ships being all pestered and roimaging euery thing out of order, very light for want of ballast, and that which was most to our disaduantage, the one halfe part of the men of euery shippe sicke, and utterly vnersuiteable: for in the Reuenge there were ninety diseased: in the Bonauenture, not so many in health as could handle her maine saile. For had not twenty men bene taken out of a Barke of Sir George Careys, his being commaunded to be sunke, and those appointed to her, she had hardly euer recovered England. The rest, for the most parte, were in little better state. The names of her Maisties shippes were these as followeth, the Desiance, which was Admirall, the Reuenge Viceadmirall, the Bonauenture commaunded by Captaine Crosse, the Lion by George Fenner, the Foresight by M. Thomas Vauasour, and the Crane by Duffild. The Foresight & the Crane being but small ships; only the other were of the middle size; the rest, besides the Barke Raleigh, commaunded by Captaine Thim, were victualers; and of small force or none. The Spanish fleet hauing shadowed their approach by reason of the Ilande; were now so soone at hand, as our shippes had scarce time to way their anchor, but some of them were driuen to let slippe their Cables and set saile. Sir Richard Grinnile was the last that wayed, to recover the men that were vpon the Ilande, which otherwise had bene lost. The L. Thomas with the rest very hardly recovered the winde, which Sir Richard Grinnile not being able to doe, was perswaded by the

the Master and others to cut his maine sayle, and cast about, and to truit to the sayling of the ship; for the Squadron of Sicill were on his weather bow. But Sir Richard utterly refused to turne from the enemye, allcaging that hee would rather choole to die, then to dishonour himselfe, his countrey, and her Maiesties shippe, perswading his companie that hee would passe through the two Squadrons, in despyght of them, and enforce those of Sicill to giue him way. Which hee perswaded vpon diuers of the formost, who, as the Mariners terme it, sprang their luffe, and fell vnder the lee of the Reuenge. But the other course had bene the better, and might right well haue bene answered in so great an impossibility of pccualing. Notwithstanding out of the greatnesse of his minde, he could not be perswaded. In the meane while as hee attended those which were nearest him, the great San Philip bring in the winde of him, and cunning towards him, becalmed his sailes in such sort, as the shippe could neither make way, nor feele the helme: so huge and high charged was the Spanish ship, being of a thousand and five hundred tuns. Who after layd the Reuenge aboard. Then he was thus bereft of his sailes, the ships that were vnder his lee luffing vp, also layd him aboard: of which the next was the Admirall of the Sicaines, a very mightie and puissant shippe commanded by Britrandona. The sayd Philip carried thre eire of ordnance on a side, and eleuen pieces in euery eire. She shot eight forth right out of her chace, besides those of her sterne ports.

After the Reuenge was entangled with this Philip, foure other boorded her; two on her larboord, and two on her starboord. The fight thus beginning at thre of the clock in the afternoone, continued very terrible all that euening. But the great San Philip hauing receiued the lower eire of the Reuenge, discharged with crossebar shot, shifted her selfe with all diligence from her sides, utterly misliking her first entertainment. Some say that the shippe foundred, but we cannot report it for truth, vnlesse we were assured. The Spanish ships were filled with companies of souldiers, in some two hundred besides the mariners; in some five, in others eight hundred. In ours there were none at all beside the mariners, but the seruants of the commanders and some few voluntary gentlemen onely. After many enterchanged volies of great ordnance and small shot, the Spaniards deliberated to enter the Reuenge, and made diuers attempts, hoping to force her by the multitudes of their armed souldiers and Musketters, but were still repulsed againe and and againe, and at all times beaten backe into their owne ships, or into the seas. In the beginning of the fight, the George Noble of London hauing receiued some shot thorow her by the Armadas, fell vnder the lee of the Reuenge, and asked Sir Richard what he would command him, being but one of the victualers and of small force: Sir Richard bid him saue himselfe, and leaue him to his fortune. After the fight had thus, without intermission, continued while the day lasted and some houres of the night, many of our men were slaine and hurte, and one of the great Gallions of the Armada, and the Admirall of the Muskets both sunke, and in many other of the Spanish shippes great slaughter was made. Some write that Sir Richard was very dangerously hurt almost in the beginning of the fight, and lay speechlesse for a time ere hee recovered. But two of the Reuenges owne company, brought home in a ship of Lime from the Ilandes, examined by some of the Lordes, and others, affirmed that hee was neuer so wounded as that hee forsooke the upper decke, till an houre before midnight; and then being shot into the bodie with a Musket as hee was a dyelling, was againe shot into the head, and withall his Chirurgeon wounded to death. This agreeth also with an examination taken by Sir Francis Godolphin, of foure other mariners of the same shippe being returned, which examination, the said Sir Francis sent vnto Master William Killegrue, of her Maiesties priuy Chamber.

But to returne to the fight, the Spanish ships which attempted to bord the Reuenge, as they were wounded and beaten off, so alwayes others came in their places, she hauing neuer lesse then two mightie Gallions by her sides, and aboard her: So that ere the morning, from thre of the clocke the day before, there had fiftene seuerall Armadas assailed her; and all so ill approued their entertainment, as they wert by the breake of day, far more willing to harken to a composition, then hastily to make any more assaults or entrics. But as the day encreased, so our men decreased: and as the light grew more and more, by so much more grewe our discomforts. For none appeared in sight but enemies, sauing one small ship called the Pilgrim, commanded by Iacob Whiddon, who howered all night to see the successe: but in the morning beating with the Reuenge, was hunted like a hare amongst many rauinous houndes, but escaped.

All the powder of the Reuenge to the last barrell was now spent, all her pikes broken, fortie of her best men slaine, and the most part of the rest hurt. In the beginning of the fight shee had but one hundred free from sickness, and foure score & ten sicke, laid in hold vpon the Wallast. A small troupe to man such a ship, & a weak Garrison to resist so mightie an army. By those hundred all was sustained, the volies, boordings, and entricings of fiftene ships of warre, besides those which beat her at large. On the contrary, the Spanish were alwayes supplied with sculdiers brought from euery Squadron: all manner of Armes and powder at will. Unto ours there remained no comfort at all, no hope, no supply either of ships, men, or weapons; the Hasses all beaten ouer boord, all her tackle cut asunder, her hypper worke altogether rased, and in effect enueded there was with the water, but the very foundation of boitome of a ship, nothing being left ouer head either for flight or defence. Sir Richard finding himselfe in this distresse, and unable any longer to make resistance, hauing endured in this fiftene houres fight, the assault of fiftene seuerall Armadas, all by turnes aboord him, and by estimation eight hundred shotte of great Artillerie, besides many assaults and entrees; and that himselfe and the shippe must needs be possessed by the enemy, who were now all cast in a ring round about him (The Reuenge not able to mooue one way or other, but as she was moued with the waues and billow of the sea) commaunded the Haster gunner, whom hee knew to be a most resolute man, to split and sinke the shippe; that thereby nothing might remaine of glory or victorie to the Spaniards: seeing in so many houres fight, and with so great a Haue they were not able to take her, hauing had fiftene houres time, about ten thousand men, & fiftie and three saile of men of warre to performe it withall: and perswaded the company, or as many as hee could induce, to peebe themselves vnto God, and to the mercie of none else; but as they had, like valiant resolute men, repulsed so many enemies, they should not now shorten the honour of their Nation, by prolonging their owne liues for a few houres, or a few dayes. The Haster gunner readily condescended and diuers others; but the Captaine and the Haster were of another opinion, and besought Sir Richard to haue care of them: allcaging that the Spaniard would be as ready to entertaine a composition, as they were willing to offer the same: and that there being diuers sufficient and valiant men yet liuing, and whose wounds were not mortal, they might do their Countrey and prince acceptable seruice hereafter. And whereas Sir Richard had allcaged that the Spaniards should neuer glory to haue taken one shippe of her Maestie, seeing they had so long and so notably defended themselves; they answered, that the shippe had fire foote water in holbe, thice shot under water, which were so weakely stopped, as with the first working of the sea, she must needs sinke, and was besides so crusht and byused, as shee could neuer be remoued out of the place.

The Spanish 53.

And as the matter was thus in dispute, and Sir Ricard refusing to hearken to any of those reasons; the Haster of the Reuenge (while the Captaine warne vnto him the greater party) was conuoyd aboord the Generall Don Alfonso Baçan. Who (finding none ouer hastie to enter the Reuenge againe, doubting least Sir Richard would haue blowne them by and himselfe, and perceiving by the report of the Haster of the Reuenge his dangerous disposition) peebed that all their liues should be saued, the company sent for England, & the better soyt to pay such reasonable ransome as their estate would beare, and in the meane season to be free from Gallie or imprisonment. To this he so much the rather condescended as wel, as I haue said, for feare of further losse and mischief to themselves, as also for the desire he had to recouer Sir Richard Greenuil; whom for his notable valure he seemed greatly to honour and admire.

When this answer was returned, and that safetie of life was promised, the common soyt being now at the ende of their perill, the most drew backe from Sir Richard and the Haster gunner, being no hard matter to dissuade men from death to life. The Haster gunner finding himselfe and Sir Richard thus preuented and mastered by the greater number, would haue slaine himselfe with a sword, had he not bene by force with-held and locked into his Cabben. Then the Generall sent many boates aboord the Reuenge, and diuers of our men fearing Sir Richards disposition, stole away aboord the Generall and other shippes. Sir Richard thus ouermatched, was sent vnto by Alfonso Baçan to remouue out of the Reuenge, the shippe being maruellous vnfortunozie, filled with blood and bodies of dead, and wounded men like a slaughter house. Sir Richard answered that hee might doe with his body what he list, for hee esteemed it not, and as he was carried out of the shippe hee swounded, and reuiuing againe desired the company to pray for him. The Generall vsed Sir Richard with all humanitie, and left nothing vnattempted that tended to his recouerie, highly commending his valour and worthinesse, and greatly bewailing the danger wherein he was, being vnto them a rare spectacle, and a resolution sildome approued, to see one shippe turne toward so many enemies, to endure the charge and booyding of so many huge Armadas, and to resist and repell the assaults and entrees of so many sculdiers. All which and moze is confirmed by a Spanish Captaine of the same Armada, and a present actor in the fight, who being seuered from the rest in a storme, was by the Lion of London a small ship taken, and is now prisoner in London.

The generall commander of the Armada, was Don Alphonso Baçan, brother to the Marques of Santa Cruz. The admiral of the Biscaine Squadron, was Britandona, Of the Squadron of Siuil, Parques of Arumburch. The Pulkes and Flybotes were comāded by Luis Continho. There were slaine and drowned in this fight, well nere one thousand of the enemies, and two speciall commanders Don Luis de Sant Iohn, and Don George de Primaria de Mallaga, as the Spanissh captaine confesseth, besides diuers others of speciall account, whereof as yet report is not made.

The Admirall of the Pulkes and the Ascension of Siuill were both sunke by the side of the Reuenge; one other recouered the rode of Saint Michael, and sunke also there; a fourth ranne her selfe with the shoze to saue her men. Sir Richard died as it is sayd, the second or third day aboord the Generall, and was by them greatly bewailed. What became of his body, whether it were buried in the sea or on the land we know not: the comfort that remaineth to his friends is, that hee hath ended his life honourably in respect of the reputation wonne to his nation and countrey, and of the same to his posteritie, and that being dead, he hath not outliued his owne honour.

For the rest of her Maiesties ships that entred not so farre into the fight as the Reuenge, the reasons and causes were these. There were of them but fixe in all, whereof two but small ships; the Reuenge ingaged past recouery: The Island of Flores was on the one side, 53 saile of the Spanissh, diuided into squadrons on the other, all as full filled with souldiers as they could containe: Almost the one halfe of our men sicke and not able to serue: the ships growne foule, vnrcomaged, and scarcely able to beare any saile for want of ballast, hauing bene fixe moneths at the sea before. If all the rest had encred, all had bene lost: for the very hugenes of the Spanissh flecte, if no other violence had bene offered, would haue crushed them betweene them into shiners. Of which the dishonour and losse to the Queene had bene farre greater then the spoyle or harme that the enemye could any way haue receiued. Notwithstanding it is very true, that the Lord Thomas would haue entred betweene the squadrons, but the rest would not condescend; and the master of his owne ship offred to leape into the sea, rather then to conduct that her Maiesties ship and the rest to bee a pray to the enemye, where there was no hope nor possibilitie either of defence or victory. Which also in my opinion had ill sorted or answered the discretion and trust of a Generall, to commit himselfe and his charge to an assured destruction, without hope or any likelyhood of preuailing: thereby to diminish the strength of her Maiesties Navy, and to enrich the pride and glory of the enemye. The Foresight of the Queenes commaunded by D. Thomas Vauisor performed a very great fight, and stayed two houres as nere the Reuenge as the weather would permit him, not forsaking the fight, till he was like to be encompassed by the squadrons, & with great difficultie cleared himselfe. The rest gaue diuers volleys of shot, and entred as farre as the place permitted, and their owne necessities, to keepe the weather gage of the enemye, untill they were parted by night. A fewe dayes after the fight was ended, and the English prisoners dispersed into the Spanissh and Indie ships, there arose so great a storme from the West and Northwest, that all the flecte was dispersed, as well the Indian flecte which were then come vnto them, as the rest of the Armada that attended their arriuall, of which 14 saile together with the Reuenge, and in her 200 Spaniards, were cast away vpon the Isle of S. Michael. So it pleased them to honour the buriall of that renowned ship the Reuenge, not suffering her to perish alone, for the great honour she atchieued in her life time. On the rest of the Ilandes there were cast away in this storme, 15 or 16 more of the ships of warre: and of an hundred and odde saile of the Indie flecte, expected this yeere in Spaine, what in this tempest, and what before in the bay of Mexico, and about the Bermudas, there were 70 and odde consumed and lost, with those taken by our shippes of London, besides one very rich Indian ship, which set her selfe on fire, being boorded by the Pilgrim, and fine other taken by master Was his ships of London, between the Hauana and Cape S. Antonio. The fourth of this moneth of Nouember we receiued letters from the Tercera, affirming that there are 3000 bodies of men remaining in that Island, saued out of the perished ships: & that by the Spaniards owne confession, there are 10000 cast away in this storme, besides those that are perished betweene the Ilandes and the maine. Thus it hath pleased God to fight for vs, and to defend the iustice of our cause, against the ambitious and bloody pretences of the Spaniard, who seeking to deuoure all nations, are themselves deuoured. A manifest testimony how iniust and displeasing, their attempts are in the sight of God, who hath pleased to witnes by the successe of their affaires, his dislike of their bloody and iniurious designes, purposed and practised against all Chyistian princes, ouer whom they seeke vnlawfull and vngodly rule and Empery.

One day or two before this wracke happened to the Spanissh flecte, when as some of our prisoners desired to be set on shoze vpon the Ilandes, hoping to be from thence transported into England, which libertie was formerly by the Generall promised: One Morice Fitz Iohn, sonne of olde Iohn of Desmond, a notable traytour, cousin german to the late Earle of Desmond, was sent to the English from shippe to shippe, to perswade them to serue the King of Spaine.

The arguments hee vsed to induce them were these. The increase of pay which he promised to be trebled: aduancement to the better sort: and the exercise of the true Catholique Religion, and safetie of their soules to all. For the first, euen the beggerly and vnnaturall behaviour of those English and Irish rebels, that serued the King in that present action, was sufficient to answer that first argument of rich pay. For so poore and beggerly they were, as for want of apparell they stripped their poore Countrey men prisoners out of their ragged garments, worne to nothing by fere months seruice, and spared not to despoyle them euen of their bloody shirtes, from their wounded bodie, and the very shooes from their feete; A notable testimonie of their rich entertainment and great wages. The second reason was hope of aduancement if they serued well, and would continue faithfull to the King. But what man can bee so blockishly ignorant euer to expect place or honour from a foraine King, hauing no other argument or perswasion then his owne disloyaltie; to be vnnaturall to his owne Countrey that bred him; to his parents that begat him, and rebellious to his true Prince, to whose obedience he is bound by oath, by nature, and by Religion? No, they are onely assured to be employed in all desperate enterprises, to bee helde in scorn and disdain euer among those whom they serue. And that euer traitour was either trusted or aduanced I could neuer yet reade, neither can I at this time remember any example. And no man could be haue lesse become the place of an Orator for such a purpose, then this Morice of Desmond. For the Erie his cofen being one of the greatest subjects in that kingdom of Ireland, hauing almost whole Countreys in his possession; so many goodly Mannors, castles, and lordships; the Count Palatine of Kerry, fise hundred gentlemen of his owne name and family to follow him, besides others (all which he possessed in peace for thre or foure hundred yeeres) was in lesse then thre yeeres after his adhering to the Spaniards and rebellion, beaten from all his holdes, not so many as ten gentlemen of his name left liuing, himselfe taken and beheaded by a souldier of his owne nation, and his land giuen by a Parliament to her Maiestie, and possessed by the English: Disother cofen Sir Iohn of Desmond taken by Master Iohn Zouch, and his body hanged ouer the gates of his natine Citie to be deuoured by rauen: the thirde brother Sir Iames hanged, drawne, and quartered in the same place. If hee had withall vaunted of his successe of his owne house, no doubt the argument would haue moued much, and wrought great effect; which because hee for that present forgot, I thought it good to remember in his behalfe. For matter of Religion it would require a particuler volume, if I should set downe how irreligiously they couer their greedy and ambitious pretences, with that veile of pietie. But sure I am, that there is no kingdome or common-wealth in all Europe, but if they be reformed, they then inuade it for religion sake: if it bee, as they terme Catholique, they pretend title; as if the Kings of Castile were the naturall heires of all the world: and so betweene both, no kingdome is vnought. Where they dare not with their owne forces to inuade, they basely entertaine the traitours and vabonds of all Nations; seeking by those and by their rummage Iesuits to winne parts, and haue by that meane ruined many Noble houses and others in this lande, and haue extinguished both their liues and families. What good, honour, or fortune euer man yet by them achieved, is yet vnheard of, or vnwritten. And if our English Papists doe but looke into Portugall, against which they haue no pretence of Religion, how the Nobilitie are put to death, imprisoned, their rich men made a praye, and all sorts of people captiued; they shall finde that the obedience euen of the Turke is easie and a libertie, in respect of the slauerie and tyrannie of Spaine. What haue they done in Sicill, in Naples, Millaine, and in the Low countreys; who hath there bene spared for Religion at all? And it cometh to my remembrance of a certaine Burger of Anewerpe, whose house being entered by a company of Spanissh souldiers, when they first sacked the Citie, hee brought them to spare him and his goods, being a good Catholique, and one of their owne partie and faction. The Spaniards answered, that they knew him to be of a good conscience for himselfe, but his money, plate, iewels, and goods, were all hereticall, and therefore good prize. So they abused and tormented the foolish Fleming, who hoped that an Agnus Dei had bene a sufficient target against all force of that holy and charitable nation. Neither haue they at any time as they prot. invaded the kingdomes of the Indies and Peru, and elsewhere, but onely led thercunto, rather to reduce the people to Chzistianitie, then for either gold or Emperie. When as in one onely Island called Hispaniola, they haue wasted thirtie hundred thousand of the naturall people, besides many millions else in other places of the Indies: a poore and harmelesse people created of God, and might haue bene worne to his knowledge, as many of them were, and almost as many as euer were perswaded thereunto. The storie whereof is at large written by a Bishop of their owne nation called Bartholomew delas Casas, and translated into English and many other languages, intituled The Spanissh cruelties. Who would therefore repose trust in such a nation of rauenous strangers, and especially in those Spaniards which more greedily thirst after English English blood, then after the lues of any other people of Europe, for the many overthrowes and dishonours they haue receiued at our hands, whose weakenesse wee haue discovered to the world, and whose forces at home, abroad, in Europe, in India, by sea and land, wee haue euen with handfulls of men and shippes, overthrowen and dishonoured. Let not therefore any English man, of what religion soeuer, haue other opinion of the Spaniards, but that those whom hee seeketh to winne of our Nation, he esteemeth base and trayterous, unworthy persons, or vncorruptible fooles: and that he vseth his pretence of religion, for no other purpose but to bewitch vs from the obedience of our naturall Prince; there by hoping in time to bring vs to slavery and subiection, and then none shall be vnto them so odious, and disdayned as the traitours themselves; who haue solde their Countrey to a stranger, and forsaken their faith and obedience contrarie to nature & religion; and contrarie to that humane and generall honour, not onely of Christians, but of heathen and irreligious nations, who haue alwayes sustayned what labour soeuer, and embraced euen death it selfe, for their countrey, Prince, or common-wealth. To conclude, it hath euer to this day pleased God to prosper and defend her Maiestie, to breake the purposes of malicious enemies, of forwoyne traytors, and of inuict practises and inuasions. She hath euer bene honoured of the worthiest kings, serued by faithfull subiects, and shall by the fauour of God, resist, repell, and confound all whatsoeuer attempts against her sacred person or kingdom. In the meane time let the Spaniard and traytour baunt of their successe, and wee her true and obedient vassals, guided by the shining light of her vertues, shall alwayes loue her, serue her, and obey her to the end of our lues.

A particular note of the Indian fleet, expected to haue come into Spaine this present yeere of 1591. with the number of shippes that are perished of the same: according to the examination of certaine Spaniards lately taken and brought into England by the ships of London.

The fleet of Noua Hispania, at their first gathering together and setting forth, were two and fiftie sailes. The Admirall was of five hundred tunnes, and the Vice Admirall of the same burthen. Foure or five of the shippes were of nine hundred and 1000 tunnes a peece, some five hundred, and some foure hundred and the least of two hundred tuns. Of this fleet 19 were cast away, and in them 2600 men by estimation, which was done along the coast of Noua Hispania, so that of the same fleet there came to the Hauana but 33 sailes.

The fleet of Terra Firma were, at their first departure from Spaine, fiftie sailes, which were bound for Nombre de Dios, where they did discharge their lading, and thence returned to Caragena, for their healths sake, vntill the time the treasure was ready they should take in, at the said Nombre de Dios. But before this fleet departed, some were gone by one or two at a time, so that onely 23 sailes of this fleet arrived in the Hauana.

| | | 9 sailes of the Hunduras . |

The whole 77 shippes, ioyned and set sailes all together at the Hauana, the 17 of July, according to our account, and kept together vntill they came into the height of thirrie five degrees, which was about the tenth of August, where they found the winde at Southwest chaunged suddenly to the North, so that the sea coming out of the Southwest, and the wind very violent at North, they were put all into great extremitie, and then first lost the Generall of their fleet, with 500 men in her; and within three or foure dayes after, another storme rising, there were five or six other of the biggest shippes cast away with all their men, together with their Vice-Admirall.

And in the height of 38, degrees, about the end of August, grew another great storme, in which all the fleet sauing 48. sailes were cast away: which 48. sailes kept together, vntill they came in sight of the Islands of Coruo and Flores, about the fift or sixt of September, at which time a great storme separated them: of which number fiftene or sixteene were after scene by these Spaniards to ride at anchor vnder the Tercera; and twelue or foureteene more to beare with the Island of S. Michael; what became of them after that these Spaniards were taken cannot yet be certified; their opinion is, that very few of the fleet are escaped, but are either drowned or taken. And it is otherwaies of late certified, that of this whole fleet that should haue come into

Spaine

Spaine this yeere, being one hundred twentie and three sayle, there are arruued as yet but five and twentie. This note was taken out of the examination of certaine Spaniards, that were brought into England by fire of the ships of London, which tooke seuen of the aboue named Indian flecte, neere the Ilands of Açores,

A report of Master Robert Flicke directed to Master Thomas Bromley, Master Richard Staper, and Master Cordall concerning the successe of a part of the London supplies sent to my Lord Thomas Howard to the Iles of the Açores, 1591.

Shipfull, my heartie commendations vnto you premised: By my last of the twelfth of August from this place I aduertised you particularly of the accidents of our flecte vntill then. It remaineth now to relate our endeuours in accomplishing the order receiued for the ioyning with my Lorde Thomas Howard; together with the successe wee haue had. Our departure from hence was the seenteenth of August, the winde not seruing before. The next day following I caused a flagge of Counsell to be put forth, wherupon the Captaines and Masters of euery shippe came aboard, and I acquainted them with my Commission, firmed by the Right honourable the Lordes of her Maiesties Counsell, and with all the aduertisements of Sir Edward Denny, of my Lordes determination to remaine threescore leagues to the West of Fayal, spreading North and South betwixt thirtie seuen and a halfe or thirtie eigh and a halfe degrees. And not finding him in this heigh to repaire to the Iles of Flores and Coruo, where a Pinnesse of purpose should stay our comming vntill the last of August, with intent after that day to repaire to the coast of Spaine, about the heigh of The Rocke, some twentie or thirtie leagues off the shoare. The which being aduisedly considered of, hauing regard vnto the shortnesse of time, by reason of our long abode in this place, and the vncertainety of the weather to fauour vs, it was generally holden for the best and securest way to meete with my Lorde, to beare with the heigh of The Rocke, without making any stay vpon the coast, and so directly for the Ilands which was accordingly fully agreed and performed. The 28 day wee had sight of the Burlings, and the 29 being thwart of Peniche, the winde seruing vs, without any stay we directed our course West for the Ilands. The 30 day we met with Captaine Royden in the Red-Rose, sometime called the Golden Dragon, separated from my Lorde of Cumberland in a storme: who certified vs of 50 sayles of the Spanish kings Armadas to be gone for the Ilands, but could not informe vs any newes of my Lord Thomas Howard, otherwise then vpon presumption to remaine about the Ilandes, and so wee continued our course the winde standing with vs.

The 4 of September we recovered Tercera, and ranged along all the Ilands, both on the South and North sides the space of foure dayes: during which time it was not our hap to meete with any shipping, whereby either to vnderstand of my Lord, or of the Indian flecte: hereupon we directed our course to the West from Fayal, according to the instructions of Sir Edward Denny. The 11 day in the plying to the Westwards we deseried a sayle out of our maine toppe, and in the afternoon betweene two and three of the clocke hauing rayced her hull, the weather became calme, so that the ship could not fetch her. I sent off my Skiffe thoroughly manned, furnished with shot and swords, The Cherubin, and the Margaret and John doing the like. Upon this the sayle stood off againe, and the night appoaching, our boates lost her and so returned. In this our pursute after the sayle the Centurion being left a sterne, the next morning wee missed her, and spent that day in plying vp and downe seeking her. And for as much as euery of the ships had receiued order, that, if by extremity of weather or any other mischance they should be seuered from our flecte, they should meete and ioyne at Flores, we, according to the instructions of Sir Edward Denny, proceeded to the finding of my Lord Thomas Howard, being in the heigh appointed and not able to holde the same by reason of extreme tempestes which forced vs to the Iles of Flores and Coruo, which we made the 14 day in the morning, and there also ioyned againe with the Centurion, whose company before we had lost: who declared vnto vs that the 12 day, being the same day they lost vs, they met with five and forty sailles of the Indian flecte. The same night vpon these newes we came to an anchor betweene Flores and Coruo, and the morning following at the brake of day, a flagge of Counsell being put out the Captaines and Masters came aboard me: where, for the desire to vnderstand some tidings of my Lord, as also the supplying of our want of water, it was thought good to send our boats furnished on shoare, vnder the conduct of Captaine Brothius, and then it was also ordered after our departure thence to range along the South

Southside of the Islands to the end we might either understand of my Lord, or else light on the Indian fleet; and in the missing of our purpose to direct our course for Cape Saint Vincente.

The boates, according to the foresayd determination, being sent on shoare, it chanced that The Costely ryding vndermost in the roade, did weigh to bring her selfe more neere among vs for the succour of the boates sent off, and in opening the land discovered two sayles, which we in the roade could not perceiue: whereupon shee gaue vs a warning piece, which caused vs to waue off our boates backe, and before they could recouer our shippes, the dyscryed ships appeared vnto vs, towardes the which we made with all haste, and in a very happie heure, as it pleased God, In that we had not so soone cleared the lande, and spoken with one of them, which was a Barke of Bristol, who had also sought my Lorde in the heigths appointed and could not finde him, but a violent storme arose, in such manner, as if we had remained in the roade, we had bene in daunger of perishing: and the same extremely continued during the space of threescore houres. In which storme I was separated from our fleet, excepte the Cherubin and the Costely, which kept company with mee. And so saying among the Islands, I viewed the roade of Fayal, and finding no Rooders there, went directly for the Ille Tercera.

Storme.

The nineteenth day in the morning coming vnto y same with intent to edge into the Road, a tempest arose and scattered the winde, that we could not seaze it: from the which being driuen we fell among certaine of the Indian Fleet, which the sayde storme disperfed, and put them from the road: whereupon my selfe with the other two ships in companie gaue severall chases, and thereby lost the company each of other.

In following our chase alone noone we made her to strike and yeelde, being a Portugall, laden with hides, salsa-perilla and Anile. At this very instant we espied another, and taking our Prize with vs followed her, and somewhat before night obtayned her, named the Concepcion, Francisco Spinola being Captaine, which was laden with hides, Coehonillio, and certaine raw silke. And for that the seas were so growen, as neither with boate nor shippe they were to be boarded, we kept them till fit opportunitie. The same night a litle before day there happened another into our company, supposing vs by our two prizes to be of their Fleet, which we burnt the morning dissembled.

Prize taken.

A rich West-India Prize
taken.

The 20 day in the morning, the sayle being shot somewhat a head of vs, hauing a speciall care for the safe keeping of the two former, we purposed to cause our Prizes to put out more sayle thereby to keepe them neere in giuing chase to the other: vnto the which the Gaster would not hearken nor be perswaded, but that they would follow vs: by the which his wilfulnesse by such time as we had caused the other to yeelde, and sent men aboard, the Concepcion, Francisco Spinola Captaine being brought a strine, and hauing gotten the winde of vs, stood off with all her sayles bearing, so as we were forced to make a new chase of her: and had not the winde enlarged vpon vs we had lost her. In the pursute before we recouered her and brought our selues againe in company of our other Prizes, the whole day was spent, and by this meanes we lost the oportunitie of that day, the weather fitly seruing to boord the Portugall Prize, which was in great distresse, and made request to take them being readie to sinke, and, as we well perceiued, they ceased not to pumpe day and night: the which ship to all our iudgements the same night perished in the sea.

The one and twentie day the Concepcion, whereof Francisco Spinola was Captaine, being also in a lake, and the same still increasing notwithstanding the continuall pumping, in such sort as not to be kept long about water, I tooke and discharged out of her two and forty chesses of Coehonillio and silkes, and so left her with 11 foote water in holde, and her furniture and 4700 hides, vnto the seas.

The other Prize which we haue brought into the harborough is named Nostra Sennora de los remedios, whereof Francisco Aluares is Captaine, laden with 16 chesses of Coehonillio, certaine fardels of raw silke, and about 4000 hides. Upon the discharge of the goods your worships shall be particularly aduertised thereof.

In the boording of the Prizes the disorder of the company was such, as that they letted not presently besides the rifling of the Spaniards to breake open the chesses and to purloine such money as was in them: notwithstanding that it was ordered at convenient leisure to haue gone aboard my selfe, and there in the presence of three or foure witnesses to haue taken a iust account thereof, and the same to haue put in safe keeping, according to the effects of articles receiued in this behalfe.

And whereas there were also certaine summes of money taken from the company which they had had thus purloyned and embeseled, and the same with some other parcels brought aboard my ship, amounting unto 2129 pezoes & a halfe, the company as pillage due unto them demanded to haue the same shared, which I refused, & openly at the maine mast read the articles signed by my Lord Treasurer and my lord Admirall, whereby we ought to be directed, and that it was not in mee any way to dispose thereof untill the same were finally determined at home. Whereupon they murmured and at last grew into such furie, as that they would haue it or els breake downe the cabbine, which they were also ready to put in practise, whereby I was forced to yield, least the Spaniards which we had aboard being many perceiuing the same, might haue had fit opportunitie to rise against vs, which, after their brawles were appeased, they sought to haue put in execution.

By the last aduise from Castile the Generall of the kings Armada which is lately come to sea hath receiued commaundment to ioyne his Fleet with those of the Indies, and for to stay altogether at Tercera untill the 15 of October: for that 6 pataches with 7 or 8 millions of the kings treasure will come by that time, or els they stay their coming from Hauana until January next, or the kings further pleasure therein to be knowen. These Pataches are said to be of 300 tuns the piece, and to carry 30 pieces of brasse, and also of saile reported to haue the aduantage of any shipping.

There perished of the Indies Fleet sunke in the sea before their coming to Flores 11 sailes, whereof the General was one, and not one man saved. And it is by the Spaniards themselves presumed that the stormes which we had at Flores & at Tercera haue detoured many more of them, whereof in part we were eye witnesses. And so what by the seas and our men of warre I presume that of 75 sailes that came from Hauana, halfe of them will neuer arrive in Spaine.

The 11 day of October at night we came to anker in the sound of Plymouth, and the next morning with our Prize came into Carrewater: for which God be thanked: for that a vehement storme arose, and with such fury increased, as that the Prize was forced to cut ouer her maine mast: otherwise with the violence of the storme, her ground tackle being bad, she had giuen on shore: which was the most cause that moued me to put in here; intending now here to discharge the goods without further aduventure, and haue certified thus much unto my Lord Admirall, and therewith also desired to vnderstande the direction of the Lords of the Council together with yours, inasmuch as my Lord Thomas Howard is not returned. Now the rest of our consorts which were separated from vs by weather haue sped, or what Prizes they haue taken, whereof there is much hope by reason of the scattering of the West Indian Fleet, as yet we are able to say nothing. And thus expecting your answer, and for all other matters referring me unto the bearer Captaine Furtho, I send. Plymouth the 24 of October. 1591.

Your worships louing friend
Robert Flicke.

A large testimony of John Huighen van Linschoten Hollander, concerning the worthy exploits atchieued by the right honourable the Earle of Cumberland, By Sir Martine Frobisher, Sir Richard Greensile, and diuers other English Captaines, about the Isles of the Acores, and vpon the coasts of Spaine and Portugall, in the yeeres 1589, 1590, 1591, &c. recorded in his excellent discourse of voiaiges to the East and West Indies. cap. 96, 97. and 99.

On the 22 of July 1589 about Euening, being by the Islands of Flores & Coruo, we perceiued 3 ships that made towards vs, which came from vnder the land, which put vs in great feare: for they came close by our Admirall, and shot diuers times at him, and at another ship of our companie, whereby we perceived them to be Englishmen, for they bare an English flagge vpon their maine tops, but none of them shewed to be aboue 60 tunnes in greatnes. About Euening they followed after vs, and all night bore lanternes with candles burning in them at their sternes, although the Moone shined. The same night passing hard by the Island of Fayal, the next day being betweene the Island of S. George that lay on our right hand, and the small Island called Graciola on our left hand, we espied the 3 English ships still following vs & tooke counsell together, whereof one sailed backwards, thinking that some other ship had come after vs without company, & for a time was out of sight, but it was not long before it came again to the other two, wherewith they tooke counsell & came all 3 together against our ship, because we lay in the lee of all our ships, & had the Island of S. George on the one side in stead of a sconce, thinking to deale so with vs, that in the end we should be constrained to run vpon the shore, whereof we wanted not much, and in that maner with with their flagges openly displayed, came lustily towards vs, sounding their Trumpets, and say-led at the least three times about vs, beating vs with Musket and Caliver; and some great pieces, and did vs no hurt in the body of our Shippe; but spoiled all our sayles and ropes, and to conclude, wee were so plagued by them, that no man durst put forth his head, and when wee got off a peece, wee had at the least an houres worke to lade it againe, whereby wee had forgotreat a noise and crie in the Shippe, as if we had all bene cast away, whereat the English men themselves beganne to mocke vs, and with a thousand iesting words called vnto vs. In the meane time the other Shippes hoisted all their sayles, and did the best they could to saile to the Island of Tercera; not looking once behinde them to helpe vs, doubting they should come too late thither, not caring for vs, but thinking themselves to haue done sufficiently so they saued their owne stakes, whereby it may easily be seene what company they keepe one with the other, and what order is among them. In the ende the English men perceiuing small aduantage against vs, (little knowing in what case and feare we were, as also because wee were not farre from Tercera) left vs, which made vs not a litle to reioyce, as thinking our selues to bee risen from death to life, although wee were not well assured, neyther yet voyde of feare till we lay in the road before Tercera, and vnder the safetie of the Portugales fort, and that we might get thither in good time wee made all the sayles we could: on the other side we were in great doubt, because we knew not what they did in the Island, nor whether they were our friends or enemies, and we doubted so much the more, because we found no men of warre nor any Caruels of aduise from Portugal, as wee made our accounts to doe, that might conuoy vs from thence, or giue vs aduise, as in that countrey ordinarily they vse to do: and because the English men had bene so victorizous in those parts, it made vs suspect that it went not well with Spaine: they of the Island of Tercera were in no lesse feare then we, for seeing our fleet, they thought vs to bee Englishmen, and that wee came to ouerrun the Island, because the 3. Englishmen had bound vp their flags, and came in company with vs: for the which cause the Island sent out two Caruels that lay there with aduise from the king, for the Indian ships that should come thither. Those Caruels came to view vs, and perceiuing what we were, made after vs, whereupon the English ships left vs, and made towards them, because the Caruels thought them to be friends, and shunned them not, as supposing them to bee of our company, but we shot foure or fure times and made signes vnto them that they should make towards the Island, which they presently did. The Englishmen perceiuing that, did put forthwards into the sea, & so the Caruels boyled vs telling vs that the men of the Island were all in armes, as hauing receiued aduise from Portugall, that Sir Francis Drake was in readinesse, and woulde come vnto those Islands. They likewise brought vs newes of the ouerthrow of the Spanish fleet before England, and that the English men had bene before the gates of Lisbon: whereupon the king gaue vs commandement that we should put into the Island of Tercera, and there lie vnder the safetie of the Castle until we receiued further aduise what we should do, or whether we should saile: for that they thought it too dangerous for vs to go to Lisbon. Those newes put our fleet in great feare, and made vs looke vpon eche other not knowing what to say, as being dangerous for them to put into the road, because it lieth open to the sea: so that the Indian ships, although they had receiued commandement from the king, yet they durst not anker there, but onely vsed to come thither, and to lie to and fro, sending their boates on land to fetch such necessities as they wanted, without ankering: but being by necessitie compelled thereunto, as also by the kings commandement, and for that we vnderstood the Erle of Cumberland not to bee farre from those Islands with certaine ships of warre, we made necessitie a vertue, and entering the road, ankered close vnder the Castle, staying for aduise and order from the king, to performe our voyage, it being then the 24. of Iuly, and S. Iames day.

The day before the Erle of Cumberland with 6. or 7. ships of war, sailed by the Island of Tercera, and to their great good fortune passed out of sight, so that they dispatched themselves in all haste, and for the more securitie, tooke with them 4. hundred Spaniards, of those that lay in Garrison in the Island, and with them they sayled towards Lisbon, hauing a good wind: so that within 11. daies after they arriued in the riuer of Lisbon with great gladnes & triumph: for if they had stayed but one day longer before they had entered the riuer, they had all bene taken by Captaine Drake, who with 40 ships came before Calcais, at the same time that the Indian ships cast anker in the riuer of Lisbon, being garded thither by diuers Gallies.

While I remained in Tercera, the Erle of Cumb. came to S. Marie, to take in fresh water, and some other victuals: but the inhabitants would not suffer him to haue it, but wounded both himselfe & diners of his men, whereby they were forced to depart without hauing any thing there.

The Erle of Cumberland while I lay in Tercera, came vnto the Isle of Graciosa, where himselfe in person, with seuen or eight in his company went on land, asking certaine beasts, hens, and

and other victuals, with wine and fresh water, which they willingly gaue him, and therewith he departed from thence, without doing them any hurt: for the which the inhabitants thanked him, and commended him for his courtesie, and keeping of his promise.

The same time that the Erle of Cumberland was in the Island of Graciosa, he came likewise to Fayall, where at the first time that he came, they beganne to resist him, but by reason of some controuersie among them, they let him land, where he razed the Castle to the ground; and sunke all their Ordnance in the sea, taking with him certaine Carauels and ships that lay in the road; with prouision of all things that he wanted: and therewith departed againe to sea. Whereupon the king caused the principall actors therein to be punished, and sent a company of souldiers thither againe, which went out of Tercera, with all kinde of warlike munition, and great shot, making the fortresse vp againe, the better to defend the Island, trusting no more in the Portugales.

The 99 Chapter.

The ninth of October 1589, there arriued in Tercera fourteene ships that came from the Spanish Indies, laden with Cochenille, Hides, Golde, Siluer, Pearles, and other rich wares. They were fiftie in companie, when they departed out of the Pauen of Hauana, whereof, in their comming out of the Channell, eleuen sunke in the same Channell by foule weather, the rest by a storme were scattered and separated one from the other. The next day there came another ship of the same companie, that sayled close vnder the Island, so to get into the Roades: where she met with an English ship that had not about three cast peeces, and the Spaniards 12. They fought a long time together, which we being in the Island might stand and behold: whereupon the Gouvernour of Tercera sent two boates of Musketers to helpe the shippe: but before they could come at her, the English ship had shot her vnder water, and we saw her sinke into the Sea with all her sayles vp, and not any thing seene of her about the water. The Englishmen with their boate saued the Captaine and about thirtie others with him, but not one penny-worth of the goods, and yet in the shippe there was at the least to the value of two hundred thousand Duckats in Golde, Siluer, and Pearles, the rest of the men were drowned which might be about fiftie persons, among the which were some fflyers and women, which the Englishmen would not saue. Those that they had saued they set on land: and then they sayled away. The tenen and twentieth of the same moneth, the sayd fourteene ships hauing refreshed themselves in the Island departed from Tercera toward Siuill, and comming vpon the coast of Spaine they were taken by the English ships that lay there to watch for them, two onely excepted which escaped away, and the rest were wholly caried into England.

About the same time the Erle of Cumberland with one of the Queenes ships, and five or sixe more, kept about those Islands and came oftentimes so close vnder the Island, and to the Road of Angra, that the people on land might easily tell all his men that he had aboard, and knewe such as walked on the Patches: they of the Island not once shooting at them, although they might easily haue done it, for they were within Musket shot both of the towne and fort. In these places he continued for the space of two moneths, and sayled round about the Islands, and landed in Graciosa and Fayal, as in the description of those Islands I haue already declared. Here he tooke diuers ships and Carauels, which he sent into England: so that those of the Island durst not once put forth their heads. At the same time about three or foure dayes after the Earle of Cumberland had bene in the Island of Fayal, and was departed from thence, there arriued in the said Island of Fayal five Indian shippes, whose Generall was one Iuan Dorius: and there they discharged in the Island 4 millions of golde and siluer. And hauing with all speede refreshed their ships, fearing the comming of the Englishmen they set sayle, and arriued safely in S. Lucar, not meeting with the enemye, to the great good lucke of the Spaniards and hard fortune of the Englishmen: for that within lesse then two dayes after the gold and siluer was laden againe into the Spanish ships, the Erle of Cumberland sayled againe by that Island: so that it appeared that God would not let them haue it, for if they had once had sight thereof, without doubt it had bene theirs, as the Spaniards themselves confessed.

In the moneth of Nouember there arriued in Tercera two great shippes, which were the Admirall and Viceadmirall of the Fleet laden with siluer, who with stormie weather were separated from the fleet, and had bene in great torment and distresse, and ready to sinke: for they were forced to vse all their Pumps: so that they withed a thousand times to haue met with the Englishmen to whom they would willingly haue giuen their siluer and all that euer they brought with them, onely to saue their liues. And although the Erle of Cumberland lay still about those Islands, yet they met not with him, so that after much paine and labour they got into the Road before Angra, where with all speede they unladed and discharged about nine millions of silver, all in pieces of 8 or 10 pound great: so that the whole Bay lay covered with plates and chests of silver, full of Ryales of eight, most monderfull to behold, (each million being ten hundred thousand ducats,) besides pearles, gold, and other stones, which were not registred. The Admirall and chiefe commaunder of those ships and flecte called Aluaro Flores de Quiniones was sicke of the Meapolitan disease, and was brought to land, whereof not long after he died in Siuillia. He brought with him the Kings broad seale and full authoritie to be Generall and chiefe commaunder vpon the Seas, and of all flectes of ships, and of all places and Islands, or lands wheresoeuer he came: whereupon the gouernour of Tercera did him great honour, and betweene them it was concluded, perceiuing the weaknesse of their ships, and the danger of the Englishmen, that they would lend the shippes emptye with souldiers to conuey them, either to Siuill or Lisbon, where they could first arriue, with aduise vnto his Maistie of all that had past, and that he would giue order to fetch the silver with good and safe conuoy. Whereupon the said Aluaro Flores stayed there, vnder colour of keeping the silver, but specially because of his disease, and for that they were affaide of the Englishmen. This Aluaro Flores had alone for his owne part about 50000 Ducats in pearles, which he shewed vnto vs, & sought to sell them or barter them with vs for spices or bills of exchange. The said two ships set saile with 3 or 4 hundred men, as well souldiers as others that came with them out of India, and being at sea had a storme, where with the Admirall burst and sunke in the sea, & not one man saved. The Vice-Admirall cut downe her mast, and ranne the ship on ground hard by Serual, where it burst in pieces, some of the men sauing themselves by swimming, that brought the newes, but the rest were drowned.

Islands,

In the same moneth there came two great ships out of the Spanish Indies, and being within half a mile of the Road of Tercera, they met with an English ship, which, after they had fought long together, tooke them both. About 7 or 8 moneths before, there had beene an English shippe in Tercera, that vnder the name of a Frenchman came to traffike in the Island, there to lade wood, and being discouered was both ship and goods confiscated to the kings vse, and all the men kept prisoners: yet went they vp and downe the streetes to get their liuinges, by labouring like slaues; being in deede as safe in that Island, as if they had beene in prison. But in the ende vpon a Sunday, all the Saylers went downe behinde the hills called Bresil: where they found a Fisher-boat, whereinto they got and rowed into the sea to the Erie of Cumberlands shippes, which to their great fortune chanced at that time to come by the Island, and ankered with his ships about halfe a mile from the Road of Angra, hard by two small Islands, which lie about a bales shot from the Island and are full of Goats, Deere and Sheepe, belonging to the inhabitants of the Island of Tercera. Those Saylers knew it well, and thereupon they rowed vnto them with their boates, and lying at anker that day, they fetched as many Goates and sheepe as they had neede of: which chose of the towne and of the Island well saw and beheld, yet durst not once goe forth: so there remained no more on land but the Master and the Marchant of the said English ship. This Master had a brother in law dwelling in England, who hauing newes of his brothers imprisonment in Tercera, got licence of the Queene of England to set forth a ship, therewith to see if he could recouer his losses of the Spaniards by taking some of them, and so to redeme his brother that lay prisoner in Tercera, and he it was that tooke the two Spanish ships before the Towne, the Master of the ship aforesaid standing on the shore by me, and looking vpon them, for he was my great acquaintance. The ships being taken that were worth 300 thousand ducats, he sent all the men on land sauing onely two of the principall Gentlemen, which he kept aboard therewith to ransom his brother: and sent the Pilot of one of the Indian ships that were taken, with a letter to the Gouernor of Tercera: wherein he wrote that he should deliuer him his brother, & he would send the 2 Gentlemen on land: if not, he would saile with them into England, as indeed he did, because the Gouernour would not doe it, saying that the Gentlemen might make that suite to the king of Spaine himselfe. This Spanish Pilot we bid to supper with vs, and the Englishmen likewise, where he shewed vs alle the manner of their fight, much commending the order and maner of the Englishmens fighting, as also their courteous vsing of him: but in the end the English Pilot likewise stole away in a French ship, without paying any rancome as yet.

In the moneth of Ianuarie 1590 there arriued one ship alone in Tercera, that came from the Spanish Indies, and brought newes that there was a flecte of a hundred shippes which put out from the firme land of the Spanish Indies, and by a storme were driuen vpon the coast called Florida, where they were all cast away, the hauing onely escaped, wherein there were great riches, & many men lost, as it may well be thought: so that they made their account, that of 220 ships that for certaine were knownen to haue put out of Noua Spagna, S. Domingo, Hauana, Capo verde, Brasilia, Guinea, &c. in the yeere 1589, to saile for Spaine & Portugall, there were not above 14 or 15 of them arrived there in safetie, all the rest being either drowned, burst or taken.

In the same moneth of January there arrived in Tercera 15 or 16 ships that came from Siuil, which were most flieboats of the Low countries, and some Britons that were arrested in Spaine: these came full of souldiers, and well appointed with munition, to take the silver that lay in Tercera, and to fetch Aluares de Flores by the kings commandement into Spaine. And because that time of the yeere there are alwayes stormes about those Islands, therefore they durst not enter into the road of Tercera, for that as then it blew so great a storme that some of their ships that had ankred were forced to cut downe their mastes, and were in danger to be lost: and among the rest a ship of Biscaye ran against the land and was stricken in pieces, but all the men saved themselves. The other ships were forced to keepe the sea and seperate themselves one from the other, where wind and weather would vaine them untill the 15 of March for that in all that time they could not haue one day of faire weather to anker in, whereby they endured much miserie, cursing both the silver and the Island. This storme being past, they chanced to meet with a small English ship of about 40 tonnes in bignesse, which by reason of the great wind could not beare all her sailes: so they set vpon her and tooke her, and with the English flag in their Admiralls sterne, they came as proudly into the haven as if they had conquered all the realme of England: but as the Admirall that bare the English flag vpon her sterne was entering into the road, there came by chance two English ships by the Island that paid her so well for her paines, that they were forced to cry Misericordia, and without all doubt had taken her, if she had bene but a mile further in the sea: but because she got vnder the Fortresse, which also began to shoot at the Englishmen, they were forced to leaue her, and to put further into the sea, hauing slaine five or sixe of the Spaniards. The Englishmen that were taken in the small shippe were put vnder hatches, and coupled in bolts, and after they had bene prisoners 3 or 4 dayes, there was a Spanish Ensigne-bearer in the ship that had a brother slaine in the fleet that came for England, who as then minding to reuenge his death, and wishall to shew his manhood on the English captiues that were in the English ship, which they had taken, as is aforesayd, tooke a poiniard in his hand and went downe vnder the hatches, where finding the poore Englishmen sitting in boltes, with the same poiniard he stabbed fixe of them to the heart: which two others of them perceiuing, clasped each other about the middle, because they would not be murdered by him, & threw themselves into the sea and there were drowned. This acte was of all the Spaniards much disliked and very ill taken, so that they caried the Spaniard prisoner vnto Lisbon, where being arrived, the king of Spaine willed he should be sent into England, that the Queene of England might vse him as she thought good: which sentence his friends by intreatie got to be reuerfed, notwithstanding he commanded he should without all fauour be beheaded: but vpon a good Friday the Cardinall going to masse, all the capitaines and Commanders made so great increate for him, that in the end they got his pardon. This I thought good to note, that men might vnderstand the bloody & dishonest minds of the Spaniards when they haue men vnder their subiection.

The same two English ships which folowed the Spanish Admirall till he had got the Fort of Tercera, as I sayd before, put into the sea, where they met with another Spanish ship being of the same fleet, that had likewise bene leattered by the storme and was onely missing, for the rest lay in the road. This small ship the Englishmen tooke, and sent all the men on shore, not hurting any of them: but if they had knowen what had bene done vnto the aforesayd English captiues, I beleue they would soone haue reuenged themselves, as after ward many an innocent soule paid for it. This ship thus taken by the Englishmen, was the same that was taken and confiscated in the Island of Tercera by the Englishmen that got out of the Island in a fisher boat (as I said before) and was sold vnto the Spaniards that as then came from the Indies, wherewith they sayled to S. Lucar, where it was also arrested by the duke, and appointed to go in company to fetch the silver in Tercera, because it was a ship that sailed well, but among the Spaniards fleet it was the meannest of the company. By this means it was taken from the Spaniards and caried into England, and the owners had it againe when they least thought of it.

The 19 of March the aforesayd ships being 19 in number, set saile, hauing laden the kings silver, and receiued in Aluares Flores de Quiniones, with his company and good prouision of necessities, munition and souldiers that were fully resolu'd (as they made shew) to fight valiantly to the last man before they would yeeld or lose their riches: and although they set their course for S. Lucar, the wind draue them vnto Lisbon, which (as it seemed) was willing by his force to helpe them, and to bring them thither in safetie, although Aluares de Flores, both against the wind and weather would perforce haue sailed to Saint Lucar, but being constrained by the wind and impotunitie of the sailers that protested they would require their losses and damages of him, he was was content to saile to Lisbon: from whence the silver was by land caried vnto Sioul. At Cape S. Vincent there lay a fleet of 20 English ships to watch for the Armada, so that if they had put into S. Lucar, they had fallē right into their hands, which if the wind had serued they had done. And therefore they may say that the wind hath lent them a happy voiage: for if the Englishmen had met with them, they had surely bene in great danger, and possibly but few of them had escaped, by reason of the feare wherewith they were possessed, because fortune or rather God was wholly against them: which is a sufficient cause to make the Spaniards out of heart, & to the contrary to giue the Englishmen more courage, and to make them bolder for that they are victorious, stout and valiant: and seeing all their enterprises do take so good effect, that thereby they are become lords and masters of the sea, and need care for no man, as it wel appeareth by this brieue discourse.

The 7 of August 1590, a naue of English ships was seen before Tercera, being 20 in number, and 5 of them the Queenes ships: their Generall was one Martin Frobisher, as we after had intelligence. They came purposely to watch for the fleet of the Spanish Indies, and for the Indian ships, and the ships of the countreys in the West: which put the Islanders in great feare, specially those of Fayal, for that the Englishmen sent a trumpet to the Gouvernour to aske certaine wine, flesh, and other victuals for their money and good friendship. They of Fayal did not onely refuse to giue care vnto them, but with a shot killed their messenger or trumpeter: which the Englishmen tooke in euill part, sending them word that they were best to looke to themselves and stand vpon their guard, for they ment to come and visite them whether they would or no. The Gouvernour made them answer, that he was there in the behalfe of his maiestie of Spaine, and that he would doe his best to keepe them out, as he was bound: but nothing was done, although they of Fayal were in no litle feare, sending to Tercera for aide, from whence they had certaine barkes with ponder and munition for warre, with some bisket and other necessary provision.

The 30 of August we receiued very certaine newes out of Portugal, that there were 80 ships put out of the Groine laden with victuals, munition, money and souldiours, to goe for Britaine to aide the Catholiques and Leaguers of France against the king of Nauarre. At the same time two Netherland hulkes comming out of Portugal to Tercera being halfe the Seasoner, met with 4 of the Queenes ships, their Generall being sir Iohn Hawkins, that staied them, but let them go againe without doing them any harme. The Netherlanders reported, that each of the Queenes ships had 80 pieces of Ordnance, and that captaine Drake lay with 40 ships in the English channell watching for the armie of the Groine: and likewise that there lay at the Cape S. Vincent ten other English ships, that if any ships escaped from the Islands, they might take them. These tidings put the Islanders in great feare, least if they failed of the Spanish fleet and got nothing by them, that then they would fall vpon the Islands, because they would not returne emptie home, whereupon they held streit watch, sending aduise vnto the king what newes they heard.

The first of September there came to the Island of S. Michael a Portugall ship out of the haen of Phernambuck in Brasile, which brought newes that the Admirall of the Portugall fleet that came from India, hauing missed the Island of S. Helena, was of necessitie constrained to put into Phernambuck, although the king had expresse vnder a great penaltie forbidden him so to doe, because of the wozmes that there doe spoile the ships. The same shippe wherein Bernardin Ribero was Admirall the yeere before 1589, failed out of Lisbon into the Indies, with 5 ships in her company, whereof but 4 got into India, the 5 was neuer heard of, so that it was thought to be cast away: the other foure returned safe againe into Portugall, though the Admiral was much spoiled, because he met with two English ships that fought long with him, and slew many of his men, but yet he escaped from them.

The 5 of the same moneth there arriued in Tercera a carauel of the Island of Coruo, & brought with her 50 men that had bin spoiled by the Englishmen who had set them on shoze in the Island of Coruo, being taken out of a ship that came from the Spanish Indies, they brought tidings that the Englishmen had taken 4 more of the Indian ships, & a carauel with the king of Spaines letters of aduise for the ships comming out of the Portugal Indies, & that with those which they had takē, they were at the least 40 English ships together, so that not one bark escaped them, but fell into their hands, & that therefore the Portugall ships comming out of India durst not put into the Islands, but tooke their course vnder 40 & 42 degrees, and so thence sailed to Lisbon, humming likewise the cape S. Vincent, other wise they could not haue had a prosperous iourney of it, for that as then the sea was full of English ships. Whereupon the king aduised the fleet lying in Hauana in the Spanish Indies ready to come for Spaine, that they should stay there all that yeere till the next yeere, because of the great danger they might fall into by the Englishmen, which was no smal charge, & hinderance to the fleet, for that the ships that lie there do consume themselves, and in a maner eat vpon one another, by reason of the great number of people, together with the scarcitie of all things, so that many ships chose rather one by one to aduencure theselues alone to get hoine, then to stay there : all which fell into the Englishmens hands, wherof diuers of the men were brought into Tercera, for that a whole day we could see nothing els, but spoiled men set on shore, some out of one ship, some out of another, that pittie it was to see all of them cursing the Englishmen & their owne fortunes, with those that had bene the causes to prouoke the Englishmen to fight, and complaining of the small remedie and order taken therein by the king of Spaines officers.

The 19 of the same month there came to Tercera a Carauel of Lisbon, with one of the kings officers, to cause the goods that were saued out of the ship which came from Malacca (for which we staid there) to be laden and sent to Lisbon. And at the same time there put out of the Groine one Don Alonso de Baçan, with 40 great ships of warre to come vnto the Islands, there to watch for the fleet of the Spanish & Portugall Indies, and the goods of the Malacca ship being laden, they were to conuoy the all together into the riuer of Lisbon : but being certaine daies at sea, alwaies hauing a contrary wind, they could not get vnto the Islands, onely two of them that were scattered from the fleet, arriued at Tercera, and not finding the fleet, they presently returned to seeke them : in the meane time the king changed his mind, & caused the fleet to stay in India, as I said before : and therefore hee sent word vnto Don Alonso de Baçan, that hee should returne againe to the Groine, which he presently did (without doing any thing, nor once approaching neer the Islands, saving onely the two foresayd ships, for he well knew that the Englishmen lay by the Island of Coruo, but he would not visit them : and so he returned to the haven the Groine, whereby our goods that came from Malacca were yet to ship, and trusted by againe, and forced to stay a more fortunate time with patience perforce.

The 23 of October there arriued in Tercera a Carauel with aduise out of Portugall, that of 5 ships which in the yere 1590 were laden in Lisbon for the Indies, 4 of them were turned againe to Porcin. After they had bene 4 moneths abroad, & that the Admirall, wherein the Viceroy called Mathias d'Albukerk sailed, had onely gotten to India, as afterward newes thereof was brought ouer-land, hauing bin at the least 11 moneths at sea & neuer saw land, and came in great misery to Malacca. In this ship there died by the way 280 men, according to a note by himselfe made, and sent to the Cardinal at Lisbon, with the names & surnames of euery man, together with a description of his voyage, & the misery they had endured, which was onely done, because he would not lose the gouernment of India : and for that cause he had twoyne either to lose his life, or to arrive in India, as in deed he did afterwards, but to the great danger, losse and hinderance of his companie, that were forced to buy it with their liues, & onely for want of prouision, as it may wel be thought : for he knew full well that if he had returned backe againe into Portugal as the other ships did, he should haue bin cashiered from his Indian regiment, because the people began already to murmure at him for his proud & lofty mind. And among other things that shewed his pride the more, behind about the gallery of his ship, he caused Fortune to be painted, & his own picture w a staffe standing by her, as it were threatening Fortune, with this polie, Quero que vengas, that is, I wil haue thee to overcome : which being read by the Cardinal & other gentlemen (that to honor him brought him aboard his ship) it was thought to be a point of exceeding folly : but it is no strange matter among the Portugals : for they about all others must of force let the foole peepe out of their sleeves, specially when they are in authoritie, for that I knew the said Mathias d'Albukerk in India, being a souldier and a captaine, where he was esteemed and accounted for one of the best of them, & much honoured, and beloued of all men, as behauing himselfe courteously to euery man, whereby they all desired that he might be Viceroy. But when he once had receiued his patent with full power & authoritie from the king to be Viceroy, he changed so much from his former behauior, that by reason of his pride, they all began to feare and curse him, and that before hee departed out of Lisbon, as it is often seene in many men that are aduanced vnto state and dignitie.

The 20 of Januarie 1591, there was newes brought out of Portugall into Tercera, that the Englishmen had take a ship that the king had sent into the Portugal-Indies, w aduise to the Viceroy for the returning againe of the 4 ships that should haue gone to India, & because the ships were come backe againe, that ship was stuffed and laden as full of goods as possible it might be, hauing likewise in ready money 500 thousand ducckets in roials of 8, besides other wares. It departed from Lisbon in the moneth of Nouember 1590, & met with the Englishmen, with who for a time it fought, but in the end it was taken and caried into England with men & all, yet when they came there, the men were set at libertie, and returned into Lisbon, where the captaine was committed prisoner ; but he excused himselfe and was released, with whom I spake my selfe, & he made this report vnto me. At the same time also they tooke a ship that came from the Mine ladē with gold, & 2 ships laden with pepper & spices that were to saile into Italy, the pepper onely that was in them, being worth 170 thousand ducckets : all these ships were caried into England, & made good prize.

In

In the moneth of July 1591, there hapned an earthquake in the Island of S. Michael, which continued fro the 26 of July, to the 12 of August, in which time no man durst stay within his house but fled into the fields, fasting & praying with great sorrow, for that many of their houses fel down, and a towne called Villa Franca, was almost cleane razed to the ground, all the cloisters & houses shaken to the earth, and therein some people slaine. The land in some places rose vp, and the cliffs remooued from one place to another, and some hills were defaced and made euen with the ground. The earthquake was so strong, that the ships which lay in the road and on the sea, shaken as if the world would haue turned round: there sprang also a fountaine out of the earth, from whence for the space of 4 daies, there flowed a most cleare water, & after that it ceased. At the same time they heard such thunder & noise vnder the earth, as if all the deuils in hell had bin assembled together in that place, wherewith many died for feare. The Island of Tercera hooke 4 times together, so that it seemed to turne about, but there hapned no misfortune vnto it. Earthquakes are common in those Islands, for about 20 yeres past there hapned another earthquake, whereln a high hill that lieth by the same towne of Villa Franca, fell halfe downe, & couered all the towne with earth, and killed many men. The 25 of August the kings Armada comming out of Ferol arriued in Tercera being in all 30 ships, Biskaines, Portugals and Spaniards, and 10 dutch flieboats that were arrested in Lisbon to serue the king, besides other small ships & pataros, that came to serue as messengers from place to place, and to discouer the seas. This nauie came to stay for, and conuoy the ships that should come from the Spanish Indies, and the flieboats were appointed in their returne home, to take in the goods that were saued in the lost ship that came from Malacca, and to conuoy them to Lisbon.

The 13 of September the said Armada arriued at the Island of Coruo, where the Englishmen with about 16 ships as then lay, staying for the Spanish fleet, where of some of the most part were come, and there the English were in good hope to haue taken them. But whē they perceiued the kings army to be strong, the Admirall being the lord Thomas Howard, commanded his fleet not to fall vpon them, nor any of them once to separate their ships from him, vntill he gaue commission so to do: notwithstanding the viceadmirall sir Richard Greenuil being in the ship called the Reuenge, went into the Spanish fleet, and shot among them doing them great hurt, & thinking the rest of the company would haue folowed, which they did not, but left him there, & sailed away: the cause why could not be knowen. Which the Spaniards perceiuing, with 7 or 8 ships they boorded her, but they withstood them all, fighting with them at the least 12 houres together and sunke two of them, one being a new double flieboat of 600 tunnes, and Admirall of the flieboats, the other a Biscain: but in the end by reason of the number that came vpon her, he was taken, but to their great losse: for they had lost in fighting and by drowning about 400 men, and of the English were slaine about 100, Sir Richard Greenuil himselfe being wounded in his braine, whereof afterwards he died. He was caried into the ship called S. Paul, wherein was the Admirall of the fleet Don Alonso de Baçan: there his wounds were dressed by the Spanish surgeons, but Don Alonso himselfe would neither see him nor speake with him: all the rest of the captaines and gentlemen went to visite him, and to comfort him in his hard fortune, wondering at his courage and stout heart, for he shewed not any signe of faintnes nor changing of colour; but feeling the houre of death to approach, he spake these words in Spanish, and said: Here die I Richard Greenuil with a ioyful & quiet mind, for that I haue ended my life as a true souldier ought to do, that hath fought for his countrey, Queene, religion and honor, whereby my soule most ioyfull departeth out of this body, & shal alwayes leaue behind it an euermourning fame of a valiant & true souldier that hath done his dutie as he was bound to doe. When he had finished these or such other like words, he gaue vp the Ghost, with great & stout courage, & no man could perceiue any true signe of heauines in him.

This sir Rich. Greenuil was a great and a rich gentleman in England, & had great pecerely reuenues of his owne inheritance, but he was a man very inquiet in his mind, and greatly affected to war; inso much as of his owne private motion he offered his seruice to the Queene: he had performed many valiant acts, and was greatly feared in these Islands, and known of euery man, but of nature very fœure, so that his owne people hated him for his fiercenesse, & spake very hardly of him: for when they first entred into the fleet of Armada, they had their great saile in a readinesse, and might possibly enough haue sailed away, for it was one of the best ships for saile in England, and the master perceiuing that the other ships had left them, & folowed not after, commanded the great saile to be cut that they might make away: but sir Rich. Greenuil threatened both him & all the rest that were in the ship, if any mā laid hand vpon it, he would cause him to be hanged, and so by that occasion they were compelled to fight & in the end were taken. He was of so hard a complexion, that as he continued among the Spanish captaines while they were at dinner or supper with him, he would carouse 3 or 4 glasses of wine; and in a brauerie take the glasses betwene his teeth and crash them in pices & swallow them downe, so that oftentimes the blood ran out of his mouth without any harme at all vnto him: & this was told me by diuers credible persons that many times stood and beheld him. The Englishmen that were left in the ship, as the capitaine of the souldiers, the master and others were dispersed into diuers of the Spanissh ships that had taken them, where there had almost a new fight arisen between the Biscains and the Portugals: while each of them would haue the honour to haue first boozed her, so that there grew a great noise and quarel among them, one taking the chiefe ensigne, and the other the flag, and the capitaine and euery one held his owne. The ships that had boozed her were altogether out of order, and broken, and many of their men hurt, whereby they were compelled to come into the Island of Tercera, there to repaire themselves: where being arriued, I and my chamber-felow, to heare some newes, went aboard one of the ships being a great Biscain, and one of the 12 Apostles, whose capitaine was called Bartandono, that had bin General of the Biscains in the fleet that went for England. We seeing vs called vs by into the gallery, where with great curtesie he receiued vs, being as then set at dinner with the English capitaine that sat by him, and had on a sute of blacke veluet, but he could not tell vs any thing, for that he could speake no other language but English and Latine, which Bartandono also could a litle speake. The English capitaine got licence of the gouernour that he might come on land with his weapon by his side, and was in our lodging with the Englishman that was kept prisoner in the Island, being of that ship where of the sailers got away, as I said before. The gouernour of Tercera bade him to dinner, and shewed him great curtesie. The master likewise with licence of Bartandono came on land and was in our lodging, and had at the least 10 or 12 wounds, as well in his head as on his body, whereof after that being at sea between Lisbon & the Islands he died. The capitaine wrote a letter, wherein he declared all the manner of the fight, and left it with the English marchand that lay in our lodging, to send it to the lord Admiral of England. This English capitaine comming vnto Lisbon, was there wel receiued and not any hurt done vnto him, but with good convoy sent to Seuiual, and from thence sailed into England with all the rest of the Englishmen that were taken prisoners.

The Spanissh armie staid at the Island of Coruo til the last of September, to assemble the rest of the fleet together, which in the ende were to the number of 140 sailes of ships partly comming from India, and partly of the army, and being altogether ready to saile to Tercera in good company, there suddenly rose so hard & cruell a storme, that those of the Islands did affirme, that in mans memorie there was neuer any such seen or heard off before: for it seemed the sea would haue swallowed vp the Islands, the water mounting higher then the cliffs, which are so high that it amareth a man to behold them: but the sea reached aboue them, and liuing fishes were throwen vpon the land. This storme continued not only a day or two with one wind, but 7 or 8 dayes continually, the wind turning round about in al places of the compasse, at the lest twile or thise during that time, and all alike, with a continuall storme and tempest most terrible to behold, euen to vs that were on shore, much more then to such as were at sea: so that onely on the coasts and cliffes of the Island of Tercera, there were about 12 ships cast away, and not onely vpon the one side, but round about it in euery corner, wherby nothing els was heard but complaining, crying, lamenting & telling, here is a ship broken in pices against the cliffes, and there another, and all the men drowned: so that for the space of 20 dayes after the storme, they did nothing els but fish for dead men that continually came dving on the shore. Among the rest was the English ship called the Reuenge, that was cast away vpon a cliffe neere to the Island of Tercera, where it brake in an hundred pices & sunke to the ground, hauing in her 70 men Galegos, Biscains, and others, with some of the captiue Englishmen, whereof but one was saued that got by vpon the cliffes aliue, and had his body and head all wounded, and he being on shore brought vs the newes desiring to be shinen, & thereupon presently died. The Reuenge had in her diuers faire brasse pices that were all sunke in y^e sea, which they of the Island were in good hope to waigh vp againe the next Sommer after. Among these ships that were cast away about Tercera, was likewise a flie-boat, one of those that had bin arrested in Portugall to serue the king, called the white Dove, the master of her was one Cornelius Martenson of Schiedam in Holland, and there were in her 100 souldiers, as in euery one of the rest there were. We being ouer-ruled by the capitaine that he could not be master of his owne, saying here and there at the mercy of God, as the storme dyone him, in the end came within the sight of the Island of Tercera, which the Spaniards perceiuing thought all their safetie onely to consist in putting into the road, compelling the Master and the Pilot to make towards the Island, although the master refused to doe it, saying, that they were most sure there to be cast away and utterly spoiled: but the capitaine called him drunkard and Peretique, and striking him with a staffe, commaunded him to doe as hee would haue him. The Master seeing this and being compelled to doe it, sayd: well then my Masters, seeing it is the desire of you all to bee cast away,

the Reuenge.

I can but lose one life, and therewith desperately he sailed towards the shoze, and was on that side of the Island, where there was nothing els but hard Zones and rocks, as high as mountaines, most terrible to beholde, where some of the inhabitants stood with long ropes and cozke bound at the end thereof, to throw them downe vnto the men, that they might lay holde vpon them, and saue their lines: but few of them got so neere, most of them being cast away, and smitten in pieces before they could get to the wall. The ship sailing in this maner (as I said before) towards the Island, and approaching to the shoze, the master being an olde man, and full of yeeres, called his sonne that was in the ship with him, and hauing imbraced one another, and taken their last farewell, the good olde father willed his sonne not to take care for him, but seeke to saue himselfe; for (said he) sonne thou art young, & mayest haue some hope to saue thy life, but as for me it is no great matter (I am olde) what become of me, and therewith ech of these shedding many teares, as euery louing father and kinde childe may well consioer, the ship fell vpon the cliffes, and brake in pieces, the father on the one side, the sonne on the other side falling into the sea, ech laying holde vpon that which came next to hand; but to no purpose; for the sea was so high and furious, that they were all drowned, and onely foureteene or fiftene saued themselves by swimming, with their legs and armes halfe broken and out of ioynt, among which was the Masters sonne, and foure other Dutch boyes: the rest of the Spaniards and Sailers, with the Captaine and Master, were drowned. Whose heart would not melt with teares to beholde so grievous a sight, specially considering with himselfe that the greatest cause thereof was the headlines and insolency of the Spaniards, as in this onely example may well be scene: Whereby may be considered how the other shippes sped, as we our selues did in part beholde, and by the men that were saued did heare moze at large, as also some others of our countrey men that as then were in the like danger can well witness.

On the other Islands the losse was no lesse then in Tercera: for on the Island of Saint George there were two ships cast away: on the Island of Pico two ships: on the Island of Graciosa three ships: and besides those there came euery where round about diuers pieces of broken ships, and other things fleeing towards the Islands, wherewith the sea was all couered most pitifull to beholde. On the Island of S. Michael there were foure ships cast away, and betwene Tercera and S. Michael threemore were sunke, which were scene and heard to cry out; wherof not one man was saued. The rest put into the sea without masts, all cozne and rent: so that of the whole fleet and armada, being 140 ships in all, there were but 32 or 33 arrived in Spaine and Portugall, yea, and those few with so great misery, paine and labour, that not two of them arrived there together, but this day one, and to morrow another, next day the third, and so one after the other to the number aforesaid. All the rest were cast away vpon the Islands, and ouerwhelmed in the Sea, wherby may be considered what great losse and hindrance they received at that time: for by many mens iudgements it was esteemed to be much more then was lost by their army that came for England; and it may well be thought, and presumed, that it was no other but a iust plague purposely sent by God vpon the Spaniards, and that it might truly be said, the taking of the Reuenge was iustly reuenged vpon them, and not by the might or force of man, but by the power of God, as some of them openly said in the Ile of Tercera, that they beleued verily God would consume them, and that he tooke part with the Lutherans and heretiks: saying further that so soone as they had throwen the dead body of the Viceadmirall Sir Richard Greenfield ouer-board, they verily thought that as he had a diuellish faith and religion, and therefore the diuels loued him, so he presently sunke into the bottome of the sea, and downe into hell, where he raised by all the diuels to the reuenge of his death: and that they brought so great stormes and torments vpon the Spaniards, because they onely maintained the Catholike & Romish religion. Such and the like blasphemies against God, they ceased not openly to vtter, without being reprooued of any man therein; nor for their false opinions: but the most part of them rather said and affirmed, that of truerh it must needs be so.

As one of those Indian fleets put out of Noua Spagna, there were 35 of them by storme and tempest cast away and drowned in the Sea, being 50 in all, so that but 15 escaped. Of the fleet that came from Santo Domingo there were 14 cast away, coming out of the chanell of Ha-uana, whereof the Admirall and Viceadmirall were two of them: and from Terra Firma in India there came two ships laden with golde and siluer, that were taken by the Englishmen: and before the Spanish army came to Coruo, the Englishmen at times had taken at the least 20 ships, that came from S. Domingo, India, Brasilia, &c. and were all sent into England.

A relation sent by Melchior Petoney to Nigil de Moura at Lisbon, from the Iland and Castle of Arguin, standing a little to the Southward of Cape Blanco, in the Northerly latitude of 19 degrees, concerning the rich and secret trade from the inland of Africa thither: Anno 1591.

Concerning

reade Leo Africanus a little after the beginning of his 6 booke.

AS concerning the trade to this Castle and Iland of Arguin, your worship is to vnderstand, that if it would please the kings maiesty to send hither two or three carauels once in a yeere with Flanders and Spanish commodities, as Bracelets of glasse, Knives, Welles, Linnen-cloth, Looking-glasses, with other kinds of small wares, his highnesse might do great good here. For 50 leagues by into the land the Hoozes haue many exceeding rich golde mines; insomuch that they bring downe their golde to this Castle to traffique with vs: and for a small trifles they will giue vs a great wedge of golde. And because here is no trade, the sayd Hoozes carry their golde to Fez being 250 leagues distant from hence, and there doe exchange the same for the foresayd kindes of commodities. By this meanes also his maiesty might stop that passage, and keepe the king of Fez from so huge a masse of golde, Scarlet-clothes, and fine Purples are greatly accepted of in these parts. It is a most fertile countrey within the land, and yeeldeth great store of Wheat, flesh of all kindes, and abundance of fruits. Therefore, if it were possible, you should do well to deale with his maiesty, either himselfe to send a couple of carauels, or to giue your worship leane to traffique here: for here is a very good harbour where ships may ride at ancre hard by the Castle. The countrey where all the golde-mines are is called The kingdome of Darha. In this kingdome are great store of cities and townes; and in euery city and towne a Captaine with certaine souldiers; which Captaines are lordes and owners of the sayd townes. One city there is called Couton, another Xanigeton, as also the cities of Tubguer, Azegue, Amader, Quaherque, and the towne of Faroo. The which townes and cities are very great and fairely built, being inhabited by rich Hoozes, and abounding with all kinde of cattell, Barley, and Dates. And here is such plenty of golde found vpon the lands by the riuers side, that the sayd Hoozes vsually carry the same Northward to Marocco, and Southward to the city of Tombuto in the land of Negros, which city standeth about 300 leagues from the kingdome of Darha; and this kingdome is but 60 leagues from this Iland and Castle of Arguin. Wherefore I beseech your worship to put his maiesty in remembrance hereof; for the sayd cities and townes are but ten dayes journey from hence. I heartily wish that his maiesty would send two or three marchantes to see the state of the Countrey, who might trauell to the foresayd cities, to vnderstand of their rich trade. For any man may go safe and come safe from those places. And thus without troubling of your worship any further, I humbly take my leane. From the Iland and Castle of Arguin the 20 of January 1591.

Your worships seruant Melchior Petoney.

The voyage of Richard Rainolds and Thomas Dassel to the riuers of Senega and Gambia adioyning vpon Guinea, 1591, with a discourse of the treasons of certain of Don Antonio his seruants and followers.

By vertue of her Maiesties most gracious charter giuen in the yeere 1588, and in the thirtieth yeere of her Highnesse reigne, certaine English marchantes are granted to trade, in and from the riuier of Senega to and in the riuier of Gambia, on the Westerne coast of Africa. The chiefe places of traffique on that coast betwene these riuers, are these:

1 Senega riuier: The commodities be hides, gumme, elephants teeth, a few graines, ostrich feathers, amber-greece, and some golde.

2 Beseguiache, a towne by Capo Verde * leagues from Senega riuier: The commodities be small hides, and a few teeth.

3 Resisca Vieio, a towne 4 leagues from Beseguiache: The commodities be small hides, and a few teeth now and then.

4 Palmerin, a towne 2 leagues from Resisca: The commodities be small hides, and a few elephants teeth now and then.

5 Porto d'Ally, a towne 5 leagues from Palmerin: The commodities be small hides, teeth, amber-greece, and a little golde: and many Portugals are there.

6 Candimal, a towne halfe a league from Porto d' Ally: The commodities be small hides, and a few teeth now and then.

7 Palmerin, a towne 3 leagues from Candimal: The commodities be small hides, and a few teeth now and then.

8 Ioala, a towne 6 leagues from Palmerin: The commodities be hides, ware, elephants teeth, rice, and some golde: and many Spaniards and Portugals are there.

9 Gambia river: The commodities are rice, ware, hides, elephants teeth, and golde.

The Frenchmen of Diepe and New-haven haue traded thither about thirty yeres: and commonly with foure or five ships a yere, whereof two small barks go into the riuer of Senega. The other were woont (vntill within these foure yeres, that our ships came thither) to ride with their ships in the road of Porto d' Ally and so sent their small shaloups of fire or eight tunnes to some of these places on the Sea coast befoze repeated. Where in all places generally they were well beloued and as courteously entertained of the Negros, as if they had bene naturally bozne in the countrey. And very often the Negros come into France and returne againe, which is a further increasung of mutuall loue and amity. Since our comming to that coast the Frenchmen ride with their shippes at Refisca Vieio, and suffer vs to ancre with our shippes at Porto d' Ally. The Frenchmen neuer vse to go into the riuer of Gambia: which is a riuer of secret trade and riches concealed by the Portugals. For long since one Frenchman entred the riuer with a small barke which was betrayed, surprised, and taken by two gallies of the Portugals.

Our trade hither beganne 1587.

Gambia a riuer of secret & rich trade concealed.

In our second voyage and second yere there were by vile trecherous meanes of the Portugals and the king of the Negros consent in Porto d' Ally and Ioala about forty Englishmen cruelly slaine and captiued, and most of all of their goods confiscated: whereof there returned onely two, which were the merchants. And also by procurement of Pedro Gonsalues, one of Don Antonio the kings seruants, Thomas Dassel and others had bene betrayed, if it had not pleased almighty God to reueale the same, whereby it was prevented.

The second voyage. Forty Englishmen traitterously slaine and captiued.

From the South side of Senega riuer on the Sea coast vnto about Palmerin is all one kingdom of Negros. The kings name is Melick Zamba, who dwelleth two dayes iourney within the land from Refisca.

The 12 of Nouember 1592, I Richard Rainolds & Thomas Dassel factors in a ship called the Nightingale of London of 125 tunnes, and a pinnesse called the Messenger of 40 tunnes arrived neere vnto Capo Verde at a little Island called The Island of liberty. At this Island we set by a small pinnesse, with which we carry our merchandise on land when wee traffique. And in the meane time Thomas Dassel went with the great pinnesse to traffike with Spaniards or Portugals in Porto d' Ally or Ioala. Duer against the sayd Island on the maine is an habitation of the Negros called Befegueache. The alcaide or gouernor thereof with a great traine came aboord in their canoas to receiue the kings duties for ankerage and permitting the quiet setting by of our pinnesse: who liked passing well that no Portugall came in the shippe, saying, we should be better thought of by the king and people, if we neuer did bring Portugall, but come of our selues as the Frenchmen euer did and doe. And to purchase the more loue, I Richard Rainolds gaue him and all his company courteous entertainment. Also vpon his intreaty, hauing sufficient pledge aboord, I and others went on land with him. At this instant there was great warre betweene this alcaide and another gouernor of the next prouince. Neuerthelste vpon our artiuall truce was taken for a space; and I with our company conducted among both enemies to the gouernors house in Befegueache, and were gently and friendly feasted after their maner, and with some presents returned safe aboord againe. The next day the alcaide came aboord againe, to wil me to send some yron and other commodities in the boat to traffike with the Negros, and also requested me that I would go to Refisca with the ship; which I did. And one thing I noted, that a number of Negros attended the alcaides landing in warlike maner with bowes and poisoned arrowes, darts poisoned, and swordes, (because that the enemies by reason of the truce taken were there also to view the ship) who for the most part approached to him kneeling downe and kissed the backe of his hand.

The 17 of Nouember we weped anker; and by reason no French ship was yet come, I went to the road of Refisca: where I sent for the alcaides interpreters, who came thither aboord, and receiued of me the kings duties for to haue free traffike with the Negros, with whom daily I exchanged my yron & other wares for hides and some elephants teeth, finding the people very friendly and tractable. And the next day after our arriuall I went by into the land about three miles to the towne of Refisca, where I was friendly vled and well entertained of the alcaide, and especially of a yong nobleman called Conde Amar Paray, who presented me with an ore for my company, goats and some yong kids, assuring me that the king would be glad to heare of the arriuall of a Christians ship, whom they called Blancos, that is, white men : especially of an English ship. And so dayly the yong Conde came with a small company of horsemen to the sea side, feasting me very kindly and courteously. And the fift of December he with his traine came aboard to see the ship ; which to them seemed woonderfull, as people that seldome had seene the like : who tolde me that his messenger from the king was returned; and the king reioyced much to heare that English men were come with a ship to trade in his porte ; and being the first Englishman that ever came with a ship, I was the better welcome ; promising that I or any Englishman hereafter should be wel intreated & find good dealing at their hands. And further the Conde on the kings behalfe and his owne, earnestly requested, that before my departure off the coast I would returne againe to his road to conferre with him for the better continuance and confirming of amity betwene them and Englishmen : which I agreed unto. And so shewing him and his company the best friendship and courtesie I could, he went on shoze, and should haue had the hono^r of our ordinance but that he desired the contrary, being amazed at the sight of the ship and noise of the gunnes, which they did greatly admire.

Porto Dally.

The 13 of December at night we weighed anker, and arrived the 14 day at the road of Porto d' Ally, which is another kingdome : the king thereof is called Amar Meleck, & sonne to Meleck Zamba the other king, and dwelleth a dayesourney and an halfe from Porto d' Ally. When we had ankered, the kings kinfolmen being gouernours, with all the officers of that towne came aboard to receiue all duties for the ship & licence to traffike due to the king ; who there generally seemed to be very glad that no Portugall was come in our ship out of England, saying it was the kings pleasure we should bying none hereafter; for that the king did esteeme them as people of no truth; and complained of one Francisco de Costa seruant to Don Antonio, how he had often and the last yere also abused and deluded their king Amar Meleck in promising to bring him certaine things out of England, which he neuer performed, and deemed that to be the cause of his staying behinde this voyage, and that neither Spaniards nor Portugall could abide vs, but reported very badly and gaue out hard speeches tending to the defamacion & great dishonour of England : and also affirmed that at the arriual of an English ship called The Command, of Richard Kelley of Dartmouth, one Pedro Gonfalués a Portugall that came in the sayd ship from Don Antonio reported vnto them, that we were fled out of England and come away vpon intent to rob and do great spoile vpon this coast to the Negros and Portugals, and that Thomas Dassel had murdered Francisco de Acosta since our coming from England, who was coming to their king in our ship with great presents from Don Antonio, and desired that at our arriual stay might be made of our goods and our selues in secret maner; which they denied, not giuing credit to his report, hauing bene often abused by such friuolous and slanderous speeches by that nation; telling me their king was soze for the former murder and captiuitie of our nation, and would neuer yeeld to the like, hauing the Portugals and Spaniards in generall hatred euer since, and conceiuing much better of our countrey and vs, then these our enemies report of. For which I peeled them hearty thanks, assuring them they should finde great difference betwene the loyalty of the one and disloyalty of the other : and so payed their dueties : and for that it was the chiefe place of trade, I shewed them how I was resoluéd to goe to their king with certaine presents which we had brought out of England; which we determined for the moze hono^r and credit of our countrey, and augmenting of their better affection toward vs.

Ioala.

All this while Thomas Dassel was with our great pinnesse at the towne of Ioala, being in the kingdome of king Iocoel Lamiockeric, traffiking with the Spaniards & Portugals there. And the forenamed Pedro Gonfalués, which came out of England, was there also with other English merchants about the busines of Rich. Kelley; and as it should seeme, for that he could not obtaine his mischieuous pretended purpose against Thomas Dassel and others at the towne of Porto d' Ally, where I Richard Rainolds remained, he attempted with consent of other Portugals which were made priuy to his intent to betray the sayd Thomas Dassel at this towne, & had with bribes seduced the chiefe commanders and Negros to effect his wicked & most villanous practise: which as God would, was reuealed to the sayd Thomas Dassel by Rich. Cape an Englishman and seruant to the forenamed Rich. Kelley; to whom this sayd Pedro Gonfalués had disclosed his secret treachery, willing him with all expedition to stand vpon his guard. Whereupon Thomas Dassel went aboard a small English barke called The Cherubin of Lime, and there one Iohn Payua a Portugall and seruant of Don Antonio declared, that if he & one Garcia a Portugall of the sayd towne would haue consented with Pedro Gonfalués, the sayd Thomas Dassel had bene betrayed long before. And vpon this warning Thomas Dassel the next day hauing gotten thre Portugals aboard, aduised for our better securities to send two on land, & detained one with him called Villanoua, telling them that if the next day by eight of the clocke, they would bring Pedro Gonfalués

aboord to him, he would release the sayd Villa noua, which they did not. And Thomas Dassel hauing intelligence that certaine Negros and Portugals were ridden post ouer-land to Porto d' Ally with intent to haue Richard Rainolds and his company stayd on land, being doubtfull what friendship soeuer the vnconstant Negros professed (by reason they be often wauering being ouercome with drinking wine) how they would deale, to preuent the dangerous wiles that might be effected in the roade by Portugals, and for better strength, the 24 of December he came with his pinnesse & Portugall to ride in the roade of Porto d' Ally, where our great shippe the Nighthingall was: who was no sooner arriued but he had newes also from the shoze from Iohn Baily Anthony Dassels seruant, who was there with our goods detained by the Portugals means, that about 20 Portugals and Spaniards were come from Ioala by land, and Pedro Goncalues in their company, to take order for the releasing of Villa noua. So hauing had conference two or three dayes with the Commanders, the Negros, some Spaniards, and some Portugals, in the end by due examination of the matter the Negros seeing how vilsly Pedro Goncalues had delt, he being in their power, sayd he should suffer death or be tortured, for an example to others. But we in recompense of his cruelty pitied him and shewed mercy, desiring the Negros to intreat him well though undeserued: and therupon the Commanders brought him aboard the pinnesse to Thomas Dassel to do with him what he would: where at his coming from the shoze, for lauish speeches which he vsed of Princes, he was well buffeted by a Spaniard, and might haue bene slaine, if for our sakes he had not bene rescued.

While I went on shoze with Villa noua, the sayd Pedro Goncalues confessed vnto Thomas Dassel that he did enquire of some Negros and Portugals if he might not stay him and his goods in the land, and that he did nothing but by commission from his king by his letters which he receiued from London in Dartmouth after we were departed from London, for that we presumed to come to Guinea to traffike without a seruant of his; and further, that he had power of procuration from Francisco de Costa the Portugall that stayed behinde in England to detain the goods of Anthony Dassel in Guinea.

Note.

By consent of M. Francis Tucker, Iohn Browbeare, and the rest of the factours of Richard Kelley, with whom this Pedro Goncalues came, for auoiding further mischief that might be practised, we agreed that the sayd Pedro Goncalues should stay aboard our shippe, and not goe any more on land untill they departed. So the ninth of January he was deliuered aboard to goe for England in the same ship wherein he came; who was all the time of his abode in our shippe both courteously and friendly vsed at my hands, much against the mariners willes, who could not abide such a wicked creature and caitiue, that is nourished and relieued in our countrey, and yet by villanous meanes sought the destruction of vs all.

The Spaniards and Portugals though they be dissemblers and not to be trusted, when they perceiued how king Amar Melicks Negros befriended and fauored vs, and that it would be preiudiciall to their trade for diuers respects, if we should any way be iniured, renounced the sayd practises, detesting the author, and protested to defend vs in such cases with all faithfullnesse; desiring we would, as the king of Negros had commanded vs, neuer bring Portugall with vs more: vsing this phrase in disdain of such as came out of England, let your Portugals be barres of yron: for in tructh in regard of the rich trade maintained by Frenchmen and by vs of late, they esteeme more of one barre of yron then of twenty Portugals which we should bring out of England: who at their coming thither very subtilly disauantage vs, and doe great hurt to euery party.

At the beginning of these boyles the king Amar Melick had sent his chiefe secretary and thre hoyses for me Richard Rainolds: but I denied to goe by reason of the hurley burley, though I might haue had Negros of account for pledges aboard: yet we sent the presents vnto the king; who so soone as he vnderstood the cause why I came not to him, being soyr and offended thereat, commanded presently by proclamation, that no iniury should be offered vs in his dominions by his owne people, or suffered to be done by Spaniards or Portugals. And if the Negros toyning to his kingdom should confederate with the Spaniards and Portugals to molest or trouble vs; that his subiects the Negros should be ready to ayde, succor and defend vs. In which people appeared more confident loue and good will towards vs, then euer we shall finde either of Spaniards or Portugals, though we should relieue them of the greatest misery that can be imagined.

In the riuer of Senega no Spaniard or Portugall vsed to trade: and onely one Portugall called Ganigoga dwelleth farre within the riuer, who was married to a kings daughter.

In the townes of Porto d' Ally and Ioala, being townes of chiefe trade, and in the townes of Canton and Cassin in the riuer of Gambia are many Spaniards and Portugals resident by permission of the Negros; who haue rich trades there along the coast, especially to San Domingo.

and Rio grande, not far distant from Gambra riuier; whither they transport the yron which they buy of Frenchmen and vs, and exchange it for Negros; which be caried continually to the West Indies in such ships as came from Spaine. Also by the gouernors order and Renters of Castel de Mina and other places, where golde is, vpon the coast of Guinea, they haue a place limited how farre they must go to trade within the riuier of Gambra; and further they may not go vpon paine of confiscation of their goods, and losse of life: for that the Renters themselves send at certaine times their owne barks within the riuier to such places, where as they haue great store of golde. And in all these places hereabouts, where we vse to trade, they haue no Fort, Castle, or place of strength, but onely trading by the Negros safeconduct and permission. And the most part of the Spaniards and Portugals that be resident in these places be banished men or fugitiues, for committing most hainous crimes and incestuous acts, their life & conuersation being agreeable; and they are of the basest behauiour that we haue euer seene of these nations in any other countrey.

A brieue relation concerning the estate of the cities and prouinces of Tombuto and Gago written in Marocco the first of August 1594, and sent to M. Anthony Dassel marchant of London.

My hearty commendations premised: your letter of late I receiued, and found that you would haue me discouer unto you the estate & qualty of the countreyes of Tombuto and Gago. And that you may not thinke me to slumber in this action, wherein you would be truly and perfectly resolved, you shall vnderstand, that not ten dayes past here came a Cahaia of the Andoluzes home from Gago, and another principall Pooze, whom the king sent thither at the first with Alcaide Hamode, and they brought with them thirty mules laden with gold. I saw the same come into the Alcaua with mine owne eyes: and these men themselves came not pooze, but with such wealth, that they came away without the kings commandement: and for that cause the king will pay them no wages for the time they haue bene there. On the other side they dare not aske the king for any wages. And when Alcaide Hamode saw that the Cahaia of the Andoluzes would not stay in Gago with him, he thought good to send these thirty mules laden with golde by him, with letters of commendations, by which the king smelled their riches that they brought with them: and this was the cause of the kings displeasure towards them. So now there remaineth in Gago Alcaide Hamode, and Alcaide Iawdara, and Alcaide Bushare. And here are in a readinesse to depart in the end of this next September Alcaide Monfor, Ben Abdrahaman Allies, Monfor Rico with five thousand men, most of the fertillase, that is to say, of fier-mach, & muskets. There is gone good store of reeds & fellowes: and this yere here was want of the same commodities; but I trust the next yere will be no want. But in fine the king doth prosper wel in those parts, and here are many pledges come hither, and namely three of the kings sonnes of Gago and the Justice; I saw them come in with the treasure. Now when Alcaide Monfor cometh to Gago, the which will be in January next, then returneth hither Alcaide Hamode with all the treasure, and Alcaide Monfor is to keepe Gago vntill the king take further order. And thus much for Gago. Thus not hauing any other thing to write at this present, I commend you to the mercifull tuition of the almighty. From Marocco the first of August, 1594.

Another brieue relation concerning the late conquest and the exceeding great riches of the cities and prouinces of Tombuto and Gago, written from Marocco the 30 August 1594, to M. Anthony Dassel marchant of London aforesayd.

Loving friend M. Dassel, two of your letters I haue receiued, one by the Shippe called The Amity, the other by The Concord: the chiefest matter therein was to be satisfied of the king of Marocco his proceedings in Guinea. Therefore these are to let you vnderstand that there went with Alcaide Hamode for those parts seuentene hundred men: who passing ouer the sands, for want of water perished one third part of them: and at their coming to the city of Tombuto, the Negros made some resistance; but to small purpose, for that they had no defence but with their asagaies or iauelings poisoned. So they tooke it, and proceeded to the city of Gago, where the Negros were in number infinite, and meant to stand to the vttermost for their countrey: but the Poozes slew them so fast, that they were faine to yeeld, and do pay tribute by the yere. The rent of of Tombuto is 60 quintals of golde by the peere; the goodnesse whereof you know. What rent Gago will perke, you shall know at the Spring, for then Alcaide Hamode cometh home. The rent of Tombuto is come by the caselow or carouan, which is, as aboue is mentioned, 60 quintals. The report is, that Mahomed bringeth with him such an infinite treasure as I neuer heard of: it doth appeare that they haue moze golde then any other part of the world beside. The Alcaide winneth all the countrey where he goeth without fighting, and is going downe towardes the sea coast. This king of Marocco is like to be the greatest prince in the world for money, if he keepe this countrey. But I make account as soone as the king of Spaine hath quietnesse in Christendome, he wil thrust him out: for that the kings force is not great as yet; but he meaneth to be stronger. There is a campe ready to go now with a viceroy: the speech is with 3000 men: but I thinke they will be hardy 2000; for by report, 3000 men are enough to conquer all the countrey: for they haue no defence of importance against an enemy. I thinke Hamode will be returned home in January or thereabout: for he stayeth but for the coming of the viceroy. Mulley Balafen the kings sonne of Marocco was slaine in Guinea by his owne men, and they were presently killed, because they should tell no tales. And thus leauing to trouble you, I commit you to God, who prosper you in all your proceedings. From Marocco the first of August 1594.

Writs to command for euer Laurence Madoe.

Of these two rich cities and kingdomes of Tombuto and Gago Leo Africanus writeth at large in the beginning of his seueneth booke of the description of Africa, which worthily worke is to be annexed vnto the end of this second volume.

A brieve extract of a patent granted to M. Thomas Gregory of Tanton, and others, for traffique betweene the riuer of Nonnia and the riuers of Madrabumba and Sierra Leona on the coast of Guinea, in the yeere 1592.

IN Day the 34 yeere of our gracious soueraigne Queene Elizabeth, a patent of speciall licence was granted to Thomas Gregory of Tanton in the countrey of Somerset, and to Thomas Pope, and certaine other marchants to traffique into Guinea from the Northernmost part of the riuer of Nonnia to the Southernmost parts of the riuers of Madrabumba and Sierra Leona, and to other parts as well to the Southeast as to the Northwest, for a certaine number of leagues therein specified which amount to an hundred or thereabout. Which patent was granted for the terme of ten yerres: as appeareth at large in the sayd patent recorded in the Rolles in her Maiesties Chancery.

The maner of the taking of two Spanish ships laden with quick-siluer & the Popes bulles, bound for the West Indies, by M. Thomas White in the Amity of London. 1592.

IN the 26 of July 1592, in my returning out of Barbary in the ship called the Amity of London, being in the height of 36 degrees or thereabout, at foure of the clocke in the morning we had sight of two shippes, being distant from vs about three or foure leagues: by seuen of the clocke we fetched them vp, and were within gitting shot: whose boldnesse, hauing the king of Spaines armes displayed, did make vs iudge them rather ships of warre, then laden with merchandise. And as it appeared by their owne speeches, they made full account to haue taken vs: it being a question among them, whether it were best to cary vs to S. Lucar, or to Lisbon. We waied eche other a maine. They hauing placed themselves in warlike order one a cables length before another, we began the fight. In the which we continued, so fast as we were able to charge and discharge, the space of five houres, being neuer a cables length distant either of vs from ocher. In which time we receiued diuers shot both in the hull of our ship, masts, and sailes, to the number of 32 great, besides 500 musket shot and harquebuzes a crocke at the least, which we tolde after the fight. And because we persecuted them to be stout, we thought good to boord the Biscaine, which was on head the other: where lying aboord about an houre, and plying our ordnance and small shot; in the end we stowed all his men. Now the other in the flieboat, thinking we had entred our men in their fellow, bare roome with vs, meaning to haue laped vs aboord, and so to haue intrapped vs betwixt them both: which we perceiuing, sicted our ordnance so for him, as we quitted our selues of him, and he boorded his fellow: by which meanes they both fell from vs. Then presently we kept our looke, hoised our top-sailes, and weatheted them, and came hard aboord the flieboat with our ordnance prepared, and gaue her our whole broad side, with the which we flew diuers of their men; so as we might see the blood run out at the scupper holes. After that we cast about, and new charged all our ordnance, and came vpon them againe, willing them to yeeld, or els we would sinke them: whereupon the one would haue yeelded, which was shot betwene winde and water; but the other called him traitor. Vnto whom we made answere, that if he would not yeeld presently also, we would sinke him first. And thereupon he understanding our determination, presently put out a white flag, and yeelded, and yet refused to strike their owne sailes, for that they were sworne neuer to strike to any Englishman. We then commanded their captaines and matters to come aboard vs; which they did. And after examination & showing them, we sent certaine of our owne men aboard them, and strook their sailes, and manned their ships: finding in them both 126 persons liuing, & 8 dead, besides those which they themselves had cast ouerboard. So it pleased God to giue vs the victory being but 42 men and a boy, whereof 2 were killed, and 3 wounded: for the which good successe we giue God the only praise. These two rich prizes laden with 1400 chests of quicksiluer with the armes of Castile and Leon fastened vpon them, and with a great quantiey of bulles or indulgences, and gilded Missals or Seruice books, with an hundred tunnes of excellent wines, we brought shortly after into the riuer of Thames vnto Blacke-wall.

By the taking of this quicksiluer, about 1400 chests, the king of Spaine loseth for euery quintall of the same a quintall of siluer, that should haue bene deliuered him by the matters of the mines there, which amounteth to 600000 pounds.

More by taking of his bulles, to wit, two millions and 72 thousand for liuing and dead persons for the prouinces of Noua Hispania, Iucatan, Guarimala, the Honduras, and the Philipinas, taxed at two reals the peece. And more for eightene thousand bulles taxed at foure reals, amounteth all to 107700 pounds. Summa totalis 707700 li.

More there were taken ten farbels of gilt missals and breuiaries sent for the kings account.

So the hinderance that the king receiueth by the losse of his bulles and quicksiluer amounteth as is abovesaid: besides the lacking of his wines, about 100 tunnes, whereby his fleet is disappointed of a great part of their prouision.

A true report of the honourable seruice at Sea perfourmed by Sir John Burrough Knight, Lieutenant generall of the fleet prepared by the honor. Sir Walter Raleigh Knight, Lord warden of the Stanneries of Cornwall and Denon. Wherin chiefly the Santa Clara of Biscay, a ship of 600 tunnes was taken, and the two East Indian caraks, the Santa Cruz and the Madre de Dios were forced, the one burnt, and the other taken and brought into Dartmouth the seuenth of September, 1592.

Sir Walter Raleigh vpon commission receiued from her Maiesty for an expedition to be made to the West Indies, slackted not his vttermost diligence to make full prouision of all things necessary, as both in his choise of good ships, and sufficient men to performe the action euidently appeared. For his shippes which were in number 14 or 15, those two of her Maiesties, the Garland & the Fore sight were the chiefest; the rest either his owne or his good friends or aduenturers of London. For the gentlemen his consoytes and officers, to giue them their right, they were so well qualified in courage, experience, & discretion, as the greatest prince might repute himselfe happy to be serued with their like. The honoz of Lieutenant generall was imposed vpon sir John Burrough, a gentleman, for his manifold good and heroicall parts, thought euery way worthy of that commandement: with whom after sir W.R. returned was ioyned in commission sir Martin Frobisher, who for his speciall skill & knowledge in marine causes had formerly caried imployments of like or greater place. The rest of the captaines, souldiers, and sailers were men of notable resolution, and for the most part such as heretofore had giuen to the world sufficient prooffe of their valout in diuers seruices of the like nature. With these ships thus manned sir Walter Raleigh departed towards the West countrey, there to store himselfe with such further necessities as the state of his voyage did needfully require: where the Westerly windes blowing for a long time contrary to his course, bound and constrained him to keepe harborough so many weeks, that the fittest season for his purpose was gone, the mindes of his people much altered, his victuals consumed; and withall, her Maiesty understanding how crossly all this sort, began to call the proceeding of this preparation into question: insomuch that, whereas the first of May was first come before sir Walter could put to sea, the very next day sir Martin Frobisher in a pinnesse of my lord Admirals called The Disdaine, met him, and brought to him from her Maiesty letters of reuocation, with commandement to relinquish (for his owne part) the intended attempt, and to leaue the the charge and conduct of all things in the hands of sir John Burrough and sir Martin Frobisher. But sir Walter finding his honor so farre engaged in the vnder taking of this voyage, as without proceeding he saw no remedy either to salve his reputation, or to content those his friends which had put in adventures of great summes with him; and making construction of the Quenes letters in such sort as if her commandement had bene propounded in indifferent termes, either to advance forward or to retire; at his owne discretion; would in no case yeeld to leaue his fleet now under saile. Wherefore continuing his course into the sea, he met within a day or two, with certaine sailles lately come from Spaine: among which was a ship appertaining to Monsieur Gourdon gouernor of Caleis, and found aboard her one D. Neuell Daues an Englishman, who hauing indured a long and miserable captivity for the space of twelue yeeres, partly in the inquisition in Spaine, was now by good fortune escaped, and upon returne to his countrey. This man, among other things, reported for certaine, that there was little hope of any good this yeere to be done in the West India; considering that the king of Spaine had sent expresse order to all the ports both of the Ilands and of Terra firma, that no ship should stirre that yeere, nor any treasure be layed aboard for Spaine. But neither this vnpleasant relation nor ought els could stay his proceedings, untill a tempest of strange and vnconth violence arising vpon Thursday the 11 of May, when he was athwart the Cape Finister, had so scattered the greater part of the fleet, and sunke his boats and pinnelles, that as the rest were ozien and seuered, some this way and some that, sir Walter himselfe being in the Garland of her Hatesly was in danger to be swallowed vp of the Sea; Whereupon sir W. Raleigh finding that the season of the yeere was too farre gone to proceed with the enterprize which he had vpon Panama, hauing bene held on the English coast from February till May, and thereby spent thre moneths victuals; and considering withall, that to lie vpon the Spanish coast or at the Ilands to attend the returne of the East or West Indian fleets was rather a worke of patience then ought els: he gaue directions to sir John Burgh and sir M. Frobisher to diuide the fleet in two parts; sir M. with the Garland, cap. George Gifford, cap. Henry Thin, cap. Grenoile and others to lie off the South cape, thereby to amaze the Spanish fleet, and to holde them on their owne coast; while sir I. Burgh, cap. Robert Crosse, capt. Tomson, & others should attend at the Ilands for the caraks or any other Spanish ships comming from Mexico or other parts of the West Indies. Which direction tooke effect accordingly; for the king of Spaines Admirall receiuing intelligence that the English fleet was come on the coast, attended to defend the South parts of Spaine, & to keepe himselfe as nere sir Mart. Frobisher as he could, to impeach him in all things which he might vnder take; and thereby neglected the safer conduct of the caraks, with whom it fared as hereafter shall appeare. Before the fleet seuered themselves they mette with a great Viscain on the Spanish coast called Santa Clara a ship of 600 tunnes.

The Santa Clara

taken.

The noise of the artillery on both sides being heard, immediately they drew to their fleet; where after a reasonable hot fight, the ship was entered and mastered, which they found freighted with all sorts of small yron-wooke, as horse-shoes, nails, plough-shares, yron barres, spikes, boulds, locks, gimboles, & such like, valued by vs at 6000 or 7000 li. but worth to them treble the value. This Viscain was sailing towards S. Lucar, there to take in some further provision for the West India. This ship being first roomaged, and after sent for England, our fleet coasted along towards the South cape of S. Vincent, and by the way, about the Rocks nere Lisbon, sir John Burrough in the Robucke spying a saile a farre off, gaue her present chase; which being a flieboat and of good saile, drew him farre Southwards before he could fetch her; but at last she came under his lee and strooke saile. The master of which flieboat comming aboard him, confessed that the king indeed had prepared a great fleet in S. Lucar and Cadiz, and (as the report in Spaine was currant) for the West Indies. But in deed the Spanish king had prouided this fleet vpon this counsell. He receiued intelligence, that sir Walter Raleigh was to put out strong for the West India: to impeach him, and to ranconter his force he appointed this fleet; although looking for the arriual of his East Indian caraks, he first ordained those ships to waite them from the Açores. But perswading himselfe, that if the fleet of sir Walter Raleigh did go for the West India, then the Ilands should haue none to infect them but some small men of warre, which the caraks of themselves would be well able to match; his order was to Don Alonso de Bagan brother to the Marques of Santa Cruz, and Generallof his armada, to pursue sir Walters fleet, and to confront him, what course soeuer he held. And that this was true, our men in short time by prooffe vnderstood: for sir John Burrough, not long after the taking of his last prize the flieboat, as he sailed backe againe towards the rest of his company, discouered the Spanish fleet to sea-ward of him: which hauing likewise espied him betwixt them and the Shore, made full account to bring him safe into Spanish harbour; and therefore spied themselves in such sort before him, that indeed his danger was very great: for both the liberty of the sea was brought into a narrow straight, and the Shore being enemy could give him no comfort or reliefe : so that trusting to Gods helpe onely and his good saile, he thrust out from among them in spite of all their force, and to the notable illusion of all their cunning, which they shewed to the uttermost, in laying the way for his apprehension. But now sir John Burrough having happily escaped their clutches, finding the coast guarded by this fleet, and knowing it was but folly to expect a meeting there with sir Martin Probisher (who understanding of this armada as well as himselfe, would be sure not to come that way) beganne to hope his course to the Agores according to sir W. Raleighs direction, and came in sight of S. Michael, running so neere by Villa Franca, that he might easily discern the shippes lying there at anchor. Divers small caravels both here and betweene S. Georges and the Pike in his course toward Flores he intercepted; of which no great intelligence for his affaires could be understood. Arriving before Flores upon Thursday the 21 of June, towards evening, accompanied onely with captain Caufield and the Master of his shippe, the rest not being yet arrived, he made towards the shore with his boat, finding all the people of of Santa Cruz, a villiage of that Island, in armes, fearing their landing, and ready marshalled to defend their towne from spoile. Sir John contrariwise made signes of amity unto them by advancing a white flagge, a common token of peace, which was answered againe of them with the like : whereupon ensued intercourses of good friendship; and pledges were taken on both sides, the captaine of the towne for them, and captaine Caufield for ours : so that whatsoeuer our men wanted, which that place could supply either in fresh water, victuals, or the like, was very willingly granted by the inhabitants : and good leave had they to refresh themselves on shore as much and as oft as they would without restraint. At this Santa Cruz sir John Burrough was informed, that indeed there was among them no expectation of any fleet to come from the West, but from the East, that no longer since then three dayes before his arrivall a carak was passed by for Lisbon, and that there were foure caraks more behinde, of one consort. Sir John being very glad of this newes, stayed no longer on shore, but presently imbarqued himselfe, having onely in company a small barke of threescore tunnes belonging to one M. Hopkins of Bristol. In the meane while that these things thus passed at Flores, part of the rest of the English fleet, which sir John Burrough had left upon the coast of Spaine, were also towards the Agores : and whereas he quickly at sea had discovered one of the caraks, the same evening he might descry two or thre of the Earle of Cumberlands shippes (whereof one M. Norton was captaine) which having in like sort kenned the carak, pursued her by that course which they saw her to runne towards the Islands, But on no side was there any way made by reason of a great calme which peeled no breath to spread a saile. Insomuch that sely to discover her what she was, of what burthen, force, and countenance, sir John Burrough tooke his boat, and rowed the space of thre miles, to make her exactly : and being returned, he consulted with the better sort of the company then present, upon the boording her in the morning. But a very mighty storme arising in the night, the extremity thereof forced them all to wey anchors, yet their care was such in wrestling with the weather not to lose the carak, that in the morning, the tempest being qualified, and our men bearing againe with the shore, they might perceiue the carak very neere the land, and the Portugals confusedly carrying on shore such things as they could any manner of way convey out of her ; and seeing the haste our men made to come upon them, forsooke her : but first, that nothing might be left commodious to our men, set fire to that which they could not carry with them, intending by that meanes wholly to consume her ; that neither glory of victory nor benefit of shippe might remaine to ours. And least the approach and industry of the English should bring meanes to extinguish the flame, thereby to preserve the residue of that which the fire had not destroyed ; being foure hundred of them in number and well armed, they intrenched themselves on land so neere to the carak, that she being by their forces protected, and our men kept aloofe off, the fire might continue to the consumption of the whole. This being noted by sir John Burrough he soone provided a present remedy for this mischief. For landing one hundred of his men, whereof many did swim and wade more then best high to shore, and easily scattering those that presented themselves to guard the coast, he no sooner drew toward their new trenches, but they fled immediatly, leaving as much as the fire had spared to be the reward of our mens paines. Here was taken among others one Vincent Fonseca a Portugall, Purser of the carak, with two others, one an Almaine and the second a Low-dutchman, canoniers : who refusing to make any voluntary report of those things which were demanded of them, had the torture threatened, the feare whereof at the last wrested from them this intelligence, that within fiftene dayes three or ther greater caraks then that lately fired would arrive at the same Island : and that being five caraks in the fleet at their departure from Goa, to wit, the Buen Jesus admirall, the Madre de Dios, the S. Bernardo, the S. Christophero, and the S. Cruz, (whose fortune you have already heard) they had received speciall commandement from the king not to touch in any case at the Island of S. Helena, where the Portugall caraks in their returne from the East India were alwayes till now wont to arrive to refresh themselves with water and victuals. And the kings reason was; because of the English men of warre, who (as he was informed) lay there in wait to intercept them. If therefore their necessity of water should drive them to seek supply any where, he appointed them Angola in the maine of Africa, with order there to stay onely the taking in of water to avoid the inconvenience of infections, wherunto that hot latitude is dangerously subject. The last rendezvous for them all was the Island of Flores, where the king assured them not to misse of his armiadathither sent of purpose for their waiting to Lisbon. Upon this information sir John drew to counsell, meeting there captaine Norton, captaine Dounton, captaine Abraham Cocke, captaines of three ships of the Earle of Cumberland, ss. Tomson of Harwich cap. of the Dainty of sir John Haukins, one of sir W. Raleghs fleet, and ss. Christopher Newport cap. of the Golden dragon newly returned from the West India, and others. These being assembled, he communicated with them what he had understood of the foresaid examminates, and what great presumptions of crueltie their relation did carry: wishing that forasmuch as God & good fortune had brought them together in so good a season, they would shew the uttermost of their endeavors to bring these Easterlings vnder the lee of the English obedience. Whereupon a present accord on all sides followed not to part company or leaue of those seas till time should present cause to put their consultations in execution. The next day her Maiesties good ship the Foresight commanded by sir Rob. Crosse came in to the rest: and he likewise informed of the matter was soone drawn into this service. Thus sir John with all these ships departing thence 6 or 7 leagues to the West of Flores, they spread themselves abroad from the North to the South, each ship two leagues at the least distant from another. By which order of extension they were able to discover the space of two whole degrees at sea. In this sort they lay from the 29 of June to the third of August, what time cap. Thomson in the Dainty had first sight of the huge carak called the Madre de Dios, one of the greatest receit belonging to the crowne of Portugall. The Dainty being of excellent saile got the start of the rest of our fleet, and began the conflict some what to her cost, with the slaughter and hurt of diuers of her men. Within a while after, sir John Burrough in the Robucke of sir W. Raleghs, was at hand to second her, who saluted her with shot of great ordinance, and continued the fight within musket shot assisted by cap. Tomson and cap. Newport till sir R. Crosse viceadmirall of the fleet came by being to leeward, at whose arrival sir I. Burgh demanded of him what was best to be done, who answered, that if the carak were not boozed she would recouer the shore and fire herselfe as the other had done. Whereupon sir I. Burgh concluded to intangle her; and sir R. Crosse promised also to fasten himselfe to her together at the instant; which was performed: but after a while sir John Burgh receiuing a shot with a canon perier vnder water, and ready to sinke, desired sir R. C. to fall off, that he might also cleere himselfe, and saue his ship from sinking, which with difficulty he did: for both the Roebucke and the Foresight were so intangled, as with much adoe could they cleere themselves.

Angola a new watering place for the caraks.

The same evening sir R. Crosse finding the carak then sure & drawing nere the Island perswaded his company to boozd her againe, or els there was no hope to recouer her: who after many excuses & feares, were by him encouraged, and so fell achwart her foreships all alone; and so hindered her sailing that the rest had time to come up to his succour, & to recouer the carak yet she recouered the land: and so to ward the evening after he had fought with her alone three houres single, my lord of Cumberlands two ships came up, & with very litle losse entred with sir R. Crosse, who had in that time broken their courages, and made the assault easie for the rest.

The Madre de Dios taken.

The generall hauing disarmed the Portugals, and stowed them for better security on all sides, first had presented to his eyes the true proportion of the vast body of this carak, which did then and may still iustly prouoke the admiration of all men not formerly acquainted with such a sight. But albeit this first apparance of the hugeness thereof yelded sights enough to entertaine our mens eyes; yet the pitifull object of so many bodiees slaine and dismembred could not but draw each mans eye to see, and heart to lament, and hands to helpe those miserable people, whose limmes were so torne with the violence of shot, and paine made grieuous with the multitude of woundes. No man could almost stepp but vpon a dead carcasse or a bloody flooze, but specially about the helme, where very many of them fell suddenly from stirring to dyping. For the greatnesse of the strage requiring the labour of twelue or foureteene men at once, and some of our shippes beating her in at the sterne with their ordinance often times with one shot slew foure or five labouring on either side of the helme; whose roomes being still furnished with fresh supplies, and our artillery still playing vpon them with continuall volleys, it could not be but that much blood should be shed in that place. Whereupon our Generall moued with singular commiseration of their misery, sent them his owne chyrurgions, denying them no possible helpe or reliefe that he or any of his company could afford them. Among the rest of those, whose state this chance had made very deplorable, was Don Fernando de Mendoca Grand captain and Commander of this Caracke: who indeed was descended of the house of Mendoca in Spaine; but being married into Portugall, lived there as one of that nation; a gentleman well stricken in yeeres, well spoken, of comely personage, of good nature, but of hard fortune. In his severall services against the Moores he was twice taken prisoner, and both times ransomed by the king. In a former voyage of returne from the East India he was driven upon the Baros or sands of Iudaea neere the coast of Cephalo, being then also captain of a caracke which was there lost, and himselfe, though escaping the sea-danger, yet fell into the hands of Infidels on land; who kept him under long and grievous servitude. Once more the king carrying a loving respect to the man, and desirous to better his condition, was content to let him try his fortune in this Easterly navigation, and committed unto him the conduct of this caracke, wherein he went from Lisbon General of the whole fleet, and in that degree had returned, if the Vice-rey of Goa embarked for Portugall in the Bon Jesus had not, by reason of his late office, bene preferred. Sir Iohn intending not to adde too much affliction to the afflicted, mocked with pity and compassion of humane misery, in the end resolved freely to dismiss this captain & the most part of his followers to their owne countrey, and for the same purpose bestowed them in certaine vessels furnished with all kindes of necessary provision. This businesse thus dispatched, good leasure had he to take such view of the goods as conveniency might afford. And having very prudently (to cut off the unprofitable spoile & pillage whereunto he saw the minds of many inclined) seized upon the whole to her Majesties use, after a short & slender romaging & searching of such things as first came to hand, he perceived that y^e wealth would arise nothing dissatisfis to expectation; but that the variety and quantity of all rich commodities would be more then sufficient to content both the adventures desire & the soldiers travell. And here I cannot but enter into the consideration and acknowledgement of Gods great favour towards our nation, who by putting this purchase into our hands hath manifestly discovered those secret trades & Indian riches, which hitherto lay strangely hidden, and cunningly concealed from us; whereof there was among some few of us some small and imperfect glimpse onely, which now is turned into the broad light of full and perfect knowledge. Whereby it should seeme that the will of God for our good is (if our weaknesse could apprehend it) to have us communicate with them in those East Indian treasures, & by the erection of a lawfull traffike to better our meanes to advance true religion and his holy service. The caracke being in burden by the estimation of the wise and experienced no lesse then 1600 tunnes had full 900 of those stowed with the grosse bulke of marchandise, the rest of the tunnage being allowed, partly to the ordnance which were 32 pieces of brasse of all sorts, partly to the passengers and the victuals, which could not be any small quantity, considering the number of the persons betwixt 600 and 700, and the length of the navigation. To give you a taste (as it were) of the commodities, it shall suffice to deliver you a generall particularity of them, according to the catalogue taken at Leaden hall the 15 of September 1592. Where upon good view it was found, that the principall wares after the jewels (which were no doubt of great value, though they never came to light) consisted of spices, drugges, silks, calicos, quilts, carpets and colours, &c. The spices were pepper, cloves, maces, nutmegs, cinamom, Greene ginger: the drugges were beniamin, frankincense, galingale, mirabolans, aloes, socorrina, camphire: the silks, damasks, taffatas, sarcenets, altoballos, that is, counterfeit cloth of gold, unwrought China silke, seaued silke, white twisted silke, curled cypresse. The calicos were book-calicos, calico-laines, broad white calicos, fine starched calicos, coarse white calicos, browne broad calicos, browne coarse calicos. There were also canopies, and coarse diaper-towels, quilts of coarse sarcenet and of calico, carpets like those of Turkey; wherunto are to be added the pearle, muske, cinet, and amber-greece. The rest of the wares were many in number, but lesse in value; as elephants teeth, porcellan vessels of China, coco-nuts, hides, eben-wood as blacke as iet, bedsteads of the same, cloth of the rindes of trees very strange for the matter, and artificiall in worke-manship. All which piles of commodities being by men of approued iudgement rated but in reasonable sort amounted to no lesse then 150000 li. sterling, which being divided among the adventures (whereof her Majestie was the chiefe) was sufficient to yeeld contentment to all parties. The cargazon being taken out, and the goods freighted in terme of our ships sent for London, to the end that the bignesse, heighth, length, bredth, and other dimensions of so huge a vessel might by the exact rules of Geometrical observations be truly taken, both for present knowledge, and derivation also of the same unto posterity, one M. Robert Adams, a man in his faculty of excellent skill, omitted nothing in the description, which either his arte could demonstrate, or any mans iudgement thinke woorthy the memory. After an exquisite survey of the whole frame he found the length from the beak-head to the sterne (whereupon was erected a lanterne) to containe 165 foote. The breadth in the second close decke whereof she had thre, this being the place where there was most extension of breadth, was 46 foot and 10 inches. She dyew in water 31 foot at her departure from Cochín in India, but not above 26 at her arrivall in Dartmouth, being lightened in her voyage by divers meanes, some 5 foote. She caried in height 7 senerall stopies, one maine Doyl, thre close decks, one fore-castle, and a spar-decke of two floozes a piece. The length of the keele was 100 foote, of the maine-mast 121 foot, and the circuite about at the partners 10 foote 7 inches, the maine-yard was 106 foote long. By which perfect commensuration of the parts appeareth the hugeness of the whole, farre beyond the mould of the biggest shipping used among vs either for warre or receit.

Don Alonso de Baçan hauing a great Fleet and suffering these two caracks, the Santa Cruz to be burnt, and the Madre de Dios to be taken, was disgraced by his prince for this negligence.

The firing and sinking of the stout and warrelike Carack called Las Cinque Llaguas, or, The five Wounds, by three rall Ships set forth at the charges of the right honorable the Erle of Cumberland and his friends: Written by the discret and valiant captaine M. Nicholas Downton.

In the latter ende of the yeere 1593, the right honourable Erle of Cumberland, at his owne charges and his friends, prepared 3 ships all at equall rate, and either of them had like quantitie of victuals, and like numbers of men, there being embarked in all 3 ships 420 men of all sorts, The Roial Exchange went as Admirall, wherein M. George Caue was captaine. The May-flower Viceadmirall vnder the conduct of William Anthonie: and the Sampson, the charge whereof it pleased his honour to commit vnto me Nicholas Downton. Our directions were sent vs to Plimmouth, and we were to open them at sea.

Besides these 3 ships there was a pinnas called the Viollet, of the Why not 1.

The first of April 1594 we set sayle in the sound of Plimmouth, directing our course toward the coast of Spaine.

The 24 of the sayd moneth at the Admirals direction wee diuided our selues East and West from ech other, being then in the heighth of 43 degrees, with commandement at night to come together againe.

The 27 day in the morning we deserted the May-flower and the little Pinnasse with a Prize that they had taken, being of Viana in Portugall, and bound for Angola in Africa. This Barke was of 28 tunnes, hauing some 17 persons in the same. There were in her some 12 Butts of Galicia wine, whereof we tooke into euery shippe a like part, with some Ruske in chests and barrels, with 5 butts of blew course cloth, and certaine course linnen-cloth for Negros shirts, which goods were diuided among our fleet.

Commodities fit for Angola.

The 4 of May we had sight of our Pinnasse, and the Admirals Shallop which had taken thre Portugall Carauels, whereof they had sent two away and kept the third.

The second of June we had sight of S. Michael. The third day in the morning wee sent our small pinnasse, which was of some 24 tunnes, with the small Carauell which we had taken at the Burlings to range the road of all the Islands, to see if they could get any thing in the same: appointing them to meet vs W.S.W. 12 leagues from Faiall. Their going from vs was to no purpose. They missed coming to vs whē we appointed, as also we missed them, when we had great cause to haue vied them.

The 13 of June we met with a mightie Carack of the East Indies, called Las cinque Llagas, or The five wounds. The May-flower was in sight with her befoze night. I, in the Sampson, fetched her vp in the euening, and as I commanded to giue her the broad side, as we terme it, while I stood very heedfully pyying to discouer her strength: and where I might giue counsel to boord her in the night when the Admirall came by to vs, and as I remember at the very first shot she discharged at vs, I was shot in a little above the belly, whereby I was made vnseruicable for agood while after, without touching any other for that night. Yet by meanes of an honest true-hearted man which I had with me, one captaine Grant, nothing was neglected: vntill midnight when the Admirall came by, the May-flower, and the Sampson neuer left by turnes to ply her with their great ordinance; but then captaine Caue wished vs to stay till morning, at what time each one of vs should giue her thre bouts with our great ordinance, as should clapy her a boord: but in deed it was long lingered in the morning vntill 10 of the clocke befoze wee attempted to boord her. The Admirall laid her a boord in the mid ship: the May-flower coming vp in the quarter, as it should seeme, to lie at the sterne of the Admirall on the larboord side. The captaine of the sayd May-flower was slaine at the first coming by: whereby the ship fell to the sterne of the the out-licar of the Carack, which (being a piece of timber) so wounded her fore-saile, that they sayd they could come no more to fight, I am sure they did not, but kept aloofe from vs. The Sampson went aboord on the bow, but hauing not roome enough, our quarter lay on the Exchâges bow, and our bowe on the Caracks bowe. The Exchange also at the first comming had her captaine M. Caue shot into both the legs, the one whereof he neuer recovered, so he for that present was not able to doe his office, and in his absence he had not any that would undertake to lead out his company to enter vpon the enemye. My friend captaine Grant did lead my men on the Caracks side, which being not manfully backed by the Exchanges men, his forces being smal, made the enemye bolder then he would haue bene, whereby I had five men presently slaine and many more hurt, which made them that remained unhurt to returne aboord, and would neuer more giue the assault. I say not but some of the Exchanges men did very well, and many more (no doubt) would haue done the like, if there had bene any principall man to haue put them forward, and to haue brought all the company to the fight, and not to haue run into corners themselves. But I must needs say, that their ship was as well provided for defence, as any that I haue seene. And the Portugals per- aduventure encouraged by our slacke working, plaied the men and had Barricados made, where they might stand without any danger of our shot. They plied vs also very much with fire, so that most of our men were burnt in some place or other: & while our men were putting out of the fire, they would euer be plying them with small shot or darts. This vnusuall casting of fire did much dismay many of our men and made them draw backe as they did. When we had not men to enter, we plied our great ordnance much at them as high vp as they might be mounted, for otherwise we did them little harme, and by shooting a piece out of our fore-castle being close by her, we fired a mat on her beak-head, which more and more kindled, and ran from thence to the mat on the bowsprit, and from the mat by to the wood of the bowsprit, and thence to the top-saile yard, which fire made the Portugals abast in the ship to stagger, and to make shew of parle. But they that had the charge before encouraged them, making shew, that it might easily be put out, and that it was nothing. Whereupon againe they stood stiffly to their defence. A none the fire grew so strong, that I saw it beyond all helpe, although she had bene already prelosed to vs. Then we desired to be off from her, but had little hope to obtaine our desire; neuerthelesse we plied water very much to keep our ship well. In deed I made little other reckoning for the ship, my selfe, and diuers hurt men, then to haue ended there with the Carack, but most of our people might haue saued themselves in boats. And when my care was most, by Gods prouidence onely, by the burning asunder of our spitsaile-yard with ropes and saile, and the ropes about the spitsaile-yard of the Carack, whereby we were fast intangled, we fell apart, with burning of some of our sailes which we had then on boord. The Exchange also being farther from the fire, afterward was more easily cleared, and fell off from abast. And as soone as God had put vs out of danger, the fire got into the fore-castle, where, I thinke, was store of Benjamin, and such other like combustible matter, for it flamed and ran ouer all the Carack at an instant in a maner. The Portugals lept ouer-boord in great numbers. Then sent I captaine Grant with the boat, with leaue to vse his owne discretion in sauing of them. So he brought me aboord two gentlemen, the one an old man called Nuno Velio Pereira, which (as appeareth by the 4 chapter in the first booke of the moorthy history of Huighen de Linschoren) was gouernour of Moçambique and Cefala, in the yeere 1582, and since that time had bene likewise a gouernour in a place of importance in the East Indies. And the shippe where in he was comming home was cast away a litle to the East of the Cape of Buona Speranza, and from thence he trauelled ouer-land to Moçambique, and came as a passenger in this Carack. The other was called Bras Carrero, and was captaine of a Carack which was cast away neere Moçambique, and came likewise in this ship for a passenger. Also three men of the inferior sort we saued in our boat, onely these two we clothed and brought into England. The rest which were taken by by the other ship boats, we set all on shore in the Ile of Flores, except some two or thye Negros, whereof one was borne in Moçambique, and another in the East Indies. This fight was open off the Sound betweene Faial and Pico 6 leagues to the Southward. The people which we saued told vs that the cause why they would not peeld, was, because this Carack was for the king, and that she had all the goods belonging to the king in the countrey for that yeere in her, and that the captaine of her was in fauour with the king, and at his returne into the Indies should haue bene Viceroy there. And withall this ship was nothing at all peckered neither within boord nor without, and was more like a ship of warre then otherwise: moreover, she had the ordnance of a Carack that was cast away at Moçambique, and the company of her, together with the company of another Carack that was cast away a litle to the Eastwards of the Cape of Buona Speranza. Yet though sickness which they caught at Angola, where they watered, they say, they had not now aboue 150 white men, but Negros a great many. They likewise affirmed that they had three noblemen and three ladies on her, but we found them to differ in most of their raikes. All this day and all the night she burned, but the next morning her powder which was lowest being 60 barrels blew her aboard, so that most of the ship did swim in parts above the water. Some of them say, that she was bigger then the Madre de Dios, and some, that she was lesse: but she was much undermasted, and under sailed, yet she went well for a ship that was so foule. The shot which wee made at her in great Ordinance before we layde her aboard might be at seuen bouts which we had, and fire of 7 shot at a bout, one with another, some 49 shot: the time we lay aboard might be two houres. The shot which we discharged aboard the Carack might be some twentie Sacars. And thus much may suffice concerning our dangerous conflict with that unfortunate Carack.

The last of June after long trauersing of the Seas we had sight of another mightie Carack, which diuerse of our company at the first tooke to be the great S. Philip the Admirall of Spaine, but the next day being the first of July fetching her by we perceiued her indeede to be a Carack, which after some few shot bestowed vpon her we summoned to yeeld; but they standing stoutly to their defence utterly refused the same. Wherefore seeing no good could be done without boording her I consulted what course we should take in the boording. But by reason that wee which were the chiefe Capitaines were partly slaine and partly wounded in the former conflict, and because of the murmuring of some disordered and cowardly companions, our valiant and resolute determinations were crossed: and to conclude a long discourse in few wordes, the Carack escaped our hands. After this attending about Coruo & Flores for some West Indian purchase, and being disappointed of our expectation, and victuals growing short, we returned for England, where I arrived at Portesmouth the 28 of August.

The casting away of the Tobie neere Cape Espartel corruptly called Cape Sprat without the Straight of Gibraltar on the coast of Barbarie. 1593.

The Tobie of London a ship of 250 tunnes manned with fiftie men, the owner whereof was the worshipfull M. Richard Staper, being bound for Liorno, Zante and Patras in Morea, being laden with marchandize to the value of 11 or 12 thousand pounds sterling, set sayle from Black-wall the 16 day of August 1593, and we went thence to Portesmouth where we tooke in great quantitie of wheate, and set sayle forth of Stokes bay in the Isle of Wight, the 6 day of October, the winde being faire: and the 16 of the same moneth we were in the height of Cape S. Vincent, where on the next morning we descried a sayle which lay in try right a head off vs, to which we gaue chase with very much winde, the sayle being a Spaniard, which wee found in fine so good of sayle that we were faine to leaue her and giue her ouer. Two dayes after this we had sight of mount Chiego, which is the first high-land which we descrie on the Spanish coast at the entrance of the Straight of Gibraltar, where we had very foule weather and the winde scant two dayes together. Here we lay off to the sea. The Master, whose name was George Goodlay, being a young man, and one which neuer tooke charge before for those parts, was very proud of that charge which he was litle able to discharge, neither would take any counsel of any of his company, but did as he thought best himselfe, & in the end of the two dayes of foule weather cast about, and the winde being faire, bare in with the Straights mouth. The 19 day at night he thinking that he was farther off the land then he was, bare sayle all that night, & an houre and an halfe before day had ranne our shippe vpon the ground on the coast of Barbarie without the Straight foure leagues to the South of Cape Espartel. Whereupon being all not a litle astonied, the Master said vnto vs, I pray you forgive me; for this is my fault and no mans else. The company asked him whether they should cut off the maine masse: no sayd the Master we will hoyle out our boate. But one of our men comming speedily vp, sayd, Sirs, the ship is full of water; well sayd the Master, then cut the mayne-mast ouer boord: which thing we did with all speede; But the after part suddenly split a sunder in such sort that no man was able to stand vpon it, but all fled vpon the foremast vp into the shrouds thereof, and hung there for a time: but seeing nothing but present death approach (being so suddenly taken that we could not make a raft which we had determined) we committed our selues vnto the Lord and beganne with dolefull tune and heauy hearts to sing the 12 Psalm. Velpy Lord for good and goodly men &c. Howbeit before we had finished foure verses the waues of the sea had stopped the breathes of most of our men. For the foremast with the weight of our men & the force of the sea fell downe into the water, and vpon the fall thereof there were 38 drowned, and onely 12 by Gods prouidence partly by swimming and other meanes of chells got on shoare, which was about a quarter of a mile from the wrecke of the ship. The master called George Goodley, and Wilkiam Palmer his mate, both perished. Caesar also being captaine and owner was likewise drowned: none of the officers were saved but the carpenter.

The twelve which the Lord had deliuered from extreme danger of the Sea, at our coming ashore fell in a manner into as great distresse. At our first coming on shore we all fell downe on our knees, praying the Lord most humbly for his mercifull goodnesse. Our prayers being done, we consulted together what course to take, seeing we were fallen into a desert place, & we trauelled all that day vntill night, sometimes one way and sometimes another, and could finde no kinde of inhabitants; onely we saw where wilde beasts had bene, and places where there had bene houses, which after we perceiued to haue bene burnt by the Portugals. So at night falling into certaine groues of oliue trees, we cliued vp and late in them to auoid the danger of lions and other wilde beasts, whereof we saw many the next morning. The next day we trauelled vntill thre of the clocke in the afternoone without any food, but water and wilde date roots: then going ouer a mountaine, we had sight of Cape Espartel; whereby we knew somewhat better which way to trauell, and then we went forward vntill we came to an hedgerow made with great long carres; we spied and looked ouer it, and beheld a number of men aswell horsemen as footmen, to the number of some five thousand in skirmish together with small shot and other weapons. And after consultation what we were best to do, we concluded to yeeld our selues vnto them, being destitute of all meanes of resistance. So rising by we marched toward them, who spying vs, forthwith some hundred of them with their iauelings in their hands came running towards vs as though they would haue run vs thorow: howbeit they onely strooke vs flitting with their weapons, and said that we were Spaniards: and we tolde them that we were Englishmen; which they would not beleue yet. By and by the conflict being ended, and night appoaching, the captaine of the Moores, a man of some 56 yerres olde, came himselfe vnto vs, and by his interpreter which spake Italian, asked what we were, and from whence we came. One Thomas Hennier of our company which could speake Italian, declared vnto him that we were marchants, and how by great misfortune our ship, marchandise, & the greatest part of our company were pitifully cast away vpon their coast. But he void of humainity & all manhood, for all this, caused his men to strip vs out of our apparell euen to our shirts to see what money and iewels we had about vs: which when they had found to the value of some 200 pounds in golde and pearles they gaue vs some of our apparell againe, and bread and water onely to comfort vs. The next morning they carried vs downe to the shore where our shippe was cast away, which was some sixtene miles from that place. In which iourney they vsed vs like their slaues, making vs (being extreme weake) to carry their stuffe, and offering to beat vs if we went not so fast as they. We asked them why they vsed vs so: and they replied, that we were their captiues: we sayd we were their friends, and that there was neuer Englishman captiue to the king of Marocco. So we came downe to the ship, and lay there with them seuen dayes, while they had gotten all the goods they could, and then they parted it amongst them. After the end of these seuen dayes the captaine appointed twenty of his men well armed, to bring vs vp into y^e countrey: and the first night we came to the side of a riuer called Alarach, where we lay on the grasse all that night: for the next day we went ouer the riuer in a frigate of nine oares on a side, the riuer being in that place aboue a quarter of a mile broad: and that day we went to a towne of thirty houses, called Torreon: there we lay foure dayes hauing nothing to feed on but bread and water; and then we went to a towne called Cassuri, and there we were deliuered by those twenty souldiers vnto the Alcaide, which examined vs what we were: and we tolde him. He gaue vs a good answer, and sent vs to the Jewes house, where we lay seuen dayes. In the meane while that we lay here, there were brought thither twenty Spaniards and twenty Frenchmen, which Spaniards were taken in a conflict on land, but the Frenchmen were by foule weather cast on land within the Straights about Cape de Gare, and so made captiues. Thus at the seuen dayes end we twelue Englishmen, the twelue French, and the twenty Spaniards were all conducted toward Marocco with nine hundred souldiers horsemen and footmen, and in two dayes iourney we came to the riuer of Fez, where we lodged all night, being prouided of tents. The next day we went to a towne called Salle, and lay without the towne in tents. From thence we trauelled almost an hundred miles without finding any towne, but euery night we came to fresh water, which was partly running water and sometime raine water. So we came at last within thre miles of the city of Marocco, where we pitched our tents: and there we mette with a carrier which did trauell in the countrey for the English marchants: and by him we sent word vnto them of our estate: and they returned the next day vnto vs a Moores, which brought vs victuals, being at that instant very feeble and hungry; and withall sent vs a letter with pen, inke, and paper, willing vs to write vnto them what ship it was that was cast cast away, and how many and what men there were alive. For said they we would knowe with speed, for to morrow is the kings court: and therefore we would know, for that you should come into the cite like captiues. But for all that we were carried in as captiues and with ropes about our neckes as well English as the French and Spaniards. And so we were carried before the king: and when we came before him he did commit vs all to ward, where wee lay 15 dayes in close prison: and in the end we were cleared by the English Marchants to their great charges: for our deliuerance cost them 700 ounces, euery ounce in that country contayning two shillings. And when we came out of prison we went to the Alfandica, where we continued eight weekes with the English marchants. At the end of which time being well apparellled by the bountie of our marchants we were conueyed downe by the space of eight dayes iourney to S. Cruz, where the English ships roade: where we tooke shipping about the 20 of March, two in the Anne Francis of London, and fife more of vs fife dayes after in the Expedition of London, and two more in a Flemish flie-boat, and one in the Mary Edward also of London, other two of our number died in the countrey of the bloodie-flute: the one at our first imprisonment at Marocco, whose name was George Hancock, and the other at S. Cruz, whose name was Robert Swancon, whose death was hastened by eating of rootes and other unnaturall things to stake their raging hunger in our trauaile, and by our hard and cold lodging in the open fields without tents. Thus of fiftie persons through the rashnesse of an unskillfull Master ten onely suruiued of vs, and after a thousand miseries returned home poore, sicke, and feeble into our countrey.

The same in English.

To the most inuincible and puissant king of the Abassens, the mightie Emperour of Aethiopia the higher and the lower.

ELizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, France and Ireland, defender of the faith &c. To the most high and mightie Emperour of Aethiopia greeting. Whereas it is a matter requisite and well becoming all kings and princes of what lands or nations soeuer, be they neuer so much distanced in place or differing in customes and lawes, to maintaine and preserve the common societie of mankind, and, as occasion shall be offered, to performe mutuall duties of charitie and beneuolence: we for that cause conceiuing most vndoubted hope of your princely fidelitie and courtelie, haue giuen vnto this our subiect Laurence Aldersey intending to trauell into your dominions, these our letters to be deliuered without faile vnto your Highnesse, to the end they may be a testimony of our good will towards you and of our saide subiect his departure from England. Who, after his trauels in many foren countreys, being as yet enflamed with a desire more thoroughly to surueigh and contemplate the world, and now at length to undertake a long and dangerous iourney into your territories and regions: both the sayd Laurence thought, and our selues also deemed, that it would very much auaile him, as well for his owne safetie as for the attayning of your fauour, if, being protected with our broad seale, hee might transpoze vnto your Highnesse a testimony of our louing affection & of his departure from hence. For sithence almighty God the highest creatour and gouernour of the world hath allotted vnto kings and princes his vicegerents ouer the face of the whole earth, their designed porcions and limits to be ruled and administred by them; and by this his gift hath established among them a certaine law of brotherly kindnesse, and an eternall league by them to be obserued: it will not (we hope) seeme vnpleasant vnto your highnesse, when you shall haue intelligence of our louing letters sent so huge a distance ouer sea and land, euen from the farthest realme of England vnto you in Aethiopia. On the other side our selues shall take great solace and delighe, when as by the relation of our owne subiects, the renowne of your name shall be brought vnto vs from the fountains of Nilus, and from those regions which are situate vnder the Southerne Tropike. May it please you therefore of your princely clemencie to vouchsafe so much fauour on this our subiect, that he may, vnder the safeguard and protection of your name, enter into your highnesse dominions, and there remaine safe and free from danger. Which fauour and courtelie wee doe likewise most earnestly request at the hands of other princes, through whose Seigniozies our saide subiect is to passe; and we shall esteeme it as done vnto our selfe and for our honours sake. Neither do we require any greater fauour in this behalfe, then we are vpon the like occasion most ready to graunt vnto the subiects of all princes and the people of all Nations, traauelling into our dominions. Given at London the fift day of November, in the thirtie and ninth yeere of our reigne: and in the yeare of our Lorde 1597.
